from long distances has been attended with considerable inconvenience and expense, and it might be worth while for the potato farmers in these days of food conservation to try the experiment of raising northern seed on their own ground. There is no record that the Jews knew anything about the potato. Columbus came to the Western Hemisphere to find gold. He found the potato, which has been a perpetual gold mine. Potato and other farmers who are getting their seed ready to put in the ground might call to mind the promise: "While the earth remaineth, seed-time and harvest, and cold and heat,

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING INSTALMENT

JANET GRAYSON and Harley Bruce had grown up as playmates and school comrades in the village of Springdale until Harley left for college. When on his return he called at the Grayson house, he was accompanied by Lotta Lomond, whose appearance and manners were in marked contrast to the simplicity of the village girl. Harley took the girls out for a spin in his car, in which they were accompanied by Thaddeus Wiltrone, a worldly-wise young friend of Lotta's. The company proved so uncongenial to Janet that she sought some means of escape. This she found in her Aunt Nan's cottage, near which the highway ran, where she spent the afternoon, returning by the trolley, to the great disappointment of Harley Bruce, who was bored by the gay and thoughtless crowd who had thrust themselves upon him. The next morning he called, but found that Janet had gone on a trip to New York, from which she returned on an evening train.

JANET sank down with a sigh in the hammock and let her eyelids drop shut in the restful starlight with the resinous piney smell in the sweet air. How much better it was to be here than in the hot noisy city! She let her thoughts drift a moment as she relaxed her weary body.

Suddenly, upon the quiet village night a whistle pierced like the note of a clear-voiced thrush; a peculiar soft call in the distance, coming nearer all the time, with a ring of something sympathetic and resonant in it that no other whistle ever seemed to have. Harley was coming down the street! He would go on by, never dreaming she was there! She would lie still and listen in the darkness. How it thrilled her soul to hear that dear familiar whistle again! How it brought tears to her throat and eyes to think how that whistle had once been all for her in the dear childhood days when he used to invent ways of signaling to her so that others would not know! Probably he had forgotten it all, now that he was grown up. And of course he thought she had. She was a young woman now, with a college education. He would not dream that she looked back to those days of roaming the woods and canoeing in the creek with him, as the nearest to heaven this earth could ever show to her. And he must never dream it. He had been in different society. The world had taken its hold upon him. Her quiet simple life would seem puritanical to him now, her ways too simple and unsophisticated.

She could not think of the experience of the day before without an inward shudder. The coarse laughter, the jibes and banter, the loud behavior of the girls, and the vapidness of the men! How could Harley stand for it for a moment? He must have changed, or he never could have endured it at all!

ON came the whistle, growing clearer all the time. Was he alone, or were some of that obnoxious crowd with him? She shrank within the hammock, and half resolved to flee to the house lest her white dress would be noticed. But no, it was too late; for there was a bright light in the hall, and she could not get in without being seen. Besides, the whistle was quite close now, and there was only one person's footsteps ringing on the pavement. She would keep quiet and hear him pass.

But he did not pass. He stopped at the gate with that little cadence in the tune that he always used to give to warn her he was coming, and came swinging up the path whistling the old tune that she used to love, worn threadbare now by time and use, but thrilling the same chords of memory still:

"From the desert I come to thee!"

What was he doing here now? Had some one reported her arrival on the early train? She held her breath with her heart beating wildly, and he came on up to the very steps. Then the whistle stopped abruptly, and he stood in the stream of light from the doorway, peering into the darkness over by the hammock:

"Is that you out there, Mother Gray?" he called, and then came with swift strides. "I thought I'd run in and have a nice old-fashioned talk if you don't mind, till the train comes. I'm not disturbing you, am I?"

He paused beside the hammock and looked down, and with a voice in which the thrill was electric exclaimed: "Jan! It's really you at last!"

know you did, Jan, last night and today. There's no use in denying it. Now why did you do it?"

Janet hesitated, looking at him in the darkness. The light from the house made a background upon which his fine earnest profile was clearly silhouetted. There was something about his manner that would not be denied. Yet how should she answer him? She drooped away from him and was silent.

He dropped her hands as suddenly as he had taken them, and half turned away, saying bitterly:

"Then it's true. You do think I am changed, and you don't like me or trust me any more!"

She stood a moment regarding him with troubled eyes. For an instant he stood silent, then he suddenly turned on her, almost fiercely:

"Jan, is that true? Have I changed?"

Janet dropped back on the big couch hammock with a gesture of despair.

"Oh, Harley! I don't know! Have you?" She said it with a note almost of desperation.

Harley dropped down beside her, talking earnestly:

"Jan! You've got to tell me what is the matter with me. I swear to you I didn't know I was changed. I don't believe I am. What was it made you think so? Those fools my mother brought down with her? You know I don't enjoy that sort of thing, but society is made up of it, and what is a person to do?"

"Harley, when you went away you hated that sort of thing so much you couldn't have been a part of it. You just couldn't!" said the girl with tears in her voice.

"And was I a part of it?"

Janet was silent.

"Was I?"

"Weren't you? At least to some extent?"

"You mean my bringing that fool girl down to your house yesterday morning? Well, I certainly didn't want to do that. She floated out to the street and waylaid me when I was almost at your door, attaching herself to me in the most incredible manner. You certainly would know I wouldn't want a thing like that around when I came to see you! You saw how she maneuvered to keep you out of the front seat when I had it all fixed for you."

JANET did not answer. She could not think of words to voice the situation as it lay in her mind. The young man watched her narrowly in the dim light. He could see the lovely outline of her cheek half turned away, and the soft white throat above the muslin frock. He felt rather than saw the perplexity and dissatisfaction in the troubled brow.

"Jan! You mean the cigarette case? But I don't smoke much. I honestly don't. Of course when one grows up and gets out into the world—in college—why one—sees some things in a broader way—" he finished lamely and gave a vague indefinite sweep with his hand to finish out his argument.

"Those are only—details!" said Janet wearily. "I was not referring to any particular action. One's actions come from principles, you know."

"And you think my principles have changed?" There was a long troubled pause. At last Janet turned to him with a question that seemed to gather and fling at him all the force of her scattered fears:

"Harley, are you going to teach your Sunday school class tomorrow?"

"My Sunday school class!" in startled amazement. "My Sunday school class! I didn't suppose they were in existence; or if they were, I thought of course someone else had them."

"Jan! It's really you at last!"

CHAPTER III

JANET rose up in the darkness and stood before him. Harley put out both hands and took hers in a quick firm grasp.

"Jan, why did you run away from me?" His tone was low and earnest.

Janet half drew back and tried to free her hands, but he held them firmly.

"Why, I—Harley, you know I didn't fit in that crowd. You know why I ran away! You know it was a relief to every one to have me get out at Aunt Nan's!"

She flung her head up and faced him soberly, gently defiant.

"The gang's a mess, of course, and I didn't blame you. But why did you run away from me? You Again Janet did not reply, and the silence was pregnant with thought.

"You think that's another thing in which I'm changed. Of course, I know I was no end of interested in them and all that; but it's a long time, Janet, and I've been living in a world where they had no Sunday schools. I have no doubt I'd be as crazy about them as ever if I'd get them around me again. Tell me about them, Janet. Are they all here yet? There was Ted Chafney! Bright little chap! And Buck Walters! He had a lot of pep! I declare I'd like to see them again. You don't mean they've kept up the Sunday school stunt all these years! Why, they must be some size by this time!"

"They are all here!" said Janet quietly. "That is, they are all here but little Ned Minturn, the lame boy who went about in a wheeled chair, you know. He died last winter. They must have sent you word. I know his mother wrote you a long letter. She got the address from mother."

"I never got it!" said Harley, deeply moved.

"Little Ned left a message for you that he would be waiting at the gate to meet you in heaven, and you mustn't forget and look for a wheeled chair, for he would be walking there! He said tell you he was awful sorry he couldn't wait here till you got back from college, because you promised to tell him all about sports in foreign colleges; but he guessed you would understand how much you had done for him, because now he didn't mind dying since you had taught him that it was only a better kind of living."

The young man's head was bowed. "Jan, that makes me feel small!" he said huskily.

After a moment the girl went on in a quiet voice.

"The boys have stuck together just as you left them. They've had several teachers, most of them the teachers in the high school, but they've never cared for them much. I'm sure it's been the memory of what you did for them, and of what you were, that has kept them true to their promises. I think they most of them still carry the little Testaments you gave them, and not one of the class smokes. There was a story that Fatty Gorman was caught smoking a cigarette down by the old swimming hole by two of them, and they ducked him until he cried for mercy and declared he never would do it again. Ted told him they wouldn't have you disgraced that way; that they would put him out of the gang if they ever caught him at it again."

THE girl paused breathless. She felt as if she were running a long sharp knife into the heart of a friend and turning it in the wound. She dared not turn to look at him.

"Jan, that makes me ashamed!" he said humbly.

"Their last teacher went off for his vacation three weeks ago," Janet went on, "and they wouldn't let any one else take the class. They've come regularly every Sunday and taught themselves, taken turns or something, and been as quiet and orderly all gathered in a group around their table. They said they were going to wait for you. They said they knew you would want your old class back when you came."

There was a long silence, broken only by the chirp of a cricket in the grass by the hammock. Janet's hands were cold as they lay in her lap, and she hardly dared draw a full breath, so momentous seemed the moment. Would he understand? Would he pass the test? Or had he grown too far away from it all?

Suddenly he straightened up. "Sure, Jan, I'll teach my class!" he said quietly, and after a minute, "I'll teach it if you think I'm fit for it. I guess you couldn't have made me see the difference in myself any better than by showing me the picture of what those boys thought I was. Jan, I didn't realize how far I'd got away from some things, but I guess you saw right away. Well, you'll have to tell me what the lesson is."

Janet tuned with shining eyes toward her old friend. Her heart leaped up with relief and joy. He couldn't be quite changed when he had responded so readily to the appeal of his boys, even though he had called Sunday school a "stunt," which he never would have done in the old days.

They went together to the library and drew up to the big study table where they used to study their Sunday school lessons in past years, and Mrs. Grayson watched them with interested eyes and tender heart, wondering timorously what the outcome was to be. Surely, surely the boy could not be so much changed when he could still sit down to a study of the Bible! Or was he doing it for Janet's sake? She watched them keenly and could not be sure.

HARLEY went home at what was a late hour for Springdale, but the tide of merriment was at its full when he reached the house. Somehow the giddy laughter grated on his ears, and he did not feel in the mood to spend the next two hours with them. He paused on the front walk where he could see his mother's guests through the long windows, and hear bits of conversation and laughter. Lotta Lomond floated out on the piazza on the arm of Thaddeus Wiltrone, gazing languishingly up into his face. A flippant sentence of hers rang out in the still sweet night and seemed to pollute the moonlight and the scent of the pine trees, under which he stood in deep shadow. A moment later he heard Lotta say fretfully: "I wonder where Harley is!" A great distaste for the society with which his mother had surrounded him surged over him. He stole softly around through the garden and climbed the rose trellis to his own window as he used to do when he was a boy; wondering to himself how ever in the world he had stood Lotta Lomond even for an hour. He found himself hating the way in which she had spoken his name, a kind of possessive way as if he were her property. He frowned in the darkness, and then forgot her as the vision of Janet rose in his mind.

THE late revelers were still sleeping next morning when he arose and prepared to answer the summons of the sweet-voiced church bell. Something clamored joyously in his soul, like the return of a precious memory, as he went across the dewy lawn and took the short cut to the church. Anticipation mingled with dread stirred his spirit, for now in a few minutes he would be with his old Sunday school class, and they would no longer be the adoring little kids they had been when he left, ready to follow his slightest suggestion. They were sturdy young fellows with maturer minds, and they would watch him critically and test him to see if he were all that he had once professed. Would they see a lack? Would their keen eyes discover how he had changed and fallen away from his high ideals?

He drew a deep breath, half a prayer for courage, as he entered the familiar old church door, like one who is plunging into cold and unknown waters where there may be hidden rocks.

Five minutes later he sat with his group of shy fellows around him, his hands still aching from their welcoming grasps, his cheeks still burning from embarrassment, but his heart warm with the fellowship that he used to love when he was a boy.

The boys stole furtive admiring glances at him when he was not looking: at the cut of his clothes, the close-clipped hair, the handsome face, with something akin to a group of devotees about an idol. During the opening prayer he underwent the shock of reversion back to his former self, and comparison with his present self. Janet's words of the night before when he asked her if he was changed rang in his ears: "Oh, Harley! I don't know! Have you?" Had he changed? Was it so noticeable that these bright-eyed lads would notice and lose their faith in him? And he cared! Yes, he cared very much. There was enough of his old self left not to want their ideals shattered, as he instinctively knew they would be shattered if he turned out to have lost his old standards and principles.

They grouped about him earnestly with shining eyes of anticipation, their shyness still upon them when the time for the lesson came, and he felt his own smallness and inability in their presence. Somehow he managed to pull himself together and bridge the years of their

Over the Top -on High

When your automobile limps up hills, knocking in protest at climbing them "on high"—it is a sure indication of carbon. The easiest, cleanest, safest and most satisfactory method of removing carbon deposits is with Johnson's Carbon Remover. It will save you $3.00 to $5.00 over any other method without laying up your car. No time or labor required—you can do it yourself in five minutes.

JOHNSON'S CARBON REMOVER

This is a harmless liquid. It contains no acid and does not affect lubrication in any way or interfere with the oil in the crank case. It has no action on any metal.

Use It Every 1,000 Miles

The use of Johnson's Carbon Remover every 1,000 miles or oftener will increase the power of your engine—improve acceleration—stop that knock—quiet your motor—save your batteries—and reduce your gasoline consumption 12% to 25%.

The occasional use of Johnson's Carbon Remover will automatically eliminate most valve trouble and your engine will always be clean and sweet and at its highest efficiency.

"I Bought It With My Candy Money"

Here are grain bubbles so nut-like and flavory that children will spend candy money for them. Perhaps you have known them, as we have, to do it.

Hungry children after school eat them like confections. Crisped and lightly buttered they are fascinating tidbits—far better than peanuts or popcorn.

They are used like nut meats in home candy making and as garnish on ice cream. They taste like nuts, and vastly excel them by their airy, flaky texture.

Eat Them Dry

Yet Premier Foods

Yet they are foods—scientific foods, invented by a great food expert. They are the greatest foods made from rice, corn or wheat, because of their ease of digestion.

Two are whole grains steam exploded—puffed to eight times normal size. One is pellets of hominy puffed to rain-drop size.

All get an hour of fearful heat, which gives that wondrous flavor. All are shot from guns, and thus changed into bubbles, flimsy, thin and crisp.

Mix with Berries

Every food cell is exploded, so digestion can instantly act. They do not tax the stomach, yet every atom feeds.

Remember these things. Puffed Grains are superlative grain foods. Food experts wish that every grain could be prepared in this way. No other process ever known so fits a grain for food.

Make them more than breakfast dainties. They are for luncheons, for suppers, for play-time and for bedtime. They are for eating dry, for mixing with fruits, for the bowl of milk, for soups, or for serving with sugar and cream. There are three of them, each with a different flavor, so Puffed Grains are ever new. Let no day pass without them.

separation with a story that held their attention from the start. He had not lost his gift of tongue. Janet, looking that way over the heads of her own strenuous class of boys, rejoiced secretly to see them absorbed in the lesson as of old.

His old place in the choir awaited him when Sunday school was out, and Harley went to it almost eagerly, as if the act of the moment could bring back the fact of long ago. He did not know that his mother with one or two of her guests had drifted into the church quite late in the service and sat down near the door. He had turned his chair sideways so that he might watch Janet at the organ, and he had eyes for nothing else.

At the close of the service Mrs. Grayson smiled at him from the aisle and in quite the old tone said: "Coming home to dinner with us, Harley?" and Harley answered eagerly:

"I sure am, Mother Gray!" and so the three slipped out the side door of the church by the choir loft and away across the lawn to the Grayson house, while his mother and her guests sat in the big car in front of the church and never knew he was gone till they sent the chauffeur to search for him.

It was blessed to the boy who had lived in hotels and pensions or his mother's elaborate establishment for so long to get back to the dear old quiet dining-room where he and Janet had spent so many happy hours; to sit beside the small round table, just they three, and eat the delicious stewed chicken and little biscuits with plenty of gravy and currant jelly that had always delighted him so, the sponge cake with strawberries and cream, and feel he was a part of this sweet little home once more, taken into the secret of its intimacy as if he really belonged. It was pleasant even to jump up and help carry out the Sunday dishes so that the "girl" could get away early to her own folks; even to hear her say again, "Now, Mister Harley, don't you go messing up my clean kitchen floor with them chicken bones! You got too big a load, and you'll be sure to drop something!" for all the world as she used to say it ten years before!

Then they took some books and went out to the hammock under the pines, but they didn't read much, only turned the leaves over and reminisced dreamily about what used to be; or told each other incidents of the past four years.

There was so much to be said. Each moment it grew better to be together, and the distance that had seemed to separate them at first was less and less as they watched one another and saw the same dear traits cropping out, the same little tricks of motion and speech that had been familiar in time past.

Almost before they knew it the shadows grew long upon the grass under the pines, and the bell for evening vespers startled them into hurry. Janet rushed in to smooth her hair. Harley borrowed a comb just as he used to do and smoothed his. Then they hurried over to the church as the last stroke of the bell rang out.

The setting sun through the rich old stained-glass windows, the deep shadows of purple hush in the church, the sweet old hymns, the tender voice of the old minister in prayer, all wove a holy spell about the two, as they sat the service through with happy hearts from which the mists of doubt and question about each other seemed mysteriously to have cleared.

There were clear yellow expanses of light in the sky when the service was out, and little flames of coral clouds picked out with fiery gold were gathering in the west. The evening star flashed out as they walked back to the house. Harley had visions of staying the evening, and of helping Janet to get supper, cocoa and cold chicken and apple sauce with big sugar cookies; but in the shadow of the pines there arose from the hammock a very impatient and disdainful young man, who had been sent from Mrs. Bruce to summon her son summarily to his home. Two of the guests had found it necessary to take a train from a neighboring town and his services were required as chauffeur to convey them thither. With rebellious look and reluctant feet he tore himself away.

It was like a sudden cold breath in a warm spring air to have Harley summoned away so suddenly. But there was so much that was pleasant to be thought over and hugged to her heart that Janet scarcely felt it. She was rejoicing in Harley, her old friend Harley, back again. Surely, surely, after today she might be certain that he was not altogether changed!

After supper she threw a big soft white cloak about her and went out to the hammock to think it over. The birds in the tree-tops were settling to rest with many a sweet throaty note of good-night, and a holy quiet seemed to fill the air. Now and then a distant gust of laughter echoed from the Bruce's big colonial mansion, a block and a half away. It seemed to grate on the Sabbath quiet and bring a pang to Janet's heart. Harley had been summoned back to a world where Sabbath and quiet were unknown!

The laughter broke forth again, mingled with snatches of a popular song. She could hear a car being driven around to the front of the Bruce house. The "honk! honk!" of the horn rasped out impatiently, and cut her like a knife. That Lomond girl would be going, of course, and would sit beside Harley again. Janet felt a sharp pain of jealousy and took herself in hand promptly. Why should she feel that way about any girl with whom Harley chose to ride? She had no rights in him beyond those of an old friend. He had spent the greater part of the day with her, and she ought to be satisfied. Of course, he owed something to his mother and her guests. Still, she hated to think of him off on another "joy ride" with such company, and just after the beautiful day of service and quiet. It seemed incongruous and out of harmony. The Harley that he used to be would not have stood it. He would have found some way out of it. Was there then some weakness, some lack of fine feeling?

She stopped abruptly and determined not to go further into the matter. Harley had stood the test of the morning. He had gone back to his class, and entered into the services of the day with apparently his old interest. She was being disloyal to him to question any more. She would just take comfort in thinking how beautiful it was to see him with his boys again in Sunday school, in feeling once more the thrill of his tenor in the morning's anthem; of rejoicing anew in the way he treated her mother, and seemed to enjoy the simple home cooking. More than this she would not allow herself to think. If Harley's eyes had dwelt admiringly upon her more than once that day and brought the glow to her cheeks and the brightness to her eyes, that was not for her to recall just now. She must first find out what he was, and whether he was changed.

The automobiles tooted on their way at last, out the old Portage Road, and left the Sabbath evening silence unbroken, save by a few droning voices on the piazza of the old boarding-house up the street. The birds were all asleep. The pines were whispering softly with a passing breeze. Janet leaned down on the cushions of the hammock and almost forgot the things that troubled her in the quiet and the sweetness of the things that had pleased her.

Fifteen minutes later she suddenly became aware that the footsteps that had been coming down the street had paused at their gate. The gate clicked, and a silken rustle was added to the footsteps.

Janet sat up and watched the woman in light garments who came slowly, almost uncertainly, up the walk as if she were not quite sure whether she had come to the right place or not. When she reached the path of light that was flung out from the front door Janet perceived that it was Mrs. Bruce. Of all women to come to their house! Mrs. Bruce! She had never been there before save once when Harley was a little boy and she came after him and was very angry because he had not been at home to receive her. Why had she come now? Had Harley perhaps not gone home after all, and his mother was after him again? She was an insufferable mother, the girl could not help thinking. Then the thought flashed over her, "Perhaps Harley has asked her to come! Perhaps she has come to be nice and invite me over there! If she has I suppose I shall have to go, although I don't a bit enjoy the prospect, especially on Sunday evening. I won't go Sunday, but if she asks I'll go tomorrow, perhaps."

Then Janet came forward from the darkness to meet her visitor, and Mrs. Bruce, seeing her light cloak against the dark pines, came on to meet her.

"Is this where the Graysons live?" she asked before they were close enough to see one another.

"Yes, Mrs. Bruce," said the girl pleasantly. "This is Janet. Will you come into the house, and I will call mother."

"Oh, no," said the lady quite decidedly, "I don't want to see your mother. It was you I came to see. Can't we sit down over here where you were sitting? I just wanted to speak to you a minute or two."

THERE was something in the visitor's tone that chilled Janet's ardor, something that seemed almost a slight to her mother in the way she declined to see her, but the girl answered, "Certainly," and led the way to the commodious hammock under the pines.

Mrs. Bruce did not exclaim over the beauty of the spot or the fragrance of the pines, as did most guests who were privileged to sit there at that hour of the evening. Instead she sat down on the very edge of the cushion as if she meant to stay but a minute, and seemed utterly oblivious to her surroundings.

"My dear," she began in a tone of great condescension, "I have come to explain to you one or two matters which you may not understand."

There was a sort of a hissing purr in her voice, as if she were talking to one far beneath her and trying to be exceedingly kind. Janet felt all her former prejudice rising in antagonism. She sat down at the extreme end of the hammock away from her guest and held her chin and shoulders up with dignity, answering not a word. The smooth voice went on:

"It is difficult, of course, my dear, for a young girl to form a correct idea of certain things shut away from the world as you have been, in this little narrow village."

SHE paused impressively, but Janet's manner did not help her any. If she had been at all sensitive the speaking silence must have checked her voluble tongue, but she was not a sensitive woman. She went on suavely:

"Of course I know that you and my son had very good times together playing when you were children, and it is perhaps natural that you should expect the intimacy to go on, now that your childhood is over. I thought it only kind to come and help you to see how impossible this would be for Harley after his broad education in this country, his travels in the Old World, and his association with a highly cultured class. He could hardly be expected to find anything in common with a person of different and lower tastes. Moreover, he has now his social position to fill, which his inheritance makes an important one. It never brings a girl a good reputation for a man in another station to pay her even a slight attention. You understand what I mean, I am sure, my dear? Not that my son would mean any harm. Young people are so thoughtless! But I felt after what happened today that I really ought to warn you. I hope you will take it kindly. I am sure I have the utmost charity and sympathy for you; but you can readily see, perhaps it has even occurred to you before I came, how utterly unfitted you are to be Harley's friend now?"

She paused with a haughty graciousness in her manner for her victim to agree with her.

Janet, alive in every nerve, and keenly aware of every poisoned arrow that had been shot into her proud quivering heart, furious as only such a fine young spirit as hers could be, paused only to get control of her voice before she answered steadily:

"No, Mrs. Bruce, I have not thought about that at all! I have been too busy since Harley returned trying to find out whether after all this separation and change he is still the kind of person I want for my friend! When I have settled that question I may think about the other!"

Mrs. Bruce sat erect and stared in the starlight for the fraction of a second. Then she said with freezing hauteur:

"Indeed!"

And again indignantly:

"Indeed! And what possible objection, may I ask, could you find to my son?"

"There might be a great many, Mrs. Bruce, but I would not care to discuss them with you. If you wish to pursue this subject any further, I will call my mother and you may talk to her."

JANET arose, with swift steps crossed the lawn and vanished into the house.

In amazement the visitor watched her go; and then, suddenly realizing her own position, arose precipitately and started for the gate by the most direct route. Safely on the sidewalk, she glanced back and saw a graceful woman with gray hair and dignified mien standing in the doorway shading her eyes with her hand and looking out into the darkness of the lawn. Mrs. Bruce quickened her steps with a vague feeling of discomfort and was soon out of sight.

"Who would have imagined a little country girl would take it like that!" she murmured to herself. "The little spitfire!"

The Great Issue at Stake

BY DR. COSMO GORDON LANG, Archbishop of York and Primate of England

"COME to England and France quickly with money, ships and food. There is a terrible strain upon my countrymen in the trenches. We are not whining and asking for sympathy; but you will be cheering us to new hope if we know that all the power and resources of your country will be given to the future of civilization."

"You cannot send as many men as you wish, but you can send other things. Send money. Where men cannot go, money can. The ocean cannot stop it. Your dollars are the only bullets that will never miss their mark. You are going to have a great Liberty Loan soon. Put all the vigor into it that you can. Don't delay. We are asking you as brothers and partners to come and help us. Every man, woman and child can help in this fight, to free the world from the menace of German domination."

"We have to settle whether the spirit of irresponsible autocracy or the spirit of freedom is to prevail among the nations of the world. So vast and fundamental an issue naturally draws all the free nations of the world together. It must be settled now and forever, cost what it may."

"The world must decide whether it will submit to the domination of a spirit which, if it were to prevail, would plunge the nations into a long, restless career of military rivalry. On such an issue there can be no such thing as compromise. We must be worthy of our task. We must recover for the world the atmosphere of Freedom!"

Hoarding Food

ANY one buying and holding a larger supply of food now than in peace time, except foods canned, dried or preserved in the home, is helping to defeat the Food Administration in its attempt to secure a just distribution of food and the establishment of fair prices.

The food-hoarder is working against the common good and even against the very safety of the country.

Hoarding food in households is both selfish and unnecessary. The government is protecting the food supply of its people.

Not In Old Ways

A great number of dentists nowadays employ a new method of teeth cleaning. And they have proved its efficiency.

It is a pepsin dentifrice called Pepsodent—a scientific product for combating film on teeth.

That slimy film which you feel on teeth is their chief enemy. Nearly all tooth troubles are due to it.

That is what discolors—not your teeth. It hardens into tartar. It holds portions of the food which ferment and form acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth—the cause of decay.

Millions of germs breed in it, and these may cause many serious troubles. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea.

It gets into crevices, hardens and stays and resists the tooth brush. The ordinary dentifrice cannot dissolve it. So most careful people, every few months, go for a dental cleaning.

Must End the Film

Millions of people find that brushing fails to save their teeth. It may remove the food debris, but it doesn't end the film. And that is the tooth destroyer.

Now science has evolved a way to constantly combat this film. It is based on pepsin, the digestant of albumin. For the film is albuminous matter.

This new way is called Pepsodent. Its object is to dissolve the film, then to daily prevent its accumulation. That means to constantly defeat the teeth's chief enemy.

Pepsin long seemed impossible. It must be activated, and the usual agent is an acid, harmful to the teeth. But now a harmless activating method has been found. Five governments have already granted patents. And that is employed in Pepsodent.

Able authorities have proved this product by three years of clinical tests. They all agree that it seems to solve the problem of the film. So, to quickly bring it into general use, we now urge everyone to test it in their homes.

Send the coupon for a One-Week tube. Use it like any tooth paste, then watch the results. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Note how they whiten as the fixed film disappears.

You will quickly see that Pepsodent does what nothing else has done. And you will want those good results continued. Cut out the coupon now.

Genco

RAZORS

"Must make good or we will"

Being American-made through and through, Genco quality has built up the largest exclusively high-grade razor factory in the world. The uniformity of Genco forging, hardening, and tempering is unequalled.

In the hand of your barber a Genco Razor also means uniformly clean, cool shaving. Keep a Genco at his shop for your own exclusive use. To do so is sanitary and sensible.

Many dealers are displaying these razors in the counter case shown above. Look for it. If you do not easily locate a Genco razor in your town, write and we will advise you where or how you can get them.

IN the midst of a wide stretch of desert, absolutely bare of any growing thing, is a little group of refugees, old people, women and children, with one precious donkey that by dint of effort or stratagem they had been able to save. Their babies they carried on their backs, and what was left of their worldly goods they had loaded on the little donkey. Their men had been taken months before, and they had been driven from their homes by the Turks, so they went out not knowing whither they went, hoping somehow, somewhere, to find food and shelter.

Mr. C. T. Hooper, in a personal narrative from Gaza and Jaffa, gives this and other equally heart-touching cases.

Three young children were found in a street in Jaffa extremely weary and hungry. When questioned about their home they explained that both father and mother had recently died in Jerusalem, and that they had set out to walk to the sea. The forty-five miles of road through hills and valleys in this war zone they had traversed alone and on foot.

Mr. Hooper found the old Church Missionary Society hospital had been used by the Turks for wounded. Foul dressings and every sort of refuse had been dumped in the courtyard and accumulated, until the place was filled with an overpowering stench. The floors likewise were filthy and stained.

IN the relief hospital in Jaffa the 150 children had to lie on the cold tiling, without any bedding or even a bit of straw. And it has been very cold in Jaffa and Jerusalem recently. Mr. Hooper was able to find some worn flour sacks, thin and full of holes, but most welcome and useful. Each child now has one of them. He also distributed the clothing and blankets sent from Port Said upon the first appeal, and began giving out pieces of flannel to be sewn into garments. But the people went out and traded the cloth for food, so it has been necessary to organize, and to employ a number of women in sewing up dresses and clothes.

The needs of the people in the country farther north are more serious and compelling. So that as the army moves on toward Syria there will be increasing demands upon the staff and funds.

Every day brings to the American Committee Headquarters cablegrams and letters that tell of the terrific suffering in the Eastern War Zone.

From Trowbridge at Cairo comes the following dated Feb. 9: "A strong central committee is organized in Jerusalem, with MacInnes presiding, Cleland treasurer and Trowbridge secretary. Four commodious buildings are secured and others are available. Work is begun along the following lines: feeding fifteen thousand destitute during the temporary food crisis; Jewish committee feeding another fifteen thousand; Egypt supplying foodstuffs; hospitals stripped by Turks are being re-equipped; three relief clinics are working efficiently; orphanage opened for two hundred and another urgently required. The main drive is for industrializing all relief work. The American colony will manage the boys' trade schools on an extensive scale. One hundred thousand additional is required from America for carrying Palestine budget three months and purchasing motor trucks. British staff workers are en route and much expedition is necessary for reaching towns pillaged by retreating Turks. Lovell's blind school is intact but destitute."

SHEED cables from Taurus, Persia, Feb. 4th: "Famine is driving refugees over the open border. Many are perishing en route in the heavy snow and bitter cold. Naked and hungry men, women and children from a warm climate in zero weather suffer heart-rending agonies and there are many deaths daily. The relief bakery is giving a half pound of bread daily. We must double its capacity and are establishing other bakeries. Enrollment of orphans, weaving of clothing and building of roads continue. Must increase industrial work. Large spring sowing is essential if we are to avert similar conditions next year. Workers are needed. The Persian government urgently requests more help. The entire region is looking to America as its only hope. The condition of refugees is desperate. Six hundred thousand dollars is needed. Thousands are starving."

Trowbridge cables from Jerusalem, via Cairo: "Your first remittance bought two hundred tons of rice, wheat and medical supplies. Thousands thank America. Workers are now in Jerusalem, Bethlehem Clinic and Hebron Hospital. Jerusalem Dispensary and Orphanage, with one hundred children is opened. Over two hundred and fifty in Java orphanage. Food is very scarce, also fuel and clothing. Fifty thousand sufferers are directly accessible at Jerusalem. Funds in hand very inadequate. Urge immediate action. Conditions in Syria are appalling."

UNDER date of Jerusalem, February 3, Rev. Stephen Trowbridge writes to Bishop MacInnes:

"General Clayton assured me that not later than February 7 three railway trucks will be allowed daily from Kantara east to Jerusalem itself, for relief foodstuffs—primarily for the 300 tons of rice and for further supplies of wheat, rice and other staples which you and the Jewish Committee may be able to secure in Cairo. Later, clothing, medical supplies, etc., may be sent up in the same way. But the primary need is certainly for food. And I think that our committee should help the Government, just as far as it can in this emergency. The margin of supplies is very narrow in Jerusalem. After February three trucks will also be allowed for merchants and for an open market for goods coming in. The section through the Judean hills is narrow-gauge, necessitating transshipment at the point where the narrow gauge commences. A construction train has actually come through to Jerusalem, but the pressure for military supplies will not slacken, and I think General Clayton has dealt generously in allowing relief foodstuffs, 25 tons per day, after February 7. Wheat is required even more than rice, perhaps, if it can be had in Egypt at a reasonable price. But there is no wheat, and the Government stores, which are being given out to an immense number of poor through the community heads, are now reduced to three days' supply. A large percentage of families have sold every bit of furniture, and some even their bedding and changes of clothing, for food.

"Petroleum is practically unobtainable here. People go to bed at dark.

"The American Colony people have served the poor and sick in the city with such unflinching devotion and self-sacrifice all through the desperately hard times of the past three years, that I hear words of gratitude and appreciation about them on every hand. The new Government is evidently satisfied that they are loyal and that they should be given a very real share in relief organization. They have some very sad cases of distress which we must help without delay. Their funds are very low."

Cleveland H. Dodge, Treasurer of the American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief, has announced contributions totaling $88,746.59 for the week ending February 19, 1918. This makes a total of $8,459,000.67 collected by the Committee to that date for relief of the sufferers in the Eastern War Zone. Among the gifts were $5,000 from the Christian Herald; $10,000 from citizens of San Francisco; $1,000 from Mrs. Thompson, Waterbury, Conn.; $1,000 from citizens of Paterson, N. J.; $1,500 from the American Baptist Foreign Missionary Society of Boston; $1,325 from the Missionary Board of F. M. Church of Chicago; $10,000 from citizens of Grand Rapids, Mich.; $2,500 from Spokane, Wash.; $1,000 from Citizens of Cleveland, O.; $2,000 from the publishers of the Literary Digest; $23,157.76 from Sunday schools of the United States, and $36,204.27 from miscellaneous sources.

The Young Mother Must Feed Two

THE first months of baby's life particularly reflect the life of the mother. A fretful child shows the mother's nerve-weakness, poor blood—improper preparation for her ordeal.

But even after the baby has come it is not too late for a nursing mother to make amends. The addition to her diet of a concentrated food- tonic like Sanatogen gives her nerve cells the exact food Nature requires, enriching the blood, aiding digestion and adding reserve strength and vigor so necessary if she is to "feed two" with real success.*

And the remarkable fact that Sanatogen is so speedily assimilated by even the weakest system is still another reason why it has proved so effective in bringing a keener joy in living to women in many conditions of poor health—the anaemic, the nerve-weary, the "socially-tired," or the aging. Aren't you one of those whom Sanatogen can benefit now?

*Dr. C.W. Saleeby, an international medical authority, voicing the opinion of thousands of physicians, says: "For the nursing mother there can scarcely be a better special addition to the diet than Sanatogen. It is a true tonic because on all the counts of its composition it is a true food and in some special way a nerve food."

Sold by Drug Stores, everywhere, in three sizes—$1.00, $1.90 and $3.60—no advance in prices.

From the Top of a Tower

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

I STOOD upon a tower set in the city's sea,
A dizzy man-made spire that cut an untamed place,
And for one breathless moment I gazed across a space
Of air and sky and sunshine, that awed and humbled me.
For there, above the city, instead of standing free,
I knew the sudden pressure of God's unswerving grace—
I felt His mighty handclasp, and seemed to glimpse His face,
And caught the ringing message of things that ought to be.

I stood upon a tower; the city far below
Lay quiet in the sunlight; I could not hear its cry;
And all at once the meaning of much I longed to know,
Came to me through the spaces. I felt content and high.
Far down, the ant-like people were darting to and fro—
I silent stood, and listened, between the earth and sky!

WE stood on the top of the Woolworth Tower, the Soldier Man and I, and looked down over the great City, "For," the Soldier Man had said, "I'm going to France in a few days and I want a picture of New York to take away with me, a picture I can't forget."

I had never been on the top of the Woolworth Tower before. The Soldier Man had. Perhaps that was why he looked at me rather quizzically as I walked with an almost too certain step to the edge of the balcony. Perhaps that was why his hand was on my arm to draw me back as I glanced over the high railing.

I glanced almost casually over that railing. And then, for I was not accustomed to heights, I drew back, a bit faint and dizzy, from the edge of the balcony that seemed suddenly to become the edge of the world.

"Is it always like that?" I gasped.
The Soldier Man did not laugh. One does not laugh too easily when one is fifty-seven stories up in the air.

"For a person with the least bit of imagination," he answered, "it is always like that!"

I leaned back against the stone side of the tower and felt the universe thundering about my ears. I had a strange caved-in feeling and yet, too, I had a stranger impulse that seemed to be drawing me to the edge again.

"I wouldn't dare come up if that railing wasn't there," I said at last in a rather small voice.

"Neither would I," agreed the Soldier Man, "it's too—big."

I STEPPED again to the railing and I looked down. Again the giddiness caught at me, but I was able to see more clearly, with less shrinking. I could see the great streets that stretched, canyon-like, below me—the great trolley cars that seemed like toys, the huge buildings that were dwarfed and shrunken when one looked down upon them. And I could see the people...

"It's an old comparison," the Soldier Man was saying, "but there's none better. Those people, below, do look like ants!"

They did look like ants, the people below. It seemed as if I could step on them and crush them, could push them over in hundreds if I had wanted to. But I was fifty-seven stories up. And then suddenly the realization struck me that I would look the same way to them if they were on the tower and I in the street. And I wondered if my goings and comings would seem as futile to them: as their goings and comings seemed to me. And I realized that they would.

"How are you feeling now?" the voice of the Soldier Man broke in upon my thoughts. "Does it still get you?"

"Yes, it still gets me," I answered him, "and I'm feeling very humble!"
"It makes me feel humble, too," the Soldier Man said slowly, "and—"

I interrupted. "And reverent!" I told him, "very reverent. It's even more marvelous to look at than some splendid bit of nature—a mountain, a waterfall, or a chasm. Because God has created the mountain all by himself—because his hand, his hand that could do anything, has scooped out the chasm, or made the bed of the waterfall. Here, looking over these huge buildings, looking over this city that's almost too large to believe, we're looking at something that men have conceived and constructed with the power that God has put into their brains, and the strength he has put into their hands. We're looking at a work of God's that is a double work! That's why I feel reverent."

"I understand," said the Soldier Man. "Come, let's look at the other side—where there's a river and boats!"

I did not get the same sense of height from the river side of the tower. The buildings that had made the streets into canyons were gone, and the shining water seemed scarcely fifty-seven stories below. The river looked kinder, happier. The river was beautiful. And yet—

"Let's go back," I said, "and look at the streets again. It's terrible, but I can't help liking it in a way. It fascinates me." And we went back and looked down again at the human ants that scuttled over the streets.

It was after we had left the tower and were walking across City Hall Park that I began, again, to get my breath. I found myself laughing, a bit hysterically. The Soldier Man laughed, too.

"Are you thinking," he questioned, "about how you are looking, now, from up there?" And he glanced back at the tower.

"No," I told him, "I'm only thinking of how wonderful it would be if everyone in the world, every once in so often, could go to the top of a tower and look down. It would take all of the conceit out of their hearts. It would give them a new sense of values. I don't think that I'll ever feel satisfied with myself again!"

LOOKING down from a tower is an adventure. It is more than an adventure, it's an experience. And it's a worth-while experience. Because a person who has seen his fellows reduced to ant-size has seen a miracle, and has been given a remarkable point of view. And so, having had that experience, I can't help wondering whether the people who live in the mountains or on other high places are kinder and better and surer of themselves than those who live, with the hurrying crowds, in the lowlands? It seems as if, eternally looking down on others, they must find time to think unhurried and wonderful thoughts.

Most of us, however, must live in the valley places, because our homes and our daily tasks are there. Most of us belong to the ant-like throngs. But none of us need, because we seem like ants from fifty-seven stories up, to be ants. We have the right to go, every once in a while, to some place where we, too, can look down; where we, too, can be above the world. Perhaps that place may be the tower of an office building; perhaps it may only be in the innermost part of our souls.

"I will lift mine eyes unto the hills," says the beautiful old psalm, "from whence cometh my help—" And we, who may never be able to go to the really high places of the world, may follow its teachings. And by spending a few minutes in a tower, or on a hill, or by merely fixing our gaze on some splendid up-standing landmark, we may realize very clearly that "My help cometh from the Lord, who made Heaven and earth."

Questions and Answers

MRS. N. A. B., Georgia, sends us the following: "I wish that you might devise some plan of cooperation with your large Christian family, by which we can appeal to our President to set apart one day each week for a day of national fasting and prayer, that God may be with us in this war, bringing it to a speedy but righteous end. We read in 11 Chron. 20:3-6 of Jehoshaphat's prayer and his fast proclaimed throughout Judah. The answer is recorded in verses 15-24 of the same chapter. Again, in Isa. 37:14-20, we read of Hezekiah's prayer and its answer in verses 33-38. May we not take courage in these dark days to ask great things of God? He is the same yesterday, today and forever. His power is no less. We are fighting for a righteous cause. When we realize that this battle is not ours but God's, why should not we, his followers, ask our Father to hear our prayers? The government is asking for meatless and wheatless days. Why should we not have catless days, or at least fast for one meal on a day set apart each week, and spend that time in prayer? By so doing we would help feed our Allies, bring a spiritual blessing to our own souls, honor God by asking his blessing, and show to the world that we, as a nation, still trust in the God who had power to stop the great Assyrian army by sending the death angel into its camp. I trust that some effort may be made toward this national prayer and fast day."

L. O. We are not to judge others. Your friends may be better Christians than you think, though they may not show it. There are many who need tactful encouragement before they can be brought to talk unreservedly about the spiritual life. In these days of sorrow and suffering there are opportunities for the soul-winner which should not be disregarded.

Inquirer, Germantown, Pa. Charles Stelzle gives the drink statistics boiled down to a nutshell, thus: Spent for liquor annually in the United States, $2,000,000,000, which is equal to what the nation spends for bread and clothing; it is three times as much as the cost of maintaining all of our public schools; it is equal to the value of 535,000 workers' homes costing $3,800 apiece; it is twice the capital of all the national banks; it is twice the value of all the church property in the United States; it is twice as much as it costs to run the Federal government in peace times. Write to Mr. Stelzle, 105 East Twenty-second Street, New York, and he will gladly send you all the available statistical facts on the liquor question.

P. L. E. God's Word distinctly warns against cheating and taking advantage, and calls such practices evil. Any one who gets the better of another by unfair means, or by trick and device, even though he may violate no law, is guilty in God's sight.

S. K. Wharton, Canada. Please explain Luke 11:24, 25 and 26.

1. Our Lord is here speaking allegorically of the Jews. They had idolatrous tendencies and were cleansed of them in Babylon. Upon their return to their own land, they became seemingly reformed; they swept out idolatry, but developed Pharisaism, because their reformation was not of the right kind, not being from within but from without. 2. Your question on Revelation will doubtless be treated in one of the series of articles by Dr. Gray.

I. T. M., Dubbs, Miss.; P. S., Pittston, Pa. Christ gave us an example of cheerful obedience to governmental regulations (Matt. 22:21), and the apostles encouraged their hearers to like efforts (Rom. 13:1-4) and made obedience to and cooperation with the government a Christian privilege and duty.

B. T. J., Glaser, Ala. The evil spirits driven out by Jesus (Mark 1:34), were angered and desired to harm Him who had driven them out. They knew that Christ's time to reveal himself had not yet come, and that he did not want news of his good deeds to be yet noised about (see Mark 1:44). But Christ did not want such unworthy witnesses.

A. W., Landesburg, Pa., writes: "Enclosed find check for $20, to help alleviate the suffering among the Armenian people. If the suffering in the world is due to wickedness—as I believe most now are willing to grant—I feel that your paper might do much to help to overcome evil in this country, if you would urge the government to close down every institution in which liquor in any form is manufactured. Grain is needed for food and fuel for heat, and neither should be wasted. The running of automobiles on Sunday for pleasure is taking many men and women away from our churches, and thus depriving our people of help from the source of all spiritual power. I therefore urge that the government should put a ban on all pleasure-riding on Sunday, first because it takes people from the church, and second because it is a waste of fuel."

Rev. Joseph H. Odell of Troy, N. Y., puts in this communication some very straight talk concerning the duty of the average American at the present time. He writes: "President Wilson cannot win the war alone. Our splendid men in khaki cannot win the war alone. Battleships cannot win it; artillery cannot win it; aircraft cannot win it. If this war for fundamental human rights is to be won, the victory must come through Americans putting one hundred per cent. of their Americanism into the conflict. Money is circulating personality. If my money is wasted, a part of my personality is wasted; if my money is given to charity, I am transferring a part of my personality to other and more needy people. If I hoard my money, I am burying some of my personality. If I put my money into Liberty Bonds, I am building a part of my personality into Democracy. The men who face the foe in France are giving all of their personality for the establishment of Justice and Honor and Truth in the world; they will only succeed if the men and women at home, sheltered and comfortable, put some of their personality into Liberty Bonds."

E. D. G., Interlaken, Mass. Why is it that Christians, or those making such profession, so seldom speak of the coming of Jesus? If they loved him in very truth, would they not delight to speak of his coming? Why do they not obey the injunction "Watch?"

The only answer to this question, which I have seen repeated, is that the Church has discouraged the discussion of prophecy. Many earnest pastors are now convinced that it was a mistake to do this, and are preaching on the prophecies. The Christian Herald, in the articles now being contributed by Dr. Gray and other able writers, is making a thorough presentation of the subject on conservative lines. These articles are the product of trained Christian scholarship, and ought to be read by men and women of all denominations, especially in view of the great changes that are now taking place throughout the world.

C. N. M., Austin, Texas. America had inhabitants probably thousands of years before its discovery by Columbus. There are evidences still remaining of the habitations of races, some of which were partly civilized. Their origin is an unsolved mystery. Your questions on prophecy will be submitted to Dr. Gray.

Mrs. A. F. M., San Bernardino, Calif. The question is a controversial one, which the Mail-Bag could not decide.

H. R., Ottawa, Ill. There are many courses in Bible reading available, which you can procure through a bookseller. No study in the world is so richly repaid. "Searching the Scriptures" gives wisdom and a knowledge of God and his will toward the entire race of men. It shows us the true meaning of life, the right path of duty, and it opens up to us a vision of the life beyond. It gives us a thousand hopes and aspirations which we can get nowhere else. Best of all, it gives us the knowledge of salvation and eternal life through Jesus Christ.

M. M., Bertrand, Neb. As far as can be learned, orange blossoms were first worn at weddings by the ancient Saracens, and they have been worn in Europe ever since the days of the Crusaders. Their general adoption, however, is recent. The Saracens were related to the Arabians and are said to be descended from Sarah, Abraham's wife. The orange blossom was typical of fruitfulness.

A. A. S., Hayward, Minn. Amsterdam, Holland, is noted for its diamond cutting and polishing industry, in which thousands of skilled workers are employed.

L. D., Garnaville, Iowa. In dreams it often happens that the impressions of our waking hours are idealized, and this was apparently your mother's experience. The gleam of a "shooting star," at the time of telling about the dream, was a singular coincidence—nothing more.

Mrs. G. W., Newburgh, Canada, sends us a copy of Frances Ridley's Havergal's poem, "Without Christ," which has a special fitness for these strenuous days, especially the three verses below:

"I could not do without him,
Jesus is more to me
Than all the richest, fairest gifts
Of earth could ever be.
But the more I find him precious
And the more I find him true,
The more I long for you to find
What he can be to you.

"But with him, Oh, with Jesus!—
Are any words so blest?
With Jesus everlasting joy
And everlasting rest!
With Jesus—all the empty heart
Filled with his perfect love!
With Jesus—perfect peace below,
And perfect bliss above!

"Why should you do without him?
It is not yet too late:
He has not closed the day of grace,
He has not shut the gate.
He calls you; hush! He calls you!—
He would not have you go
Another step without him,
Because he loves you so."

The Care of Food in the Home

IS an important part of good housekeeping. Food properly kept means health safeguarded and money saved.

"The Care of Food in the Home" is the title of a 32-page booklet which will be sent free to any reader of the Christian Herald.

This book tells how to prevent mold in food, the forming of ptomaine poisons and the growth of germs; how food should be guarded against flies and dust; how to care for the ice-box; how to store meats, fats and vegetables, milk and groceries; and much other valuable information along this line.

"The Care of Food in the Home" is a booklet of real interest and value to every woman who regards the keeping of a healthy, cheerful home as an occupation worth all the knowledge and study she can bring to it. A free copy will be sent to any reader of the Christian Herald. Send your name and address with a 2-cent stamp for return postage to the Christian Herald Information Bureau, Frederic J. Haskin, Director, Washington, D. C. Ask for "Care of Food in the Home."

The Soldiers' Mail

THE following statement is authorized by Hon. Otto Praeger, Second Assistant Postmaster General:

Parents and relatives of soldiers in France are urged to take into consideration conditions in connection with the mails to the troops abroad, when they receive complaints about delay in delivery of mail. They can rest assured that a soldier who is with his command and not absent on detached duty, or for other causes, will receive his mail in approximately thirty days from the time of the mailing of letters. Instances are innumerable where mail has been received in between fifteen and twenty days, but on the other hand there are a great many cases where soldiers have failed to receive their letters or packages within a period of from two to three months from the time of their mailing.

When mail does not reach a soldier within thirty days from the time of mailing, it is due, sometimes, to a temporary irregularity in the sailings of steamships and transports; it is due, sometimes, to the fact that the military authorities in France, possibly for military reasons, have not promptly advised the Postal Agency of the location of the troops, if they are newly arrived or if they have recently changed their location; it is due, sometimes, to the fact that the soldier has been to the hospital or has been on detached service away from his regiment, and the mail orderlies charged with the readdressing of the mail have been slow to forward the letters to the new address.

There are on file with the Post Office Department 1,080 complaints about the delay of the mail to the boys in France. Of the relatives of soldiers who have thus complained, 237 have already written to the Post Office Department advising that since the complaint their addressees in France are receiving their letters and parcels. The Post Office Department desires to receive the complaints about mail which indicate a delay of more than six weeks, as each complaint is followed into the camps and trenches, where a report is obtained either from the mail orderly or his commanding officer on the cause of the delay. In this manner the Post Office Department has been able to get gratifying results in the movement of the mail both while it is in its custody and after it passes out of its jurisdiction into the hands of the military authorities.

When it is considered that about three million pieces of mail a month go to the soldiers in France and the boys are not located in one compact line but scattered over France, the delays, though unfortunate and sometimes heart-breaking to relatives, are almost negligible in quantity.

One of Our Industrial Allies

THE National Automobile Chamber of Commerce issued a call to the automobile manufacturers of the United States to support the government in its war on autocracy. The result was that 150 manufacturers, at a meeting in Detroit, voted unanimously to turn over the vast facilities of their industry to the government as fast as it can make use of them. The manufacturers are in the meantime keeping their organizations intact so as to be in shape to use all their industrial and financial strength in the government program. They propose to reduce passenger car production as the government may need their facilities for war production. Rather than give munition orders to companies that would have to build new plants, advantage will naturally be taken of the already existing plants, in which an immense amount of work is now being done. Nine manufacturers offered the services of their engineers to work with the committee at Washington during the war. Reports from 27,500 dealers showed their willingness to help win the war by reorganizing themselves in view of the new situation. Over 600 manufacturers in thirty-two states, with a capital of $736,000,000, pay $275,000,000 annually to 280,000 workers, who in the year ending June 30 produced 1,806,194 motor vehicles, worth $917,470,938. Each year $288,000,000 in wages are paid to 320,000 workers, who make automobile bodies, parts and accessories. Last year 18,000,000 tires were made, valued at $450,000,000. The 53,300 dealers and garages in the United States, with $184,000,000 capital, employ 230,000 people.

In the year ended June 30 there were exported 64,834 passenger cars and 15,977 trucks, mostly to the Allies, to a value, including tires and accessories, of $133,411,000. In the United States there are now 4,500,000 automobiles; 400,000 of these are trucks and transport 6,000,000,000 ton-miles of goods in short haul traffic, which would otherwise have to be handled by the railroads.

Consecrating Our Money By REV. J. H. JOWETT

THE Liberty Loan is not merely an investment of our money; it is a consecration of our money to a sacred cause. We shall never feel the constraint to put our money into it until we have a glorious ideal of the liberty we want to defend. If liberty means little or nothing, then we shall hand over our money as it may best serve our own material ends. But if liberty is a tremendous thing—part of our most precious inheritance—we shall willingly lay down our money, not for any pecuniary return, but because of our ambition to retain liberty as one of the cherished possessions of our race.

Happily the passion for freedom is one of the rarest of spiritual flames and it cannot easily be quenched. Again and again militarism has sought to crush it, but it has seemed to share the very life of God. No menace of material strength has ever been able to destroy it. The mightiest force in all history has not been the power of threat, and powder, and sword, but the breath of invincible aspiration for freedom, which is the very breath of God. In all the centuries, men have been willing to defend their freedom with their blood. Many of the men of our own country are ready to make that great sacrifice.

It may be that we shall not all be called upon to lay down our lives in the sacred cause; but surely we shall all be ready to lay down our money! He is a poor patriot who is not ready to bleed for his country! He values his liberty only as a pawn who will not lay his all upon the altar!

I have confidence that the people of America will pour out their substance with unbounded consecration, and will hand down to a succeeding generation the liberty which we have received from our heroic fathers.

Food Rather Than Tobacco

ACCORDING to figures compiled by the Bureau of Crop Estimates, U. S. Department of Agriculture, last year in the United States, 1,446,600 acres of land were used for the production of tobacco. These acres are among the richest in the country, principally in the States of North Carolina, Kentucky, Virginia, Ohio, and Tennessee. It is hardly necessary to estimate the number of bushels of wheat, corn, or potatoes this million and a half acres of rich land would raise, to say nothing of the vast army of workers now employed in tobacco production who would become available for producing food if these acres were so planted. The area planted to tobacco has been increasing for the past three years, the 1917 area exceeding that of 1916 by 33,200 acres, and exceeding that of 1915 by 76,700 acres. Tobacco is not an essential product so far as winning the war is concerned, and its cultivation should be discouraged for the present at least.

When Johnny has the Croup!

That's a cough with a croupy rattle, so hurry for the Musterole and rub it in right over the chest and neck. How it will tingle at first and then grow ever so cool. And how it will reach in and penetrate right to the spot! It will dissipate all that stuffy congestion that causes that hacking cough.

Why shouldn't grandmother swear by Musterole for colds and coughs? It is better than a mustard plaster—good as that was in the old days. And the explanation is this:

Musterole is made of oil of mustard and other home simples. It penetrates under the skin, down to the part. Here it generates its own heat, and this heat disperses the congestion. Yet Musterole will not blister. Musterole, on the contrary, feels delightfully cool a few seconds after you apply it.

Try Musterole for Bobby and Helen and Dorothy's croup—and for your own cough, too. Try it for rheumatism—it's a regular router out of all congestions. Always keep a jar handy.

Many doctors and nurses recommend Musterole. 30c and 60c jars—$2.50 hospital size.

Adventures in Neighboring

A Department for the Exchange of Experiences Between All Who Have High Community Ideals and Are Putting Them Into Practice

Conducted by VERA L. CONNOLLY

WE are gathered today, dear neighbors, in the World Hall of the Christian Herald, for a discussion of club plans.

I cannot tell you how deeply your letters have impressed me; your beautiful, idealistic letters! For they propose a fellowship far nobler and infinitely more delightful than the usual club, with its rules and red tape; they suggest a club without officers or organization, dues or ceremony of any kind—just a great whole-hearted unit of unselfish men, women and children, cooperating in the daily task of making this old world of ours a better one to live in.

That is very crudely described, perhaps. An ideal is hard to define on paper. I think you state it (in your letters) far better than I can. Instead, therefore, of simply echoing you, I think I had better publish the prize letter and all the others we have room for, so that you may have the thrill I had when I first read them:

Suggestions for Our Club

I think we, who have found help from our unpretentious Adventures in Neighboring, can gain more inspiration and spread wider the spirit of neighborliness by banding ourselves into a club. It must be as simple and cosmopolitan as possible: formed not for names on a membership roll, but for deeds accomplished. Its basic principle must be that taught by Jesus in his parable of the Good Samaritan and brought home to his hearers in the question: "Which of these, thinkest thou, proved himself neighbor to him who fell among thieves?" Why may not the aim of our club be to prove ourselves good neighbors to all who need our help, be they far or near, and to spread the gospel of neighborliness; our motto, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself"; our members, all who agree to adopt our aim and motto; our fees, a daily deed of neighborliness; our officers, our conscience as Chief Executive, with Miss Connolly as Chronicler; our pledge, "Believing in the principle of the Universal Neighborhood as taught in Christ's parable of the Good Samaritan, and desiring to prove myself a neighbor to my fellowmen, I hereby pledge myself to daily acts of neighborliness toward any who may need my help?" I can conceive how we might be helped to remember our pledge, and how others might be influenced to join us, by the use of printed slogans such as these: "Who is my neighbor?" "My neighbor wants a lift and I will give it." "Perhaps my neighbor is of my own household." "Prove yourself a neighbor." "The whole wide world a neighborhood." In whatever form it may appear, God bless our club for furthering neighborliness!
MISS HARRIET C. MOORE.

That, dear neighbors, I have chosen as the prize letter, because of its practical idealism, and also because of its adaptability to our needs. From the point of view of a knowledge of organization and parliamentary law, many other letters surpassed it. And these I appreciate sincerely. But the more I thought of it all, and reflected on the opinion (voiced in so many of your letters) that the world was already overburdened with organizations making demands on us all—on our pocket-books and time—the more I became convinced that for us to add another organization to these would be to convert our joyous exchange of experiences into a care and burden.

I DO hope you will all agree with me. I have given weeks of earnest thought to this, for I feel that our homey little club (or big club!) is important. And I want it to be right: for all of us. I want it to be a sheer delight and inspiration—a great unorganized fellowship. As one Missouri neighbor has put it:

Three cheers for Adventures in Neighboring, which so soon has grown into a Community Club, broad and high, with windows raised to let in the sunshine, and doors opened to men as well as women! Our men neighbors need us, and we need them. We each need to hold up our little light and brighten, not only "our corner," but throw the light of kindness far and near so that we may all have a taste of the good works and happy acquaintances possible through our meetings in the Christian Herald World Hall. And may we each be as eager to give, as to receive, some little token of love:

such as a suggestion, experience or "adventure," to cheer and brighten another's heart.
MRS. HELEN WOODS.

Isn't that a jolly and beautiful way of describing our new fellowship? I think it is. Here is a suggestion from a neighbor in Wisconsin:

My plan—for our club—would include every one; and I think the condition for eligibility should be a need, or the heart for another's need. The only dues ought to be a letter to the Neighbors; the constitution and by-laws should consist of the Golden Rule and the command, "Love thy neighbor as thyself." For our motto let us have: "Live in a house by the side of the road, and be a friend to man." Our aims for the coming year might include deeds of loving kindness; overcoming our own faults; war gardens; patriotic work; work for the schools and social centers; baby welfare; food conservation; home cheer; kindness to animals; clean literature.
MRS. JOSEPHINE BAGAN.

Another letter, breathing good cheer and high idealism, is as follows:

In our last issue of the Christian Herald, you were soliciting opinions concerning the founding of small rural clubs under the auspices of your department in the Christian Herald. I will, in view of that invitation, express my ideas on the subject. I live about three miles, out in the country, from any town, and I consider your plan one of the very best you could advance and we sanction. How much good it may ultimately do, time only can tell. Could not each community (that wanted to start a local community club) arrange its own fees, merely receiving a general plan of organization, advice, programs and encouragement from the American Community Club? There are a good many young people, of sixteen years, in my neighborhood, who would enter heartily into such a plan. It would not only give them diversion, but be a source of improvement mentally and morally. We could have music, talks and games. This gathering would bring our young people of all classes together on a social level, interest them in the community, and finally interest their parents. Who can guess at the lasting good that might result?
N. CAROLINA.

THAT is an excellent suggestion, neighbors. I hope this little local Community Club, and others like it, will be started; and if so, it will be our pleasure (as the parent club) to help arrange it, afterwards providing it with programs. Following is the same hope, expressed in another way, by an Ohio neighbor:

Yes, I think a Community Club, with various sub-clubs in villages and farming communities, would be an ideal arrangement. Because of large experience, the Community Club meeting in the World Hall of the Christian Herald could outline programs for the branch meetings, suggesting needs, entertainments, community betterment, etc., and providing a veritable bureau of outlined information. This would create enthusiasm in casting out the "god of work" and placing in his stead that state of human kindness and sociability which makes for the promotion of all that is good and elevating.
L. E. M.

And here is what a Montana neighbor has to suggest:

I think it a splendid idea for us to form ourselves into a club. I know, out here in Montana there are lots of lonely men on homesteads who need just such neighboring. They are too isolated even to attend the Farmers' Meetings. They are too far from church (in more than miles) to attend; and if they can be induced to become readers of the Christian Herald (and many of them are already), I know they would enjoy the club and the Adventures in Neighboring, and be greatly helped. Miss Connolly suggests no "dues or don'ts"; but I think we should have a few do's—"Do try to be neighborly"; "Do cast a beam of sunlight into darkened lives"; and "Do unto others as you would have them do unto you." Here's hoping we may soon have a great meeting of the American Community Club. And, oh joy! I can entertain the club even though I am circumscribed by a small house and lameness!
MRS. I. F. MCC.

Following is another fine comment:

I am very much pleased with the new department in the Christian Herald, Adventures in Neighboring; and I think it should be made into a club: a very broad, all-inclusive "Universal" club, with a circle for our emblem, without dues or don'ts, officers or rules. And it should not exclude W. A. S. because he is a man; but should include all who wish to join and in any way contribute: by offering suggestions or adventures, by asking help or taking an interest. In this way, I think our club (without any organization at all) will become very helpful.

MRS. ELLEN HOLT LIPE.

And don't you think the next is an interesting opinion?

My first thought on reading your suggestion that we organize was that it would be a fine thing to do, and I intended to tell you so. My second and last thought is, that the page just as it is can't be improved. It seems to me there is danger, in these days, of too much organizing. My idea would be to let the page remain just as it is, only allowing the men the same freedom and fellowship as the women. I don't know how it could be any more enjoyable and altogether delightful.
MRS. JOHN N. ROWELL.

I LIKE the frankness and sincerity of that statement; and I agree that there is, indeed, "too much organizing" today. But it did not occur to this writer that we could have our club—all the joy of being united—without becoming a hard-and-fast organization of any sort. It was the winner of our prize letter who saw this most clearly, although nearly all your letters contained the same idea.

Dear Adventurers, we can be a club—The American Community Club! Why not? The only true bond between people is sympathy. Distance cannot lessen that, nor can close proximity always create it. For instance, a highly organized club, full of quarreling, bitter members and factions, is an example of people apparently united but really very far apart.

So long as our hearts are united (the way they are now), does it matter if the one who needs a word of help lives in New York State and the one who furnishes it lives in Idaho or Alabama or Oregon? Not at all! For the time being, those two neighbors are closer together—more truly "neighbors"—than if they lived on the same street and never showed each other any kindness.

SO, fellow Adventurers, let us call ourselves The American Community Club, our headquarters being the Christian Herald World Hall; our members, all those who long to be of service to humanity; our motto, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself"; our emblem, the circle; our meetings, the bimonthly exchange of Adventures in Neighboring we are all taking part in.

This fellowship will require no change in our arrangements. After all, from the very first we have been a great unit. So let us continue as we have begun, with only this difference—that all members shall feel freer than ever before to "neighbor" with each other and also to appeal for suggestions and advice, as to starting a local community club (a branch of our great club), as to what programs to give before clubs already started, or as to how to cope with distressing community problems. We shall, of course, continue to publish our adventures, paying a dollar for each one used.

AND now, before turning to the Neighbor's Forum, I should like to quote the following letter from Virginia, because it expresses so beautifully the homey feeling of being "part" of a club, however simple the club may be:

I do think we neighboring ones would feel more at home if we were a club. I never belonged to a club, but I know how much more at home one feels with those that belong to one church. There is a feeling of relationship that I just can't explain. I think it would be a good idea to allow the men to be a part of it, as men need neighboring as well as women.
MRS. EDITH RUPERT.

This brings us, fellow members, to today's Forum: into which I have

Corn Plasters

Stop Pain Instantly
End Corns Completely

Large package 25c at Druggists
Small package discontinued

How Blue-jay Acts

A is a thin, soft pad which stops the pain by relieving the pressure.
B is the B&B wax, which gently undermines the corn. Usually it takes only 48 hours to end the corn completely.
C is rubber adhesive which sticks without wetting. It wraps around the toe, and makes the plaster snug and comfortable.

Blue-jay is applied in a jiffy. After that, one doesn't feel the corn. The action is gentle, and applied to the corn alone. So the corn disappears without soreness.

This magic spot ends corns

Place it on your throbbing corn to-night. It takes but a second.

Relief will come instantly, because the felt ring relieves all pressure.

The medicated spot of wax soothes while it works.

You will wonder why you waited so long.

Tomorrow your corn will not hurt as it has today.

And within 48 hours the corn will come out easily, painlessly.

Blue-jay is the gentle, certain way, discovered by a great chemist. Blue-jay Plasters are made by Bauer & Black, famed for surgical dressings.

Paring is extremely dangerous and only a makeshift. Infection is possible. Harsh and mussy liquids are disagreeable.

Blue-jay is irresistible to the average corn. Once in a while an old and stubborn corn requires a second treatment.

Tonight prove these truths yourself. It cost so little. Then you will never let a corn hurt again.

At all druggists—25c per package.

The Winning of Barbara Worth

IN this present-day story of desert life and the national reclamation work we have as clean and wholesome a book as a man ever wrote; a story of big things, strong people, and high ideals. The plot, through which there runs an intense love interest, is mighty in its conception and is carried to a satisfactory close with the smoothness of running water. It is one of big incidents and rapid action, and bears a message as broad as humanity itself—The Ministry of Capital.

Their Yesterdays

THIS is the love story of a man and a woman in which there is sentiment, pathos, and realism. This story is told with charm and grace. Its poetic daintiness is especially fine. Its style is unlike the heavy stroke of a sword, but is rather the skillful thrust of a rapier. "Their Yesterdays" exalts life and love, honors the home, and supremely glorifies the wife and mother. A delightfully wholesome book.

Jesus Transfigured

International Sunday School Lesson for April 21. Mark 9: 2-29

The Mount of Vision and the Valley of Service

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph.D.

MARK rightly places the Transfiguration immediately after the Great Confession of Peter, "Thou art the Messiah," omitting any incidents of the intervening week. For not only was the face of Jesus irradiated by new light as he drew nearer the cross, but the disciples themselves looked upon their Master with new and seeing eyes. The one of whom Moses wrote in the Law and whom the prophets promised was present with them!

It happened that, just as the true greatness of their Companion began to dawn upon the Galileans, there also came this mountain-top experience, when the life of Jesus himself touched the high point of exaltation in its earthly history. The glory from within the soul of Christ and the wonder of the awakened disciples combined in an experience which the simple words of Mark do not pretend fully to describe.

The Transfiguration a Glory from Within

It was a spontaneous spiritual experience, not something carefully planned. Jesus had gone up into the mountain to pray and to commune with the Father, seeking the high place as naturally as the psalmist lifted up his eyes unto the hills. He took with him the three who were oftenest the companions of his prayer life. He wrestled with the mighty problem of his rejection and the seeming failure of the cross, which the horror of the disciples had brought clearly before him as a stumbling-block to them and others. More clearly than ever, he saw that there was no other way, and he gave himself wholly in sacrifice. The glory of his spirit shone forth with a light of unearthly radiance as his high purpose and holy dedication was renewed. The face of Moses shone when he descended from Sinai, though he knew it not. When Stephen was brought before the Sanhedrin (Acts 6) to make his defense, "all that sat in the council saw his face as it had been the face of an angel." Yes, we have many of us seen transfigured faces. The transfiguration of Christ was the supreme example of the inner glory of the consecrated soul, with an infinitely greater radiance. It was Divinity shining through the veil of humanity.

A Preparation for the Ordeal to Come

To Jesus, this wondrous event was only preparatory to the testing time before him. His spirit was confirmed in its assurance that the way he was going was the appointed way. He was strengthened by the fellowship which he had with Moses and Elijah, representatives of the great company of God's ambassadors who had placed their all upon the altar, and had given themselves for the unappreciative multitudes. Here he overcame the human shrinking from death which he shared with us all. Henceforth it was to be not a catastrophe but an incident, "an exodus" as Luke calls it, implying the entrance into another and superior phase of experience. He had definitely accepted the cross, and thereafter it could not take him by surprise. The approval of his Father rang through his being, and all was well.

Its Significance to the Twelve

Scarcely less epochal was the transfiguration scene to the little group of loyal followers. Only they could not accept its message as final in the way Jesus did. Again and again they show a hope for earthly triumph—for some other way than the way of the cross. But never again could they fairly say that they had not been forewarned of the cost of Messiahship. The future colloquies with Jesus were interspersed with inquiries as to how his task could be successful, when he himself must suffer.

Besides, they never after put Jesus into the category of ordinary men, to be disputed with and threatened, as Peter had attempted at Cesarea with his new-found Christ. They knew him now for a man far above the reach of their little minds. The same God who had commissioned Moses, now pointed to this new Teacher, saying, "Hear ye him." They began to treasure up his words for the guidance of the future.

Then, too, they were heartened against the natural difficulties of the days to come, for the glory of this hour could never die. After a week in which they had tried in vain to escape from Jesus' prophecy of his death, they had this reassuring vision of God's approval and blessing upon the course which the Messiah had mapped out for himself. They still must walk by faith, but faith had received new heart and confidence in a high moment of spiritual insight. The brilliant hours of light help us to press on when all grows dark around us. Our exalted experiences of worship in the sanctuary help us to hold steadfast during the daily grind. The times of high revival create reserves of strength upon which we can draw when the evil day is upon us.

For the man who has caught one glimpse of the transfigured Christ there can never again come a darkness so black that hope will completely die. Not only so, but John was reaching after a great principle when he said that "we shall be like him when we see him as he is."

The Secret of Christian Transformation

Who shall fathom the complete secret of the transforming power of Christ? It is a realm where unseen forces play, and there is much of mystery. But the disciple is not greater than his Lord, and we can see at work in the soul of Jesus some of the influences that partly account for the changed countenance and glorified body.

These things happened "as he was praying," Luke tells us. Prayer does change things, and among the things it most noticeably changes are faces. Indeed, there is a picture called "Praying Hands," where actually the every detail of finger, palm and wrist is instinct with some mystic quality of devotion. But the face of a man who really becomes a man of prayer will manifest the fact. Martha Tarbell quotes the instance of a young missionary in China who was called by the natives "Mr. Gloryface" because the light of God shone through his countenance. Paul speaks of our seeing "the light of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ," and so we do. But the world that knows him not must see that light of God in the faces of his transformed followers. The world will not see this except we are in communion with our Father by prayer, as Jesus was.

Another factor in this scene on the mount was Christ's communion with the leaders of the past. He had fellowship with the noble spirits who in other days had walked the hard path of sacrifice. He realized that he was not alone in his mission; Moses and Elijah reached out from the eternities to urge him on. His work was a part of the great maturing purpose of the Almighty, and linked with the past and the future. Though he seemed alone, he was not really alone.

The appearance of Israel's lawgiver and her fearless prophet in this story is somewhat paralleled by a fact I have noticed in our nation today, namely, that in the camps and at all public ceremonies the names of Washington and Lincoln are on every tongue. Our boys going forth to their sacrifice on the altar of freedom are only carrying on the spirit of the founders of the Republic. Thousands of them are being transformed by this fellowship, partly realized and largely unconscious, with the heroic past. They walk with a surer tread, though the road is harder and more dangerous than any they ever trod before.

And this is ever true in the Church of Christ. We are transformed because we have fellowship with St. Paul so here is an antiseptic germicide and liniment—one that is healing, cooling and soothing—Absorbine, Jr. is more than a germicide, more than a liniment—it is both. It means prompt relief from aches and pains—it keeps little cuts and bruises from becoming something more serious.

Absorbine, Jr. THE ANTISEPTIC LINIMENT is especially good for children's hurts because it is so harmless and safe to use—made of pure herbs and positively non-poisonous.

It is needed daily in and about the home—for the numerous little hurts that come through work in the kitchen and about the house, the stable, the garage and the grounds. Use and prescribe Absorbine, Jr., wherever a high-grade liniment or germicide is indicated.

To reduce inflammatory conditions—sprains, wrenches, painful, swollen veins or glands.

To reduce bursal enlargements and infiltrations—wens, weeping sinews. Absorbine, Jr., is a discutient and resolvent.

To allay pain anywhere—its anodyne effect is prompt and permanent.

To spray the throat if sore or infected—a 10% solution of Absorbine, Jr., is healing and soothing and will destroy bacteria.

To heal cuts, bruises, lacerations, sores, and ulcers.

Absorbine, Jr., is powerfully efficient and very economical—only a few drops are required at an application.

often, because we have come to be well acquainted with St. John. And inevitably the men and women who have felt most keenly the call to enter the "glorious company of the apostles" and the "whole army of the martyrs," have changed most completely into their likeness. Who can say how many missionaries have remembered that Paul was in prison and sang songs with Silas in the night? How many, think you, there are in the Church who have remembered that the psalmist "was brought low and He helped me?" How many have become leaders because Judson and Livingstone beckoned them on!

Exaltation No Bar to Service

After the Mount of Vision came the Valley of Service. From communion with Moses and Elijah and with the Father who sent them, Jesus descended the hillsides with his perplexed and troubled companions of every day and found in the village below the sick boy, the agonized father and the defeated group who had tried to help. It was the old, common scene once more—man's suffering and yearning and need and faithlessness. But Jesus instantly recognized its claim upon his love. The exaltation of a short time before was no bar to humblest ministry; indeed, it was for the compassionate Christ the surest preparation for service. His experience of glory did not separate him from human need, but gave him rather the power to meet it successfully.

So shall it be with us. The man who has the loftiest view of God will bow to the lowliest and hardest duty. The soldier who enlists with a thrill of dedication to the cause of humanity, will plod on through the dreariest marches and willingly accept tedious fatigues. The young minister who sees Jesus only as he accepts the ordination of the Church, will accept the village opportunity and preach to rustics because God calls there. The Christian will rejoice to climb the Mount, and he will also rejoice to descend into the Valley and, bearing another's burdens, so fulfill the law of Christ.

Rhythms in the Spiritual Life

This chapter helps us lest we be discouraged by the alternations of our own experience, with its lights and shadows, thrills and dull monotonies. For even Jesus did not always live on the heights. There were times when "he rejoiced in spirit"; but there were also times when "he groaned in spirit." So it is with every one who follows him. That is why we need the renewal of the Sabbath and the place of prayer; that is why we ought to keep a tryst with him. They that wait upon the Lord do not experience an untroubled calm. They have storms and stresses, and oftentimes grow weary; but their secret is that they renew their strength. At times when we feel that we have grown weak, Jesus comes and takes us with him up into a high mountain apart. Then, like Paul, we say, "In him that strengthens me, I am able for anything."

Bible Picture Contest Echoes from Maine to California

HOW personally beneficial the plan to fit Scripture texts to Bible pictures has proved in former Christian Herald Contests is shown in recent letters from all over the country. Many of those who have taken part in these past efforts have entered the new National Bible Picture Study Plan with enthusiasm. The fact that the Uniform Lessons, Bible Home Readings and Golden Texts form the basis of this new Contest makes it especially interesting to Sunday school workers.

Read what these enthusiasts say:

From California: "I found your Bible Picture Study both a game and a study. As a game it was one of the most interesting I have ever known. As an instructive study perhaps the greatest good it did me was to awaken in me an appreciation of the beauty of Bible literature. Although I had a fair knowledge of the Bible from the religious and historical side, I had not thought of it much as literature. But as I repeatedly studied the verses I gradually came to see that I was studying literature of the finest kind. This revelation, with all that it means, seems a priceless reward for a few spare hours of study."

A New York lady writes: "I have enjoyed the study and recreation very much, and I wouldn't willingly part with my increased knowledge and enjoyment of the Bible for any money. One family to whom I commended this last Contest (and whose father lay very ill at the time and has since died) said, 'It has been such a comfort to us in our sorrow.' And the poor sick father, too, as long as he could, helped them fit the verses to the pictures, and when he could no longer do that, he enjoyed the reading of the verses to him."

From Alabama comes this: "The Bible Picture Study has stimulated my Bible-reading, and the most eagerly looked for and the most thoroughly enjoyed hour of the day is the one devoted to the Contest study."

A Kentucky lady says: "I hardly know which benefited me most, the Picture Contest or the post-graduate course I have just completed under the Sunday School Board. I hope you will keep up the Contests. I am saving pictures for my little girls, who are too little to notice them much now. I think it will be fine mental exercise for children. I used to teach, and I would have been so glad to have had something like that for Friday afternoons, when children are tired of regular routine work."

A mother from South Dakota: "I am now a student in the Department of the Moody Bible Institute as the result of those Bible Picture Contests, which I have enjoyed so much. Although in poor health myself and the mother of a family of four splendid children whom I am keeping in school, yet I enjoy these Bible Picture Studies, on which I spend my time when I am resting, and when I am not able to work."

And from Maine: "I am in the Third Contest, not for what I may get financially alone, but for the insight I am longing to get in the Bible, which I can get in this way much more quickly by aid of the pictures than by study alone."

On another page of the Christian Herald will be found details of the National Bible Picture Contest now running.

The World's Greatest Y. M. C. A.

MORE than a million men entered the doors of West Side Y. M. C. A., 318 West Fifty-seventh Street, New York City, during 1917, many in khaki or blue, the uniform being their admission card. Membership grew to 8,049, increase 191, and the branch is still the largest in the world, despite enlistment and the draft, and the number called for Y. M. C. A., Red Cross, or other service. West Side's nearest competitor is Boston Central, about 7,600. There is a salaried force of 237 and 2,866 committeemen; in educational classes were 5,215 students, with 68 teachers and 148,491 attendance; of the students nearly 2,500 were graduated from the automobile school. A new departure was the establishment of an Airplane Mechanic's School. The employment department received 3,898 applications, of whom 3,123 were placed with the 8,824 employers seeking help. In this, West Side branch is fourth in the country. Detroit leads. Under the religious department were held 871 meetings in the building, 1,120 class sessions, 1,531 shop meetings, grand total 4,004 meetings and classes. In shop meetings Adams Avenue branch, Detroit, leads America, having the big auto factories in its district. The library has 44,454 volumes and 191 periodicals on file. The branch has attracted the attention of magazine and special writers and has become in many ways a national institution. West Side branch has come to be one of the "sights" of the metropolis.

Success with Ferns

Are your plants, vines and shrubbery doing well? Have you had success with your flowers or do they look sickly and thriftless? Do you realize that "scraggly" plants are worse than no plants at all? The difference between weak, thriftless, off-colored plants, and healthy, luxuriant, rich colored flowers and foliage, is the difference between success and failure. If your plants are not doing well, chances are they need food. They are being starved and are an eyesore and a source of annoyance rather than pleasure, but don't throw them away; use

Red Snapper Plant Food

RED SNAPPER PLANT FOOD is a wonderfully rich, very nutritious, yet harmless fertilizer for plants of this kind. Its effect can be noticed within a few days after the first application. Color of foliage becomes a darker green and flowers and blossoms take on a beauty of coloring and size beyond all expectations. The wonder and admiration of all who see them. It is made from the head bones and nitrogenous cartilage of the South American Red Snapper fish, dried under intense heat, mixed with other organic plant foods to make a perfectly balanced ration, then ground and heated in flour mill machinery into a fine meal. It is thoroughly sterilized, clean and sanitary, to be used in the finest homes and conservatories as well as for outside use. Put up in 2 lb. cans (including an 8 oz. package of RED SNAPPER Plant Food which is used to give the plants quick start. Price 50c. Also put up in 12 1/2 lb. sacks. Price $1.50. Florists, Grocers and Druggists sell RED SNAPPER Plant Food. Ask your dealer. If he does not keep it, send 25 cents for trial package and we will also include our flower booklet entitled "HOUSE PLANTS AND FLOWER GARDENS—Their Care and Culture."

"United We Stand—Divided We Fall"

The Unfair Second Class Postage Law Threatens Sectionalism of Thought and Feeling

IF you would like to perform an act of real service to your country, at a cost of just three cents to yourself, read this little article through. And then take your pen in hand and write.

The magazines that come to your home every week or month are facing a very unpleasant necessity, through the action of Congress at the last session.

The necessity is this: Either they must stop coming to your home, or they must cost more postage for every copy.

Moreover—and here is the unjust feature of the law—they must cost more in proportion as you live farther from the place of publication. The postage increases run from 50 to 900 per cent.

As most of the magazines are published in New York, this means that all who live in the Middle West or the Far West or the South are penalized by Congress under this law.

The new law will divide our country into sections separated by barriers of dollars and cents; barriers in a country where unity of thought and feeling has been considered vitally necessary ever since the days of the Pilgrim Fathers.

This is the most pernicious feature of the new law. Postage on periodicals should be the same for all parts of the United States, just as it has always been and just as it is for letters.

This 50 to 900 per cent. postage increase on magazines is not a war tax. Publishers were already taxed by excess profits and income taxes. It is not a war tax; Postmaster-General Burleson has so stated in his annual report when he declared it is permanent postal legislation—unless repealed through your protests to Senators and Congressmen. Will you write, telegraph, or urge the passage of resolutions of protest against this destructive law?

WHEN this country was very young, Congress decided that magazines and newspapers should be carried through the mails at a flat rate of one cent a pound, regardless of the distance. The argument was that a big country like this needed all possible freedom of intercommunication to bind it together. The more a man in the East wrote to his friends in the West, the more interchange of information there was between North and South, whether by letter or through the printed page, the better solidified country we would have. So Congress argued in the early days. And it decided that every United States citizen, whether he lived in the city or the country, whether on the Atlantic coast, or along the Mississippi, or on the Pacific, should have his letters delivered to him, and his magazines, at a fixed flat rate.

This system has worked pretty well in this country. Never before in the history of the world have a hundred million people, stretched out over so vast a territory, been held together as a unit. Always, elsewhere, there have been different dialects and customs and ideas. But we Americans have no dialects; we have no geographical divisions of customs or interests. We are one people. And to the national magazines belongs much credit for this phenomenon.

The business man in New Orleans who gets a good idea passes it on through his trade paper, and the business man in St. Paul and Philadelphia and Spokane adopts it. And everywhere you find men speaking the same business language and following the same business methods. The farmer in Maine who discovers how to increase the productiveness of his soil sends out the good news through his farm paper, and a million other farmers read and welcome it.

Under the zone system all this would be changed. The man of the East would be an alien in thought and interest to the man of the West. The great majority of magazines will continue to be issued in New York, and under this act of Congress every man or woman who lives at a distance from New York will be penalized on that account—the penalty growing larger the farther West and South he or she may live.

TWICE Congress has appointed commissions to investigate the zone idea. Both commissions reported unanimously against a zone system. The last commission, headed by Justice Charles E. Hughes, said:

"It would seem to the commission to be entirely inpracticable to attempt to establish a system of zone rates for second-class matter."

The zone system of postage in effect inflicts a punishment upon you for living in the South or West. If you claim that there is no reason for you to be punished—that living in the South or West is no crime—then you agree with the position which the periodical publishers upheld before Congress.

But the publishers were not strong enough to influence Congress. If you are to be protected from this injustice, you will have to take the matter up personally with your Senator and Congressman. Congress does not care much for any publisher or group of publishers; it cares a great deal for your vote.

At a critical time like this we want to bind our country together stronger than ever in sentiment and purpose. Anything that tends to divide, sectionalize, or create differences of thought is pernicious. This is precisely what the Zone System will do if not repealed.

You must not forget that the Zone System for mailing magazines is already a law, although it does not go into effect until July 1. We must fight vigorously, day and night, to have this unjust imposition set aside before July 1, if we can. We are doing our part. We are leaving no stone unturned, but, without your cooperation, our efforts can accomplish next to nothing.

Canada has been at war since 1914. This

A Letter from You Will Help a Lot

IF you believe it is unfair to lay a penalty upon people because they live at a distance from New York, why not assert that belief where it will do good?

If you believe in the right of every citizen to have his mail delivered at the same rate, why not say so in a way that will be effective?

If you believe that no sections should be discriminated against in the cost of their reading matter, why not use your influence?

Write to your Congressman and one or both Senators.

Do this now for your own sake and for the sake of keeping the national periodicals really national and keeping the nation solidified.

Your Postmaster will give you the names of your Congressmen and Senators. Simply write to them that you believe the zone system of second-class postage is wrong in principle and will be unjust in practice, and that Congress ought to reconsider the matter.

WE URGE YOU TO DO IT WITHOUT DELAY.
The Christian Herald.

is an object lesson for us. The area of Canada is actually greater than the United States. The population of Canada, however, is considerably less. Canada, all told, has less than eight million people; the United States has over one hundred million. You would naturally think that, with her small population, the second-class postal charges would be much higher in Canada than with us. They are less. Think of it! The postal charges for mailing magazines and newspapers in Canada is just one-fourth cent per pound. One-fourth cent, mind you. This is exactly one-fourth our present rate. And even with the one-fourth cent rate, Canada makes a profit on her Postal Department.

Is the Postal Department of the United States losing so much money that such a tremendous increase in postal charges on second-class matter is a necessity? No! A thousand times, no! The Postal Department of the United States in 1917, made a profit of over $9,000,000. It is not an institution run for profit. It is a public service—run for the people. Even after paying out $50,000,000 for Rural Free Delivery, the Post-Office Department made $9,000,000 in 1917.

THE publishing business is the only business in the country that is voluntarily and enormously contributing to the aid of the Government without any charge whatever. Not only the Christian Herald but many other periodicals offered to the Government all their profits during the war. This offer was declined, but the Government is constantly being donated unlimited space by hundreds of periodicals which in the aggregate is of almost incalculable cash value. The manufacturers of steel, munitions, ships, clothing and of every other sort of needed supplies sell their products to the Government, and are deemed patriotic in merely increasing their output and their own profits. The periodicals' great salable commodity is space, and this to the value of billions of dollars is being freely and gladly given to the Government without thought of price. Uncle Sam comes to the editor and says—"You have a tremendous circulation—please help us get the truth before the nation." All right. So the Liberty Loan people write to the editor and ask him to help sell their bonds—and he does. The food administrator asks the editor to help get the truth about food to the people—and the editor does. The fuel administrator asks the editor to help educate the people about coal—and the editor does. And the War Savings Stamp people ask the editor to speak up for them—and the editor does. And the periodical publisher's only regret is that he has not wider circulation and still more extended service to give to the Government, free of charge.

PROFESSOR J. W. LINN of Chicago University makes a remarkably clear statement of the case in the interest of public education. "What I would like to do," says Professor Linn, "is to point out the result on the nation if you increase the price and limit the circulation of newspapers and magazines.

"You shut off the farm journals, as these proposed zone rates would shut them off," says Prof. Linn, "and you decrease the productive power of this country by millions of dollars. You shut off the trade journals, and you decrease the manufacturing power of this country by many more millions. You shut off such a journal as the Christian Herald, and you shut off an agency that has raised over four million dollars for charitable and religious organizations in ten years, and that in so doing has enormously increased the interest of people in giving, which is one of the things that a democracy absolutely has to learn the value of. . .

"You know what would happen—you know that the prices to subscribers would rise, and circulation would narrow—and just who would lose out? Why, just exactly the people who must have the reading habit if this is going to be a democratic nation—the small-town people, the country people. These publications are printed in big cities; the first zone, the cheapest zone, would be in and near those cities. That means you have shut off education just where it is needed. The cities will read anyway; there are many educational opportunities in the cities anyway; but the small towns and the rural districts depend to a large extent on newspapers and magazines.

"You shut out those boys and girls, those men and women, from the reading habit. You shut them out from the freest possible circulation of ideas, just at the time when the freest possible circulation is most essential.

"I say as a college teacher, a man who has been in the educational profession almost a generation, that in my judgment you could hardly stab nearer the heart of the nation than by stabbing at the country circulation of newspapers and magazines.

"Yet that is exactly where this increase in second-class postal rates, this Zone System, is directing the knife!"

THE postal section of the War Revenue Bill was defeated in the United States Senate, and yet, in spite of the Senate, it became a law. How did this strange event happen? It came about because a small group of politicians threatened to delay the passage of the entire War Revenue Bill unless the section referring to an increase in second-class postage was retained. A more unjust piece of legislation directed at one single industry and forced in a more unfair way, has never been passed by the Congress of the United States.

Most Miles per Dollar for You Serves All

YOUR car, used on a thrifty basis, is helping the national cause while serving you. Keep it going to save time and prevent traffic congestion. And keep it on Firestone Cord Tires to save money.

Economy standards of today were anticipated in the building of Firestone Cord Tires. Their construction provides for far longer mileage at less cost per mile; more miles per gallon of gasoline; fewer delays because fewer tire troubles; less upkeep expense on car because of added resilience; greater safety because of easy, positive steering.

There are engineering reasons for all of these advantages. The tire body of surpassing strength is built of thousands of stout cords, each cord insulated with pure rubber. No two cords can touch to cause friction. Remember that—no two cords can touch to cause friction. Hence less internal heat to weaken the tire. Also greater resilience to absorb road impact, therefore less chance of internal injury.

Superior cushion stock, breaker strip and tread are other reasons. A reinforced bead, fixing the "hinge" or bending action at the widest point where it has least effect is still another reason.

Investigate. Most Miles per Dollar means more to you—to all of us, now than ever. Your dealer will supply you with Firestones.

CHRONICLE HAD BEEN WRECKED and a fire, started in the office of the City Registrar, had destroyed a large number of exemption records. On April 1 Quebec was practically under martial law.

EAT MEAT. The Food Administration on March 29 suspended for 30 days the order establishing "meatless" days. This was due in part to considerable movements of animals to market and in part to the desire to save wheat. Deputy Food Administrators were ordered to seize hoarded wheat in case farmers refused to market surplus stocks to their hands.

THE WAR IN THE EAST. The British have advanced steadily during the last week, both in Mesopotamia and in Palestine. On March 26, the British struck a blow 22 miles northwest of Hit, in Mesopotamia, which resulted in the capture or destruction of almost the entire Turkish force in that area. While the infantry attacked the Turkish positions, the British cavalry executed a wide turning movement which blocked the enemy's retreat; 3,000 prisoners, a divisional commander, 200 other officers, one German officer and a few German non-commissioned officers, 10 guns, 2,000 rifles and 600 animals were captured. The British troops pursuing the remaining fugitives had advanced 45 miles northwest of Hit on March 28.

In Palestine the British at the end of the week were at Essalt, 35 miles north of Jerusalem, and still advancing. British troops had crossed the Jordan, where on March 28 they were converging in the town of Amman, on the Hedjaz Railway. On the following day the railway was reached and cut.

KRUPP MADE THE GUN. The Kaiser on March 27 publicly thanked the Krupps and their co-workers "for this achievement of German science and labor," meaning the gun that had been bombarding Paris for a week at a range of over 70 miles. It has been established that the gun is a rifle of about 9-inch caliber and that the shell weighs about 200 pounds and carries about twenty pounds of explosive. The shells had done little damage, until Good Friday, when one of them struck a church full of people at prayer, killing 54 and wounding 90. The French port of Dunkirk has also been under bombardment by long range guns.

MORE SHIPS SUNK. The loss by mine and submarine of British ships in the week ending March 27 rose to a total of 28, sixteen of over 1,600 tons and twelve under that figure. One fishing vessel was lost. The Italians lost three steamers of over 1,500 tons and five small sailing vessels. The French lost one steamer of over 1,600 tons and five under that tonnage.

AMERICAN GUNS BUSY. There has been active artillery work during the week in the American sectors near Toul and Lunéville. The American guns were reported, on March 26, to have leveled the enemy's trenches and to have smashed his dugouts in the neighborhood of Richecourt, forcing "Fritz" to give up the village. Sniping has been active, with the American sharpshooters holding the advantage, and American patrols have continued to dominate "No Man's Land." The total casualties reported by General Pershing for the week ending March 31 were: Killed in action, 16; killed by accident, 11; died of disease, 58; died of wounds, 9; wounded, 110; missing, 4.

An American patrol of five men on March 29 captured a German outpost of six men. Two Germans were killed, the other four were brought into the American lines, fed up and questioned. They gave much valuable information and one was so enthusiastic over his treatment by the Americans that he wanted to go back for his brother.

FROM RUSSIA TO ITALY. Italian official dispatches of March 28 reported that forty new Austrian divisions, almost half a million men, had been distributed along the Italian front. The troops had been transferred from the Russian and Rumanian fronts. Italian guns were harassing the enemy and Italian patrols and advanced posts were in touch with his patrols. No British or French troops were withdrawn from the Italian front to meet the great German thrust in the west.

FRAGMENTS OF NEWS. It was reported, on March 25, that the Dutch cabinet had decided to refuse the grain offered by Great Britain and the United States in exchange for the seized Dutch ships. . . . The United States Food Administration has announced that the schedule of guaranteed prices for wheat extends to June 1, 1919, regardless of the end of the war, and will apply to all wheat harvested in the United States throughout 1918. . . . Citizens of all faiths and nationalities united with the Knights of Columbus in the diocese of New York in raising a fund of $2,500,000 for the Knights of Columbus work in the camps for Catholic soldiers. The drive ended with $4,000,000 subscribed.

. . . The Standard Oil Company of New Jersey, on March 25, announced a new plan to govern the relations of the company with its employees through a system of conferences at regular intervals between the officials of the company and the elected representatives of the workers. . . . Explosion of chemicals in a storage warehouse at Jersey City, on March 26, resulted in a fire which destroyed the warehouse and the adjoining shops of the Erie Railroad, damaging or destroying twenty locomotives and a large number of freight cars, the damage being estimated at over a million and a half dollars. . . . The agreement was consummated with Japan on March 28 for the exchange of ships for steel. America is to receive twelve ships of 100,000 tons dead weight capacity May 1, and about 200,000 additional tons later.

ALLIES HELP RUSSIA. Moscow dispatches of March 30 told of assistance being rendered by British and French officers in the training of the new Bolshevik army. British marines and French soldiers are also assisting the Russian troops in resisting the advance of the Finnish White Guards. Captain Webster of the American Red Cross and Captain Hicks of the British army, appointed to investigate, reported that the rumors of the arming of German and Austrian prisoners and the consequent threat to the Trans-Siberian Railway, were greatly exaggerated. A few deserters from the Teuton armies had joined the Bolsheviks, received arms and cooperated in the action against General Semenov.

Viscount Motono, Japan's Minister of Foreign affairs, said in a speech to the Diet on March 26: "If Japan's interest in Siberia is threatened, the government will be bound to take prompt and appropriate measures. But even in that case Japan would not fight against Russia. Our empire will certainly never imitate Germany in aggression."

NATION MAY TAKE PACKING HOUSES. President Wilson on March 31 appointed a commission to investigate the meat industry of the country and report to him. The commission includes the Secretary of Agriculture, the chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, the chairman of the Federal Tariff Board, the Secretary of Labor, and the Food Administrator. According to Mr. Hoover the nation faces the alternative of abandoning entirely direction of war purchases and conservation measures, because they affect prices, the continuance of the present national policy, or action by the government to stabilize prices. The first, would stimulate profiteering and speculation, the second would be ineffective and the third would involve the government in some additional financial responsibility, but would protect the poor from involuntary conservation due to prices they can't pay.

over the concrete road—so even that children can roller skate upon it, so strong that heavy trucks at high speed cannot break it, so enduring that years of motor traffic cause no appreciable wear, unaffected by moisture, heat, cold or frost, maintained at very low annual expense. Concrete Roads pay for themselves in a few years.

Concrete roads built this summer will help feed the cities next winter, regardless of what rail service may be. They will help keep our war industries going at full speed; they will add permanently to the wealth of the Nation—war or peace.

CONCRETE FOR PERMANENCE

the number of divisions withdrawn from the fighting, and on the stories of prisoners regarding losses in their units, placed the German losses at not less than 300,000 and above that as high as 500,000.

THE eighth day of the big battle in Picardy saw the Allied lines standing practically unbroken against the continuing, but in most quarters weakening, assaults of the enemy. The German thrust on the sixth day toward Montdidier was not stopped until the French reached the heights west of the town, which, with Pierrepont four miles north, remained in German hands. All the efforts of the enemy on the seventh and eighth days to widen or deepen this salient failed completely against the French resistance, his only advance being thrust back by French bayonets which also reconquered three small villages north of Montdidier. On the south side of the Somme the Germans forced the British back slightly by crossing in force from Chipilly. From the Somme northward to the neighborhood of Arras the British line held completely, although there were minor attacks near Buequoy, Ablainville (which had been retaken by the British), Boyelles, Puisieux, and at Dernancourt which the enemy entered only to be driven out again.

The most desperate action of the day occurred east of Arras, where the Germans, attacking with six divisions, some 70,000 men, overran the outpost positions of the British defenses, but were held firmly in the British battle positions. At 5:50 A. M. the enemy sent a whirlwind of artillery fire into and behind the British positions on both sides of the Scarpe along a front of seven or eight miles, the immediate objectives being two heights separated by the stream, Orange Hill and Telegraph Hill.

At the other end of the battle-line the French turned from the defensive to the offense and drove into the German lines between Noyon and Lassigny, making a gain, over a front of more than six miles, to a depth of a mile and a quarter and retaking three villages. It was expected that the British would drive in on the opposite flank of the German salient, moving south from Arras. The Allies were said to have a mobile reserve of 800,000 of their best troops ready for the counter-offensive through which they expected to turn the Kaiser's momentary victory into permanent defeat. The German attack at Arras may have been intended both to render their own position more secure and to forestall the expected British attack on their flank.

Paris dispatches told of great service rendered by the American Red Cross to the thousands of refugees from the reinvaded district who flowed backward in a steady stream from the battle-lines. Working in close co-operation with the French Red Cross the Americans furnished transportation, lodgings, and hot meals to the refugees, their work according to the correspondent being spoken of "in terms nearly of reverence."

THE ninth day of battle was more important for what it promised in regard to Allied action against the German attack than for the variation of front resulting from the continued pressure of the enemy.

Although predicted and expected, although supported by the insistence of President Wilson and the agreement of Premiers Lloyd George and Clemenceau, absolute unity of command was not achieved until the appointment, officially confirmed on March 27, of General Ferdinand Foch, French master strategist, as commander in chief of all the Allied armies. Under him the British, Belgian, French, Portuguese and American armies will be a single sword, which will carve its way to victory and doom Germany to defeat. General Pershing enthusiastically placed himself and all of America's resources at General Foch's command, wiring to Washington: "Have made all our resources available, and our divisions will be used if and when needed. French are in fine spirits, and both armies seem confident."

The Germans did not repeat, on the 29th, their attacks of the previous day east of Arras. Those attacks resulted in a bloody repulse. The German objective was Arras and Vimy Ridge. They overran the British outpost positions and were stopped at the battle positions. Southeast of Telegraph Hill they occupied the village of Neuville-Vitasse and they gained a slight footing on Orange Hill. The attack westward toward Arras was made by six German divisions with four in reserve, while the attack southeast of Arras engaged eleven divisions.

South of the Somme, between the Somme and the Avre, the Germans concentrated superior masses against the Allied salient north of Montdidier, which they succeeded in flattening out, the Franco-British forces, after sanguinary fighting, falling back to a line running east of the villages of Hamel, Marcelet only 12 miles from Amiens, Mezieres, and Neuville-sur-Bernard, to the line of the Avre near Pierrepont. All attempts of the Germans to drive farther west from Montdidier were repulsed and the French drove the enemy back southwest of Montdidier, retaking the village of Montchel.

THE tenth day of furious battle found the Germans again pushing hard toward Arras, this time from the south-east in the regions of the villages of Boiry and Boyelles. Although pressing the assault with considerable strength and with fresh troops the enemy was repulsed everywhere.

From Arras southward to the Somme there was considerable fighting but no changes of position. South of the Somme the Germans delivered their biggest assault of the day, engaging the French from Moreuil, northwest of Montdidier, around the apex of the salient to east of Lassigny, a total front of about twenty-five miles, and engaging the British to the north of this half way to the Somme. Mezieres was first taken by the German troops which pressed forward two miles further north-west to Demuin, where the British held, and counter-attacked retaking the village and pressing on toward Mezieres. To the southward the Germans succeeded in advancing the apex of the salient nearly two miles at one point, taking from the French the villages of Anbwillers, Grivesnes, Cantigny, Mesnil-St. Georges, Montchel and Ayencourt. Here the enemy was again held.

THE eleventh day of fighting, Easter Sunday, was the Allies' day. Although the Germans were still attacking, pressing forward in full strength south of the Somme and making minor attacks elsewhere, they made no appreciable gains anywhere and were thrown back at crucial points. East of Arras the British retook Feuchy and advanced their line on both sides of this village, northwest of Montdidier. British and French troops retook, lost, and again recaptured Moreuil and the wooded heights to the north of it. Between Moreuil and the Somme in the valley of the Luce the Germans at first gained slightly but were later thrown back. South of Moreuil between it and Lassigny the French drove forward against intense German pressure retaking the villages of Ayencourt and Montchel, capturing several hundred Germans and completely defeating and foiling the enemy. (The advance of the Germans on the tenth day had put them within five miles of the Amiens-Paris railway.)

The French promptly accepted General Pershing's offer of American troops and on March 31 the roads leading from the American training camps to the battle-front were full of American motor lorries and horse-drawn equipment interspersed with solid columns of marching men, all slipping and splashing through ankle-deep mud under a pouring rain, but the men happy at the thought of active work and singing "everything from 'The Battle Hymn of the Republic' to 'Tipperary'."

dollar to reach the camp and the loved one.

Worried and helpless soldiers report to the Hostess Houses tragic situations of women too plucky to complain. A woman whose husband had gone to France remained at her boarding house on the outskirts of one camp because she couldn't pay her board. Her overdue Government allowance did not come. She couldn't leave and she couldn't stay. Her husband had gone supposing that she was provided for. He had, she said, troubles enough of his own.

A Western camp has in adjacent towns dozens of girls whose husbands have been sent to France. Two or three girls are living together in one room, sometimes in destitute condition. They are courageous girls who would never think of asking for help, yet they are too inexperienced to know what to do.

Women translators are sent by the Y. W. C. A. into encampments where are gathered our foreign-tongued citizens from the mining districts and the industrial centers. The translators found in one camp two companies of Slavs who could speak no English, could write no letters home and had never heard of "exemptions" or "separation allowances." Eighty of them had large families of small children.

Syrians, Croats, Slovaks, Hungarians, Ruthenians, Bohemians, Italians, Poles and Lithuanians are good enough to be in our army. By that same token, it's up to us to see that they understand and utilize all governmental provisions for the protection of their families. Many of the wives left behind, a West Virginia visitor tells us, are only what we call high-school age. Thousands of boy-husbands in the army have girl-wives at home. The Young Women's Christian Association feels keenly the responsibility of these young creatures.

Back of the sixty-eight Hostess Houses in the military centers, stand about a thousand local branches of the Y. W. C. A. A woman in distress at a camp can be helped not only there by the Hostess House, but later in her home city by the local Association. The Hostess Houses are the dramatization of a work which has been developing for half a century.

Incredible anguish is now the burden of the women of the world. Only very superficial people expect to alter this condition by ignoring it. American women are entering the sisterhood of sorrow. To women there can be no enemy mothers, no enemy wives. Whoever side wins, the women of both sides lose. The women on whom the lot falls are often too dazed to understand what is wisest to do. They think the world has ended for them. It hadn't. The rent must be paid and the children kept in school. Women must learn to live without their men. Perhaps for a year. Perhaps for a lifetime. They must continue to live when every fiber of their being cries out for death. When the blow strikes hardest and gray lethargy engulfs a woman, other women must gather quickly to help her. And that quick onrush of strength to safeguard weakness, of wisdom to offset foolishness, of all-enveloping, protective love—that is what the Young Women's Christian Association undertakes in its Emergency War Work.

tucked all the fine comments on the club there was not room for elsewhere:

Neighbor's Forum

I love the very idea of a club, for I know it is going to be a godsend to those (just like me) who are shut off from other clubs on account of family ties, business pressure, or being strangers in a new community. I wish we might put some of our choicest "adventures" in book form, to give to those who love the club, and to others with sad hearts.

LEONA D. BARNES.

I am glad that you are going to give the men folks a share in this club. They can get out among the neighbors quite often and pass the good word along.

THEO. J. BODMER.

How wonderful that our great paper should give us a fellowship club: a league of ministering comrades!

R. E. DIMMITT.

I am very glad you are thinking of admitting us young men to membership in the new club, and I hope it will succeed far beyond your expectations.

WALTER E. WARREN.

I think it would be a good adventure for us to unite. We would feel more as if we were a part of something tangible.

MRS. E. J. W.

I hasten to write "yes," in favor of a Community Club. Perhaps we could have branch clubs (local ones), each reporting through its secretary to the main club, things interesting and apt to be helpful.

A NEIGHBOR.

I believe the founding of a Community Club would be helpful and beneficial to us all. And it would enable the shut-ins to have a part in the outside world. I think a club would draw us all closer together, and give the feeling of friendliness that comes from being part of a circle.

MRS. ROSE ECKLEY.

I propose that every member of our new club be required to send in at least one helpful hint or suggestion for our page during the year.

MRS. J. H. DUNN.

I am sixty-five years "young" and greatly interested in the proposed American Community Club. The interesting incidents in Adventures in Neighboring come close to our homes and hearts, and we feel like grasping the hand of the other fellow with a hearty "God bless you!" Having been a devoted reader of the Christian Herald for many years, I am interested in any feature that adds to its columns.

JAMES BAILEY.

Your proposal to organize a "Community Club" struck me so forcibly that I felt as though I would like to throw up my cap (dusting), and say, "Hurrah!" I think the idea just what is needed. Let us have no red tape or parliamentary rules—just a fellowship of neighbors. I propose we dispense with election of officers, and that we make the Christian Herald the "Home" of our club.

MRS. N. H. W.

The greatest difficulty of clubs in an isolated district seems to be getting together in times of bad weather or busy seasons. I wonder if (in our case) the telephone could not be used, branch meetings held on the line, plans made, reports given, opportunities explained, etc.

H. K. M.

The name of our club should be "Association of Neighborhood Circles." Our badge should be a round blue pin with a white rim, on which is inscribed "Neighborhood Circle." (Blue indicates true, white service.) Our motto should be "Bear ye one another's burdens." Let the Herald office be our central circle. Instead of a president, the members could elect an advisory circle, they to appoint a chairman and assistant out of that circle—the assistant to preside at all meetings which the chairman could not attend. A cabinet of men, not to exceed five, could be chosen as a consulting body. When conditions were favorable it would be well to form segments, these to meet at a common center about once a month. Cities and large towns should not be used as centers, for this would introduce problems very difficult of solution. Let the objects of the circle be social improvement, community activities, and lightening of burdens—especially bereavement, sickness, and so forth. There should be no dues imposed, but voluntary contributions could be received in a closed receptacle. In this way the mite-givers would not be known. A small part of the offering could be transferred to the Central Circle and used for printing, or cases of special need, each case to be determined by a committee at the Christian Herald.

MR. W. A. SHINN.

I had hoped, as you know, to print a list of names of all who contributed to this contest in any way. It was my intention to publish a kind of "honor roll" of all contestants. But to my surprise, such numbers of contestants entered that the publishing of all names has proved impossible unless we give up most of our space to it, a fortnight hence. And I know you would not approve of that. So I wish, before bidding you good-by for another two weeks, to thank all contestants, personally and in the name of The American Community Club.

INSPECTED For Your Protection

IN textile mills, every bolt of fabric is thrown over a specially made rack and carefully, expertly inspected under a strong light, inch by inch, yard by yard, from end to end, before it is permitted to bear the name of the mill or the trade mark of the fabric.

If flaws are discovered, they are either remedied or the entire piece of goods is sold as a "second."

CHRISTIAN HERALD is just as particular of the goods sold over its name as any manufacturer. Every advertisement is inspected, line by line, before it is permitted to become part of the CHRISTIAN HERALD fabric.

For an article to be admitted to the advertising columns of CHRISTIAN HERALD, therefore, is like stamping it with a recognized trade mark. It means that the goods have been inspected and proved of merit.

No "seconds" are sold in CHRISTIAN HERALD pages. Only prime merchandise obtains the approval of

New Food Administration Rules

THE United States Food Administration on March 23 issued the following new advice and instructions, of which we published a short summary last week:

If we are to furnish the Allies with the necessary proportion of wheat to maintain their war-bread from now until the next harvest—and this is a military necessity—we must reduce our monthly consumption to 21,000,000 bushels a month, as against our normal consumption of about 42,000,000 bushels, or 50 per cent of our normal consumption. Reserving a margin for distribution to the Army and for special cases leaves for general consumption approximately 1½ pounds of wheat products weekly per person. Many of our consumers are dependent upon bakers' bread. Such bread must be durable and therefore requires a larger proportion of wheat products than cereal breads baked in the household. Our Army and Navy require a full allowance. The well-to-do in our population can make greater sacrifices in the consumption of wheat products than can the poor. In addition, our population in the agricultural districts, where the other cereals are abundant, are more skilled in the preparation of breads from these other cereals than the crowded city and industrial populations.

With improved transportation conditions, we now have available a surplus of potatoes. We also have in the spring months a surplus of milk, and we have ample corn and oats for human consumption. The drain on rye and barley as substitutes has already greatly exhausted the supply of these grains.

To effect the needed saving of wheat we are wholly dependent upon the voluntary assistance of the American people and we ask that the following rules shall be observed:—

1. Householders to use not to exceed a total of 1½ pounds per week of wheat products per person. This means not more than 1¾ pounds of Victory bread containing the required percentage of substitutes and one-half pound of cooking flour, macaroni, crackers, pastry, pies, cakes, wheat breakfast cereals, all combined.

2. Public eating places and clubs to observe two wheatless days per week, Monday and Wednesday, as at present. In addition thereto, not to serve to any one guest at any one meal an aggregate of breadstuffs, macaroni, crackers, pastry, pies, cakes, wheat breakfast cereals, containing a total of more than 2 ounces of wheat flour. No wheat products to be served unless specially ordered. Public eating establishments not to buy more than 6 pounds of wheat products for each ninety meals served, thus conforming with the limitations requested of the householders.

3. Retailers to sell not more than one-eighth of a barrel of flour to any town customer at any one time and not more than one-quarter of a barrel to any country customer at any one time, and in no case to sell wheat products without the sale of an equal weight of other cereals.

4. We ask the bakers and grocers to reduce the volume of Victory bread sold, by delivery of the three-quarter pound loaf where one pound was sold before, and corresponding proportions in other weights. We also ask bakers not to increase the amount of their wheat flour purchases beyond 70 per cent of the average monthly amount purchased in the four months prior to March 1st.

5. Manufacturers using wheat products for non-food purposes should cease such use entirely.

6. There is no limit upon the use of other cereals, flours, and meals, corn, barley, buckwheat, potato flour, et cetera.

Many thousand families throughout the land are now using no wheat products whatever, except a very small amount for cooking purposes, and are doing so in perfect health and satisfaction. There is no reason why all of the American people who are able to cook in their own households cannot subsist perfectly well with the use of less wheat products than one and one-half pounds a week, and we especially ask the well-to-do households in the country to follow this additional programme in order that we may provide the necessary marginal supplies for those parts of the community less able to adapt themselves to so large a proportion of substitutes.

In order that we shall be able to make the wheat exports that are absolutely demanded of us to maintain the civil population and soldiers of the Allies and our own Army, we propose to supplement the voluntary co-operation of the public by a further limitation of distribution and we shall place at once restrictions on distribution which will be adjusted from time to time to secure as nearly equitable distribution as possible. With the arrival of harvest we should be able to relax such restrictions; until then we ask for the necessary patience, sacrifice and co-operation of the distributing trades.

Nation Must Eat More Potatoes

DURING the next five months potatoes must be used more freely, unless the nation becomes guilty of blamable waste. Unfortunately last year's large crop was of poor quality. Early frosts killed the vines and left only small, immature, watery tubers in large areas, and hard freezes before harvesting injured tens of thousands of bushels.

The Food Administration is using every effort to secure proper sorting and grading. The public will not buy freely such assortments as some growers are now bringing to market. Much of the stock is scabby, cut, insect-chewed, frost-sweetened and even rotting, with a considerable proportion of nut and marble sizes, trash and dirt.

The shipper will sort and grade where the farmer does not and will make the farmer pay for this work. It is consequently the part of wisdom to do this work at home. At home the small potatoes—those with small scab spots, with cuts or with other injured areas—can be used on the table.

Potatoes too small or too badly injured for human use are still valuable as hog feed, better if boiled; in the form of pork they will bring good money. But in the shipper's dump pile, they are a total loss.

Shippers have the support of Uncle Sam in adopting the two grades recommended by the Department of Agriculture and the Food Administration.

At present the use of these grades is not compulsory but is urged to eliminate waste at its source and thus assist in improving transportation conditions. The Food Administration already prohibits licensed handlers from shipping, or selling for food purposes from points of production, potatoes which are not practically free from frost injury and decay and entirely free from specified injuries and diseases, dirt and foreign matter.

The Cost of a Dog

FLANDERS can't be much hotter for dogs than some of the farm papers are making the United States. Just lately we haven't seen the sheep raiser's respects paid to this well-known night raider any more trenchantly than Farmer's Guide has paid them in the following: "Someone estimates that it costs $34 per year to feed a dog. This includes all kinds of dogs from the common mongrel to the fancy lapdogs utilized by society women in lieu of babies. Some dogs are useful and earn the cost of their feed, but there are a good many of them that are a dead loss to their owners. Not only are they a loss, but there is a certain class that is an absolute detriment to the community. This is certainly a time to save feed by getting rid of the useless dog population. Fewer dogs and more sheep will help win the war."

Dependable Spark Plugs

THE prime essential of emergency equipment is dependability.

And the essentials of dependability are efficiency and durability.

The gasoline motor can only be as efficient as its spark plugs—not one whit more so.

When you think of the high efficiency of the millions of motors in constant use, and realize that an overwhelming majority of all American motors are equipped with Champion Spark Plugs, you gain a realization of what we mean by dependability.

You never know what moment your motor may have to be relied upon for emergency service.

See that your spark plugs are dependable—see that the name "Champion" is on the porcelain, not merely on the box.

How and What to Read

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topics. Phil. 4: 8; 1 Tim. 4: 13

BACON said, "Reading maketh a full man." It is possible, by judicious selection of books, for one whose education has been meager to make himself well informed and welcome in the company of well-educated people. It is also possible for a well-educated person to fill his mind with trash to such a degree that no one associating with him would know that he had once had the benefit of schooling.

The text quoted in Philippians is a most excellent one for any reading which we contemplate. If we read only what is true, honest, just, pure, lovely, of good report, virtuous and praiseworthy, there will be little in our reading to contaminate our minds; but many of the modern magazines and a large percentage of the modern books will be left by us unread. In deciding what to read, there can be no question that we should put the Bible first, for it is the foundation of our faith, as well as the greatest of books. Even the longest lifetime is too short in which to gain all of its treasures. When we go on to choose other books, we are safe with almost any standard author, providing we apply the text of the verse outlined above. A book is not necessarily untrue because it relates events that are pure fiction. Some fiction is truer than facts, and "Pilgrim's Progress," perhaps one of the greatest works of the imagination, is, next to the Bible, one of the best books for Christian reading. A book is not necessarily impure that treats of sin and its results. It is necessary for those who would be well informed and well armed to know both the good and the evil of modern life. It is entirely wrong and destructive to all good thinking to dwell upon what is impure; to revel in the details of sin. Books and magazine articles that do this must be avoided. In general, we can safely read books that are true to life, as it is, even those which may contain some things that jar our sensibilities. They may possibly need jarring, for only when we know enough of what is wrong to be earnestly angry about it and determined to end it, can we really be an efficient part of any army fighting for the right.

As to how to read, there are many ways. A commuter's time may be better spent over good books than over the average newspaper. The best time for reading is the quiet evening hour when the family is together; the day's work then is done, and one can be relaxed and at ease in mind and body. For Bible reading there is no time better than fifteen minutes just after we rise, although this book may be read profitably at any time and in any place. A mother or father can do both themselves and their children a service by spending an hour after the evening meal in reading aloud some good book, with all the family gathered about to listen. If the members of the family are old enough, it is good practice to take turns at reading aloud. In reading for instruction and personal development, it is not worth while to force oneself to read when the mind does not respond, and the thoughts of the printed page do not transfer themselves to our minds. When we begin to yawn and have to read sentences over to get the drift, it is time to cease reading. This is a good time to have a little music, or, if the hour be late, to seek that rest in sleep which is the restorative for tired minds and bodies. In all things let us read what we read in order that we may be more effective members of the Kingdom of God.

Seeing Ourselves as Outsiders See Us

Epworth League Topic. Rom. 12: 3; Prov. 22: 1; 1 Tim. 3: 7

ONE cannot think of this topic without thinking Burns' lines:

O wad some power the giftie gie us
To see oursel's as ithers see us.

Even our mirrors do not tell us the truth, for they have to speak to our eyes; but photographs untouched by art are faithful reproductions of our appearance, and so the impressions that we have made upon the hearts of our friends and acquaintances are faithful reproductions of the thing we are. It is not always possible for us to know how we appear to outsiders; but if we are to be really effective in the service of the Lord, we must appear to outsiders as the sincere followers of Christ we mean to be. As a general rule, outsiders do not see us in meeting; they see us only in the life outside. If in meeting we pray for consecration, and outside our tongue is flippant regarding sacred things, how is an outsider to know that we seek the highest service? If in meeting we pray "Forgive us our trespasses," and outside we are busy trespassing upon the rights and feelings and memories of others, how are they to know that we prayed for forgiveness? It is not often given to us to see ourselves as others see us. We may be conscious that they do not like us, or that they do not trust us, but once in a while some one more truthful than tactful may paint for us a word picture of ourselves which, though we recognize it, leaves us aghast; or sometimes a crossed telephone wire may give us part of a conversation about ourselves that will burn our ears before we hang up the receiver. In general the world outside is too kind to say just what it thinks of us, or to let us see ourselves through its eyes. The only thing we can do, therefore, is to be so true, so consistent, so kind and just and considerate, that those outside who see us will not only see us, but will see through us the Master whom we serve.

Merry Moments

LOST IN THE DESSERT. Little Pearl had spent the night at the home of her married sister. The next morning she appeared undecided whether to return home or to accept her sister's invitation and remain to luncheon. Finally she slipped out into the kitchen, held a whispered colloquy with her sister's maid, then called up her mother's cook.

"What you goin' to have for dessert, Annie?" her sister heard her ask over the 'phone. "Stewed prunes!" echoed the child in disgust. "Well, that settles it. Birdie is goin' to have ice-cream. I stay here."

Kelsey Health Heat

Its Adaptability for Church Heating

MOST churches are heated enough, but few are ventilated enough. Heat you must have. Ventilation you should have. More good Christians go to sleep in church because of poor air than poor sermons.

A heat that ventilates while it heats, is the solution. If it does both and still burns less coal than other heats, based on that one thing alone, it is worth investigating.

The Kelsey Health Heat is just such a heat.

Carefully kept records have proven to us that the average Kelsey pays for its cost over ordinary heaters, in five years, by the coal it saves. Such a statement naturally makes you desire proofs, which is exactly what we want you to want.

Macbeth Lens

Do not wait until the ambulance or the patrol wagon painfully reminds you of the necessity for the safe and legal Macbeth lenses on your car.

Directions with every pair explain how to adjust lamps for exact range of light required by different state laws.

All upward rays are re-directed downward.

Approaching drivers are not imperiled by blinding rays of light.

You can tell the Macbeth lens by its exclusive green glass visor.

The front surface of the lens is divided into five horizontal prisms that re-direct and bend the rays of light at the correct angle to give a long light and concentrated brilliance on the road.

The concave recesses in the back spread the light laterally, providing side illumination.

Four years were devoted by experts to perfecting this scientific Macbeth lens.

It is built with the same experience, accuracy and skill that has established Macbeth-Evans as world-wide lens authorities.

Do not risk open-faced or inferior lenses that blind, waste light in upward rays, weaken or diffuse light—get the Macbeth lens!

SILENCE - DURABILITY - POWER - ACHIEVEMENT

Conserving time and energy is the automobile's great war-time service. This year it is a duty to buy more carefully than ever before. For reasons of economy and assured performance you should select a pioneer car of matured mechanical design and moderate upkeep, built by a reliable and long-established Company. Investigate the KING!—and because of limited "war-year" output and freight embargoes, ORDER EARLY.

The sixty horsepower King is now in its third year of world-wide service, following a smaller "Eight" and a successful "Four." The chassis is designed throughout for utmost simplicity and surplus strength. Comparative light weight for a car of this power and size is a big factor in its low cost of maintenance. The King has long body room because of compact engine, and its 120 inch wheelbase gives a short turning radius, which together with its fine taper roller bearings and easily reached and operated levers, make it remarkably simple to handle. Women especially appreciate its easy driving qualities. The clutch engages with velvety smoothness and the brakes take hold gently but positively. Built low it holds to the ground at high speed. Long cantilever springs and deep, correctly tilted upholstery banish riding fatigue.

The car shown above is the seven-passenger Touring model. FOURSOME—is the King 4-passenger sport model and the handsomest of its type. A 7-passenger Sedan, richly finished, is the popular closed model.

AN ILLUSTRATED NEWS WEEKLY FOR THE HOME

The Polish Legion, Poles who have volunteered to fight for France and freedom, setting out for the fighting front

© Underwood & Underwood

APRIL opened with the German advance stopped, and with both sides digging in. In spite of the failure of recent attacks which Berlin camouflaged by calling them Allied repulses the German press asserted that the weather, not the Allies, had stopped the advance, it being necessary to repair roads for the bringing up of munitions and supplies. It was apparent that all of Germany expected the drive to go on, and was still confident that Amiens would be taken.

Gen. Foch, however, was quoted as saying that Amiens would not be taken and it was definitely announced that the great army of maneuver of the Allies under Gen. Foch's immediate command had not furnished any of the reinforcements which had been used to build the new Allied lines of resistance against further German efforts toward the sea. In England, in France and in America, possibly in Germany too, the military men and peoples were waiting expectantly for the counter-stroke of the Allies or a renewal of the drive.

The Story of the Fighting

THE very evident slackening in the German impetus on the 10th and 11th days of the battle in Picardy became a complete halt on the 12th day, when the Germans driving ahead in the region north of Montdidier succeeded in taking and retaking the village of Moreuil and woods north of it, only to lose both again and to be driven back all along the fronts which they were attacking. British troops retook the village of Hangard west of Demuin, while French troops regained the village of Grisvignes. North of the Somme, the British repulsed German attacks on the outskirts of Albert, and attacking, gained ground in the neighborhood of Serre and Hebuterne. On the following day, April 2—the thirteenth day of fighting—the British made good their captures in the neighborhood of Hebuterne, and repelled a number of determined attacks east and southeast of Arras, not only repulsing these attacks but retaking Ayette village, 8 miles south of Arras. In all of this fighting the Allies captured prisoners and machine-guns. The Allied aviators reported the Germans passing troops between the Somme and Montdidier, movements which they made as difficult and expensive as possible by frequent bombing and machine-gun attacks. The efforts of the enemy to bring up his heavy artillery over the shattered waste which lay behind him were also impeded by Allied airmen who dropped bombs and directed the fire of long-range guns. There seemed to be no question, however, that the Germans would be forced, when the new concentrations were complete, to reopen the attempt upon Amiens, or admit themselves defeated. Meantime the Allies were making the necessary preparations to halt any further attacks on the ground of their impact. The British and French troops which had fought the ten-days' battle, back from the line of attack to the present lines, were replaced with new troops. American troops coming forward began work behind the lines, and taking over quiet sectors of the front relieving French veterans for the great battle.

THE GREAT BATTLE IN PICARDY

It was announced from London, on April 1, that as a result of consultations in France and communications exchanged between London and Washington, the full force of the American army at present in Europe would be thrown into the struggle, American units being brigaded with British and French units. It was added that a double tide of new fighting men would soon begin to set in from America to Europe, one tide going through the present port of embarkation to the old American training zone, while the other would flow through some other port directly to the fighting front. Arrangements were made for the use of British transport vessels in American service, and it was reported that the boats at the disposal of the American Army would be increased through the use of some of the commandeered Dutch vessels. America is to have no small part in the defeat of Hindenburg's attempt to force a German imperialistic peace on the democracies of the world.

All through the first two days of April, the Allies, with the Germans hopelessly throwing away men against their unwavering fronts, were bringing up the heavy guns, the men, and all of the equipment necessary to insure the final defeat of the Germans, who were already far behind their schedule, Hindenburg having been reported to have promised himself an entry into Paris by April 1. During these same two days, both sides were digging in, establishing once more a system of trenches, the British to insure the defeat of any attempt of the Germans to advance further, the Germans to make as certain as they could their tenure of the captured ground—some thousand of square miles—which has cost them from 25 to 70 per cent. of forty of their choicest divisions, and a serious crippling of some thirty more. Forty German divisions have been so completely wrecked that they have been taken out of the battle.

The fighting on March 30 and 31 around Moreuil and Hangard was sanguinary in the extreme. The Germans were determined to go on, while the French and British were equally determined to prevent a further advance. Fighting came to close quarters and the final victory did not rest so much upon the banners of the Allies as upon their bayonets, the Germans being forced back by British, Canadian and French troops at the bayonet point. In one or two difficult wooded sections the bayonets of the infantry were assisted by the swords and lances of British and French cavalry, which did fearful execution among the enemy troops, helping mightily to parry the smashing blow, which the two crown princes of Bavaria and Prussia had struck desperately at the fast solidifying fronts before them. The Germans were driven back in confusion, and the 13th day of the great battle saw no attacks, while over most of the front of the great advance the action reduced itself once more to raids and patrol encounters in which the Allies had a distinct advantage.

ON April 1 the Germans directed a heavy artillery fire, using more than 4000 shells, half of them gas shells, against the sector held by American troops in the neighborhood of Toul. American artillery replied effectively, but no infantry action followed. It was raining, and the American troops were moving in what the correspondent described as an indescribable mud. He pictured the roads as thick with great columns of American fighting men, artillery and transport, the artillerymen being especially proud of their French "75's," each gun having been given a pet name, and each gunner looking forward eagerly to the part he might be assigned in the great fight.

On April 2 it was announced in Washington that Secretary Baker had placed a ban on the making public here of any information concerning the forces in France. It was announced that only information coming through Gen. Pershing's headquarters would be made public, and that no more casualty lists would be issued until further notice. Secretary Baker was in Rome on April 2, having visited the Italian headquarters on April 1, and some of the Italian training camps, but being prevented by unfavorable weather from making a proposed tour of the fighting lines.

THE 14th day of fighting was marked by violent artillery duels in the section west and north of Montdidier, the German batteries showing a constantly increasing fire, and it was expected that another desperate effort was to be made to break through in this region. In the neighborhood of Fampaux, north of the River Searpe, the Germans sent forward a strong raiding force which was repulsed. The British further north, in the neighborhood of Loos, captured 31 prisoners and a machine-gun in a raid on German trenches. The British also made a successful raid near Poelcappelle in the Ypres sector. In the neighborhood of Lassigny, the French pushed forward for a slight distance north of the village of Plemont. The British air service brought down sixteen German planes and two balloons, at an expense of eleven of their own machines.

The most interesting development of the 14th day was a report of a speech made on the previous day by Count Czernin, Austro-Hungarian Minister for Foreign Affairs to the Vienna City Council. Count Czernin told the Councilmen that Austria and her allies had done everything possible to avoid a new offensive, but that the Entente would not have it. He joined the German Chancellor in acknowledging the availability of President Wilson's four points as a basis for a peace discussion. Then he said, "A short time before the beginning of the offensive in the west M. Clemenceau inquired of me whether and upon what basis I was prepared to negotiate. I immediately replied that, in agreement with Berlin, I was ready to negotiate, and that as regards France, I saw no other obstacle to peace with France than the desire for Alsace-Lorraine. The reply from Paris was that it was impossible to negotiate on that basis. There was then no choice left." He stated that whatever might happen

Austria would not desert Germany's interests any more than Germany would desert Austria's, and that they were not fighting for imperialistic or annexationist ends, but for defense, for political existence, and for the future. Count Czernin's speech was looked upon in Allied capitals as the beginning of a new Teuton peace effort, and as an attempt to drive a wedge between France and her Allies by making it appear that the whole war was merely an attempt to restore her lost provinces to France.

Premier Clemenceau declared categorically that Count Czernin had falsified.

The starting of a peace drive at this time was which condoned the massacre of the Armenians, which committed outrages against defenseless women and children, and which has broken every law of nations which interfered with its present purposes—these two partners in crime against civilization—should not expect to have the same success with the enlightened nations of the west that they had with the ignorant masses of Russia.

The correspondent says these French cooks' exuberant joy was caused by the message, "The Yanks are coming" generally looked upon as a practical acknowledgment that the great German offensive had failed. With the Brest-Litovsk peace and the Rumanian and Ukrainian pacts and their subsequent history in mind, the Entente countries and the United States can hardly be swerved from the great principles for which they fight by any attempt on the part of Teutonic statesmen to

ON April 4, the fifteenth day of battle, the Germans, true to the forecast of the preceding day's bombardment, sent forward their storm troops against the Allied lines, west and northwest of Montdidier and west of Albert. Along the nine miles of front, of which Moreuil is the center, eleven German divisions, about 120,000 men were thrown against the Allies. At the end of the day Moreuil, which has frequently changed hands of late, the woods southwest of it and two small villages, Mailly-Raineval and Morisel nearby, remained in German hands but with the French dominating them from heights to the west. Grivesnes to the south, half way to Montdidier, marked the southern limit of the assault which extended northward ten miles to the Somme. Ten times the German masses charged against the Allied wall of fire and ten times they were repulsed. The gains made near Moreuil were unimportant. At Grivesnes the attack was not only repulsed but French counter-attacks carried the Allied line eastward somewhat from its position in the morning. North of Moreuil the line was held by British troops who stood fast except to the west of Hamel, near the Somme, where the line was pressed back a short distance to positions east of Villers-Brettonneux, eight miles from Amiens. Here they remained steadfast. North of the Somme the Germans attempted again to make progress westward from Albert. Although attacking desperately with large forces they were completely repulsed.

The French, on April 4, made successful raids in Champagne, near Rheims, and at Verdun, bringing back prisoners and machine-guns. German raids near Rheims, Verdun and in Lorraine were repulsed.

April 4 saw American forces holding another sector of the line, a sector in the Meuse Hills south of Verdun. They celebrated their entrance to this sector by repulsing a German raid, on an outpost position, which followed heavy artillery fire.

General Pershing has received from King Albert of Belgium the highest Belgian order, the Grand Cross of the Order of Leopold.

"THEY are 'completely stopped,'" said General Foch, when, after attacks with twenty-nine divisions, some 350,000 men, against a sixteen mile front—attacks which he pressed with all his force throughout the whole of the day and night of April 4—the enemy was unable to continue the effort. April 5, the sixteenth day of the battle, saw both the French and British retaking some of the terrain which was included in the enemy's comparatively insignificant gains of the day before.

In addition to the gains recorded earlier in this article the Germans took some ground southwest of Albert at Dernancourt and pressed on from the woods north of Moreuil to Castel. Before the fighting ended the battle had spread northward past Buequoy and eastward to Noyon. In counter-attacks the British restored the former line at Dernancourt and improved their positions near Hebuterne taking prisoners and machine-guns. The French also gained ground near Mailly-Raineval and in the northern and western

The Ministry of Angels

TEXT—Psalm 91: 11. "He shall give His angels charge over thee, to keep thee in all thy ways."

THE belief in guardian angels is so generally entertained as to furnish a clear presumption in its favor; but presumption is not proof, and popular opinion is not infrequently at odds with established facts. We want to know definitely, beyond all ifs and peradventures, whether our friends in heaven are really interested in our welfare or not; and this can only be discovered by learning what the Scriptures have to say about it. No spiritual truth is certified in any other way. We may fondly dream of life and immortality; but there can be no assurance without a Thus-saith-the-Lord behind it. To the Law and the Testimony, therefore. Let us open the Bible and search it.

To begin with, the Scriptures assure us of the reality of the future life. They are postulated on the truth of immortality so distinctly that they would be meaningless without it. They represent heaven as a place peopled by angels and spirits of just men made perfect. In the vision of Isaiah he saw the Lord sitting upon a throne high and lifted up; "and above it stood the seraphim." In the vision of John the Evangelist he saw "a great multitude which no man could number standing before the throne, clothed in white robes with palms in their hands, crying, "Blessing and glory, and wisdom, and thanksgiving, and power and might be unto our God forever and ever!" Intimations like these abound in the Book from beginning to end.

There is furthermore a clear announcement as to the nature of these heavenly beings. They are of different orders and gradations, even "as one star differeth from another star in glory." There are angels and archangels, seraphim and cherubim and saints triumphant; but they are all alike in their adjustment to the conditions of the spiritual life. Our Lord assures us that "in the resurrection we shall be like the angels." (Mark 12: 25.)

All are free from the limitations of time and space. They are equipped with faculties and capacities that we can scarcely imagine, we who are "cabinéd, cribbed, confined" in this tabernacle of flesh. The Psalmist says that they "excel in strength."

IT is recorded that while Daniel was kneeling in prayer for the deliverance of his people, "even while he was yet speaking, the angel Gabriel flew swiftly and touched him at the time of the evening oblation, saying, 'I am come to show thee that the streets of Jerusalem shall be built again and its walls even in troublous times.'" Now consider what that means. If the sun is ninety-five millions of miles from the earth, as they say, then the latest of our aeroplanes flying at the rate of four miles a minute would require sixty years to reach it; yet Gabriel came from heaven to earth as it were in the twinkling of an eye! It is for reasons like this that God's messengers are likened to "winds and flames of fire." They know no weakness or weariness. Being without sin they are likewise free from all the ills that human flesh is heir to. And this is the glory that by God's grace shall yet be revealed in us!

Still further we are advised as to their occupations. They "rest not day nor night" from doing the divine will. Their particular business is ministry: as it is written "Are they not all ministering spirits, sent forth to minister unto them who are heirs of salvation?" This brings the truth very near to us.

Why should not our loved ones in heaven be interested in our behalf? All over our country there are wives and mothers knitting for loved ones "somewhere in France." The censor forbids their knowing precisely where they are, just as the divine censorship is drawn through all mere unprofitable curiosity as to our translated friends; but the knitting goes on nevertheless, and morning and evening prayers are said for those who are "somewhere" on the firing line. Is it to be supposed that our friends in heaven are less deeply concerned for us?

But this is not enough. We want more specific and authoritative information; and fortunately it is provided in the Word of God. If we open the Old Testament at the account of the Creation we shall hear "the morning stars singing together and all the sons of God shouting for joy." And as we turn the pages we shall find them singing and shouting for joy all along the way. An angel leads the children of Israel on their journey through the wilderness, and in battle angels and ministers of grace defend them. An angel visits Abraham as he sits in the doorway of his tent in Mamre. Another speaks to Gideon as he is flailing behind the wine-press. When Jacob in his despondency lies down at Bethel with his head pillowed upon a stone he sees a ladder of light on which angels are ascending with his prayers and coming down with blessings upon him. Daniel is befriended by angels in the den of lions. They minister to Elijah at the brook and hover above him in the beleaguered city of Dothan so that he beholds "the mountains are full of God's chariots and horses." They appear to Moses at the burning bush and thenceforth never forsake him. They come to Hagar and her famishing child, sinking with weariness in the desert, and open her ears to hear the ripple of a brook; whereupon she calls the place Beer-lahai-roi, that is, "Thou God seest me." Time would fail to tell of the ancient worthies who in like manner received messages from the throne of God.

Now open the New Testament; and you shall straightway hear a rustling of wings. An angel brings the Annunciation to the virgin mother. Old Zacharias waiting in the Temple and hoping against hope is assured—by the same Gabriel who had brought a like message to Daniel five hundred years before—that the Sun of Righteousness shall arise with healing in his wings. Out on the plains of Judea the shepherds awake to hear a multitude of the heavenly host singing, "Glory to God in the highest, on earth peace and good will towards men."

AS Christ sets out upon his ministry the angels go along with him. At the close of his temptation in the wilderness they minister to him. In the Mount of Transfiguration he receives two heavenly visitors who, though they had died five hundred years apart, are acquainted with each other and show their familiarity with mundane affairs by conversing with Jesus as to "the decease which he was about to accomplish at Jerusalem." There were angels hovering over his Cross; else why had he just previously said to Peter, "Put up thy sword into its sheath. Thinkest thou not that I could pray to my Father and he would give me more than twelve legions to defend me?" Angels rolled away the stone from his sepulchre and announced his resurrection. A convoy of angels attended him when through the open heavens he returned to "the glory which he had with the Father before the world was." Had the ears of the disciples been opened they might have heard them crying, "Lift up your heads. O ye gates, and be ye lifted up, ye everlasting doors, and let the King of Glory enter in!" As it was they were addressed by two men in shining apparel, saying, "Why stand ye gazing up into heaven? This same Jesus shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go"; that is, in the clouds of heaven and all the holy angels with him.

Nor did these celestial visits cease with the ascension of Christ. The apostles in their subsequent work were heartened in the same way. When Peter was in prison an angel came to him saying, "Rise up quickly"; and straightway his chains fell off. When Philip the Evangelist was preaching in Samaria an angel bade him "Arise, go down to Gaza along the desert road." And again the time would fail me to tell of Paul and Cornelius and others who were thus guided and safeguarded along the journey of life.

The question, however, is not one of ancient history but Are these ministries for us? Why not? It is true indeed that, inasmuch as we have the Scriptures, there is no such need of angel communications as in the olden time. He who formerly "spoke at sundry times and in divers manners, hath in these last days spoken unto us by his Son"; and "If the Word spoken by angels was steadfast how shall we escape if we neglect so great salvation, which was spoken by the Lord and confirmed unto us by them that heard him?" But though we are no longer under the necessity of communicating with God through intermediate beings, this does not affect the importance of their ministerial office.

They are as deeply concerned in our welfare as ever. Otherwise why are we informed that "there is joy among the angels in heaven over every sinner that returneth from the error of his way"? Or why are we warned against the putting of stumbling-blocks in the way of children, since "their angels do always behold the face of their Father in heaven"? The familiar picture of a "Little Pilgrim" walking all unconscious of danger along the edge of a precipice while a guardian angel follows with hands laid upon his shoulders, was not drawn with a pencil dipped in imagination. Blessed be God for the assurance that he is thus solicitous for the welfare of the least of his little ones!

Nor are the "heirs of salvation" forgotten in the article of death. It is written of Lazarus that he was "carried by angels to Abraham's bosom," that is, to the innermost place of heaven. What means the light that shone upon the face of Stephen when he "fell on sleep" amid a shower of stones? He saw heaven opened and the Son of Man standing to welcome him; and those who witnessed against him testified that his face shone like the face of an angel. Not once, but again and again have I seen that light on the faces of God's people as they passed on—the light of heavenly vision and the recognition of loved ones. A soldier dying in a field hospital asked his nurse for a drink, saying, "Bring me two cups, one for me and one for him." Not understanding, she said, "There's no one here." His strange answer was, "Cannot you see him?"

It is scarcely necessary to repeat that this doctrine of the guardianship of angels must be received with salutary caution. For that matter, all spiritual truths must be safeguarded by careful and prayerful reference to the divine Word. Our text itself was wrested by Satan out of its plain significance in the forlorn hope of leading Christ into sinful presumption. "If thou be the very Son of God," he said, "cast thyself down from this pinnacle of the Temple and prove it; for is it not written 'He shall give his angels charge concerning thee and they shall bear thee up in their hands lest thou dash thy foot against a stone'?" No one knows better how to distort Scripture to base uses than this prince of the power of the air.

The same truth is perverted by false teachers to bring us into wrong relations with saints and angels. In Paul's letter to the Christians of Colosse he says, "Let no man beguile you into a voluntary humility and worshipping of angels." The office of these celestial beings is not intercessory but ministerial. We have one Mediator, even Jesus Christ the righteous. At the close of John's apocalyptic visions, when he would have fallen down to worship before the feet of the angel who had revealed them, he was thus admonished: "See thou do it not; for I am thy fellow servant. Worship God!"

We have need also to guard against what are called "lying spirits"; and never more than now. In our natural but unwarrantable desire to communicate with friends in heaven we are asked to believe that these celestial beings are not above the tipping of tables and ringing of bells in closed cabinets and writing bad grammar on secret slates. This is abhorrent not only to sound piety but to common sense.

If anything were to be gained by our holding communication with heavenly beings we should doubtless be permitted to do so; but with the wealth of Scripture and the privilege of prayer at our command, there would be nothing but the profitless gratification of curiosity to show for it. Wherefore it is not strange that the way is closed against it.

This however does not affect in the slightest degree the assurance of their continued ministry. So far forth, the Scriptures are perfectly clear; and we are always safe when we steer by the chart. We are never safe in taking away aught of that which is written or in adding one jot or tittle to it.

But what profit is there in clarifying this Scriptural truth? Much every way. For one thing it gives us to understand that we are living in a large world—a world that laps over on another that reaches infinitely beyond it.

FOR another thing it assures us that we are living in a good world with a good God over it. He is round about us with his Providence. He has sent his only-begotten Son into the world for our salvation. And, in addition to all this, he has provided for our care by the present ministry of friends who have passed on before us.

And finally we are thus informed of the probationary character of our present life. "I paint for eternity," said Zeuxis, when asked to account for his attention to details. In like manner Paul writes, "Seeing that we are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses, let us lay aside every weight and the sin which doth so easily beset us and run with patience the race that is set before us, looking unto Jesus the Author and Finisher of our faith." He was thinking of the Olympian games. The athletes are standing at the crimson line. The galleries are full of spectators on every side, waiting to see the contestants run their race. We are not alone in our eagerness to "run that we may obtain." All heaven is thronged with celestial beings looking down upon us. "Wherefore, forgetting the things which are behind and reaching forth unto those which are before, let us press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus."

President Wilson Replies to Germany

"Force, Force to the Utmost" Is the Key and Climax of His Liberty Loan Address

THE President, at Baltimore on April 6, the anniversary of America's entrance into the war and the opening of the Third Liberty Loan drive, brought his audience to their feet in enthusiastic acclamation by declaring for force to the utmost.

The text of the address was, in part, as follows:

"FELLOW citizens: This is the anniversary of our acceptance of Germany's challenge to fight for our right to live and be free, and for the sacred rights of freedom everywhere. The Nation is awake. There is no need to call to it. We know what the war must cost, our utmost sacrifice, the lives of our fittest men, and, if need be, all that we possess.

"The loan we are met to discuss is one of the least parts of what we are called upon to give and to do, though in itself imperative. The people of the whole country are alive to the necessity of it, and are ready to lend to the utmost even where it involves a sharp skimping and daily sacrifice to lend out of meager earnings. They will look with reprobation and contempt upon those who can and will not, upon those who demand a higher rate of interest, upon those who think of it as a mere commercial transaction. I have not come therefore, to urge the loan. I have come only to give you, if I can, a more vivid conception of what it is for.

"The reasons for this great war, the reason why it had to come, the need to fight it through, and the issues that hang upon its outcome, are more clearly disclosed now than ever before. It is easy to see just what this particular loan means, because the cause we are fighting for stands more sharply revealed than at any previous crisis of the momentous struggle. The man who knows least can now see plainly how the cause of justice stands and what is the imperishable thing he is asked to invest in. Men in America may be more sure than they ever were before that the cause is their own and that, if it should be lost, their own great Nation's place and mission in the world would be lost with it.

"I CALL you to witness, my fellow countrymen, that at no stage of this terrible business have I judged the purpose of Germany intemperately. . . . We must judge as we would be judged. I have sought to learn the objects Germany has in this war from the mouths of her own spokesmen, and to deal as frankly with them as I wished them to deal with me. I have laid bare our own ideals, our own purposes, without reserve for doubtful phrase, and have asked them to say as plainly what it is that they seek.

"We have ourselves proposed no injustice, no aggression. We are ready, whenever the final reckoning is made, to be just to the German people, deal fairly with the German power, as with all others. . . . For we ask nothing that we are not willing to accord.

"It has been with this thought that I have sought to learn from those who spoke for Germany whether it was justice or dominion. . . . that the German leaders were seeking. They have answered, answered in unmistakable terms. They have avowed that it was not justice but dominion and the unhindered execution of their own will.

THE avowal has not come from Germany's statesmen. It has come from her military leaders, who are her real rulers. Her statesmen have said that they wished peace, and were ready to discuss its terms whenever their opponents were willing to sit down at the conference table with them. Her present Chancellor has said—in indefinite and uncertain terms, indeed, and in phrases that often seem to deny their own meaning, but with as much plainness as he thought prudent—that he believed that peace should be based on the principles which we had declared would be our own in the final settlement. At Brest-Litovsk her civilian delegates spoke in similar terms; professed their desire to conclude a fair peace and accord to the peoples with whose fortunes they were dealing the right to choose their own allegiance.

"But action accompanied and followed the profession. Their military masters, the men who act for Germany disregarded, and the old, age-long struggle for freedom and right began again at its beginning. Everything that America has lived for and loved and grown great to vindicate and bring to a glorious realization will have fallen in utter ruin and the gates of mercy once more pitilessly shut upon mankind!

"The thing is preposterous and impossible. And yet is not that what the whole course and action of the German and exhibit her purpose in execution, proclaimed a very different conclusion. We cannot mistake what they have done—in Russia, in Finland, in the Ukraine, in Roumania. The real test of their justice and fair play has come. From this we may judge the rest. They are enjoying in Russia a cheap triumph in which no brave or gallant nation can long take pride. . . . Their fair professions are forgotten. They nowhere set up justice, but everywhere impose their power and exploit everything for their own use and aggrandizement, and the peoples of conquered provinces are invited to be free under their dominion!

"Are we not justified in believing that they would do the same thing at their western front if they were not there face to face with armies whom even their countless divisions cannot overcome? If when they have felt their cheek to be final, they should propose favorable and equitable terms with regard to Belgium and France and Italy, could they blame us if we concluded that they did so only to assure themselves of a free hand in Russia and the East?

"Their purpose is undoubtedly to make all the Slavic peoples, all the free and ambitious nations of the Baltic Peninsula, all the lands that Turkey has dominated and misruled, subject to their will and ambition and build upon that dominion an empire of force upon which they fancy that they can then erect an empire of gain and commercial supremacy—an empire as hostile to the Americas as to the Europe which it will overawe—an empire which will ultimately master Persia, India and the peoples of the Far East. . . .

"THAT programme once carried out, America and all who care or dare to stand with her must arm and prepare themselves to contest the mastery of the world, a mastery in which the rights of common men, the rights of women and of all who are weak must for the time being be trodden under foot and armies has meant wherever they have moved. . . .

"What, then, are we to do? For myself, I am ready, ready still, ready even now, to discuss a fair, and just, and honest peace at any time that it is sincerely purposed—a peace in which the strong and the weak shall fare alike. But the answer, when I proposed such a peace, came from the German commanders in Russia, and I cannot mistake the meaning of the answer.

"I ACCEPT the challenge. I know that you accept it. All the world shall know that you accept it. It shall appear in the utter sacrifice and self-forgetfulness with which we shall give all that we love and all that we have to redeem the world, and make it fit for free men like ourselves to live in. This now is the meaning of all that we do. Let everything that we say, my fellow countrymen, everything that we henceforth plan and accomplish, ring true to this response till the majesty and might of our concerted power shall fill the thought and utterly defeat the force of those who flaunt and misprize what we honor and hold dear.

"Germany has once more said that force, and force alone, shall decide whether justice and peace shall reign in the affairs of men, whether right as America conceives it or dominion as she conceives it shall determine the destinies of mankind. There is, therefore, but one response possible from us: Force, force to the utmost, force without stint or limit, the righteous and triumphant force which shall make right the law of the world and cast every selfish dominion down in the dust."

ing of Third Liberty Loan Bonds at 4 1/4 per cent. On the same day the Treasury announced that the Loan Campaign would continue until May 4, and that partial payments for bonds might be made—5 per cent. on subscription, 20 per cent. on May 28 35 per cent. July 18, and 40 per cent. August 15. The amount of the bond sale is to be $3,000,000,000, and over subscriptions and the bonds are to be due in ten years and to be exempt from taxes on the same basis as the second issue. The Bureau of Engraving and Printing set its presses to work immediately on the signing of the bill, the first bond printed being a $50 "baby bond." Forty thousand bonds were printed the first day, 100,000 in the next two days, and thereafter the presses turned them out at the rate of 500,000 a day. Never in the history of the country has there been such a complete organization for any purpose as has been created for the selling of this third issue of bonds, which are to furnish the sinews of victory. Committees have been organized by states, counties, cities, and even in the smaller towns, and every bank is a Liberty Loan center. Every house in the Union is to be visited or is to receive through the mails Liberty Loan material. The Boy Scouts of America, nearly 300,000 strong, will cooperate with local committees in the house-to-house work, their campaign to be conducted between April 20 and 30. The Scout in uniform is Uncle Sam's official messenger. The Scouts who make creditable records will receive appropriate recognition.

The German drive has given impetus to the Liberty Loan, for it has brought American troops into the active fighting and America now realizes that it is really at war and that serious days are ahead which will require not only loyalty of lip but a patriotism that will penetrate the pocket and bring the last dollar into the service to which our boys are giving their lives. In New York City the beginning of the Liberty Loan drive was initiated by a flight of seven airplanes from the aviation field at Mincola, which bombarded the city with Liberty Loan literature, while small boys went from house to house ringing the door-bells, with no interference from the cops, presenting to those who answered pasteboard duplicates in miniature of the Liberty Bell of '76, bearing the inscription "Ring it again." If the ring was not answered the pasteboard bell was hung on the door-knob.

The metropolis, notwithstanding the fact that the opening day was a half holiday, perhaps because it was, subscribed for nearly $100,000,000 worth of bonds on the opening day. Although New York's quota is only $900,000,000, the city plans to subscribe half of the total offering, or $1,500,000,000. Some 200 communities, by reporting their quotas subscribed in full, qualified on the first day for the right to fly the Liberty Loan flag.

General Pershing, commander of the American Expeditionary Forces in France, sent to the Third Liberty Loan Committees this appeal:

"Every dollar invested in the Liberty Loan is a dollar invested in American manhood.

"Every dollar subscribed as a result of self-denial means partnership in the hardships and risks of our men in the trenches.

"Every dollar subscribed will confirm the determination of our people at home to stand by its army to a victorious end.

"An overwhelming subscription to the Third Liberty Loan will be a patriotic expression of confidence in our ability as a nation to maintain all that we hold dear in civilization."

The wedding of an orphan. The bride with Miss Hartwell beside her and the guests in front of Miss Hartwell's home

FOR ten years I prayed God to open the way for starting an orphanage at Foochow. During all those years, he made it clear to me that I must wait until the Chinese themselves took up the matter, and I also received the impression that, when they did, the Chinese superintendent of the Orphanage should have a wife who was a foundling. With all the need and all my yearning, the hand of God was laid upon me simply to wait and pray. One day I heard that one of the students in Foochow College—where I was teaching all those years—had gone to Borneo. I immediately had the strongest possible feeling of rebellion against his leaving. I felt that he must return and graduate, and that God would some day bring him back. His contract was finished and there was no reason for my feeling. It was all wrong, I felt; but there it was, and my heart never once thought of him without that same determination; he must come back!

YEARS rolled by, and one day a spruce young man in foreign dress and without queue—a most unusual thing those days—came into the parlor with outstretched hand, asking if I knew him. How changed he was! and still I guessed right and immediately said: "Here you are, and you are to stay and graduate, and I shall not take no for an answer, because I have felt you must do so from the day you left." "All right," he replied; "I am willing."

He had been interpreter for a court in Borneo and had married a foundling, who had been living in an English missionary's home ever since she was three years of age. She was a trained girl and so could do much to help her husband. I asked him to be my accountant and teacher in Chinese, and the two moved into my home; I provided a better place outside for them later, until he graduated. He said he had always wished to work for the orphans; so, with him in view as the superintendent—which agreed with what the Lord had shown me was to come—I was able to secure funds for his support, and when he graduated, he received his first month's instalment and went to visit his father's home at Kutien before he began work. On his way home he contracted malignant erysipelas and died ten days after graduation—a great shock to my hopes and a bitter loss to the work. I felt I must go to Kutien

Her Battle Won Through Prayer

The Remarkable Story of the Founding of a Great Industrial Orphanage Work in China. An Opportunity for Every Reader to Adopt an Orphan

By EMILY S. HARTWELL, Foochow

FEW records of consecrated missionary enterprise are so wonderful as the following story, from Miss Hartwell's own pen. One might almost feel justified in saying that she has written it with her soul, so full is it of the evidence of faith in God and dependence upon his will and guidance. She pleads in behalf of a great work, already wonderfully successful, and in which the Christian fathers and mothers of America should be glad to have a share. The cost of orphan support under the adoption plan is $25 a year.

and mourn with his family. The grief in my heart was great and the test to my faith was hard to accept; still, I knew God must have some one to fill his place and so fulfil His promise to me.

Friends went with me on the way up, and, on hearing of my loss, told me that the only Chinese they had known who had always said he wanted to work for orphans was a young man in Shanghai. I did not know him, but, strange to say his wife was also a foundling, taken when a baby, so that the foreign friends who trained her did not know the slightest thing about her ancestry. Rev. G. H. Hubbard was then going to Nanking to the National Christian Endeavor Convention, and I asked him to call and see Mr. Li and ask if he would undertake orphanage work.

AT that time none of us knew of the Chinkiang Orphanage Committee or the Christian Herald funds. Mr. Li indicated his willingness, but it was felt that he was too valuable in the college, where he was acting as part teacher and part pupil, to be spared. Later, after a visit from myself to the family, Mr. Li agreed to be our superintendent, and as there was some delay in securing Christian Herald aid (as our orphanage was interdenominational and unconnected with any mission) he went to Japan to study the Ishii Orphanage at Okayama the better to fit him for his work when it would open. Bishop Lewis became sponsor for the Chinese pastors and volunteer missionaries of the Board of Managers; funds for 200 orphans were secured from the Christian Herald, and the work was started which now has the larger amount of the necessary funds for the younger children guaranteed by the Fukien provincial government, so that the orphanage is a permanent institution, with the larger part of its gifts assured, as Governor Li said, not for seven years but for all time.

Strange to say, yet proving how God leads in each step of the way, the condition of receiving aid from the Christian Herald fund was that the money should go only for orphans, and nothing could be furnished toward a superintendent. In all other instances, the superintendence was furnished by some foreign missionary whose salary came from the Board supporting the missionary, but the Fukien Homes was to be under Chinese superintendence from the first, so God has raised up a friend to give me support for the Chinese superintendent, and he was provided even before funds for children were secured.

Again, to show how precisely God keeps control if we trust in him, when the revolution broke out that deposed the Manchu dynasty and ushered in the Republic of China. Mr. Li felt his first duty was to the new republic, and accepted an office in the Foreign Board. Our consul told us that we could not employ an official of the Chinese government lest complications might arise. At this same juncture, but entirely unconnected with these happenings in China, the donor of Mr. Li's salary found it impossible to continue her gifts. The falling off of the funds coinciding with the failing of his purpose, a change was inevitable.

At this juncture, the Pacific Coast Chamber of Commerce party visited China. Consul Gracey invited me to be among those to help receive the party, having been asked by the viceroy and Tartar general to invite a few foreigners to do so. From the first, it was made clear to me that we must in some way bring the Christian Herald Orphanage to their attention. Consul Gracey said there would be no opportunity, as the program was full and no time was given for seeing anything but government institutions, so that the missions must be entirely left out. Nevertheless I prepared. I decided to meet them at the Anchorage and come up in the boat with them and then show pictures. Superintendent Li arranged to have the Orphanage boys line up on the wharf and escort the party to the Foreign Board, where they dined.

The boys became enthusiastic. They made flags—two for each boy, one with the words "Christian Herald Orphanage," the other with a big "Welcome" on it—and they lined up on the wharf at ten o'clock in the morning, the time set for the arrival of the party. But the ship did not arrive. There had been failure to rush the stokers some days back, and the steamer came into port hours late. The tide was low when they took boats for Foochow, and although we left the Anchorage at five, we were stuck on mud banks again and again, until it was nearly ten at night instead of in the morning when we reached the jetty. All day long those boys had waited, not even daring to go away for dinner lest they miss the party. Shopkeepers had taken pity on them and given them cakes from time to time, but they never left the spot. They weren't going to lose their chance to wave those flags and greet that party for half a dozen dinners!

It was night and the flaming torches lighted up the white coast and the waving "Welcome," and "Christian Herald Orphanage," blazed out as it were from a hundred banners, as the party filed, one by one, in sedans up the street. As one of the party remarked afterwards, if they forgot everything else of their trip, they could never forget the Christian Herald Orphanage and those boys and their banners. The elaborate dinner lasted till midnight, but the boys had not yet greeted their own viceroy and Tartar general; so they stayed on, and when the party and the great Chinese officials left in the still hours, the little orphans were still there, waving their banners and speaking their welcome, which was written in both English and Chinese.

The next day the girls of the Orphanage sent bouquets to each of the ladies of the party with their words of welcome, to which Mrs. Moulton of Riverside, California, the secretary of the ladies of the Chamber of Commerce Party, sent in reply a message of appreciation and thanks. The party were due to leave next day and the carefully arranged schedule of official entertainment was all left out, but the orphans were not. Being about all that was left, they shone like a bright star in a night when most of the stars overhead are invisible. Another thing, the long trip from the steamer gave me time to explain fully the photos and maps I had prepared. God heard my prayer to send just the right ones to my boat. I waited to help all on the boats first, so those left to come on my boat happened to be the chairman and secretary of the ladies and others of the party. These were the most important ladies of the whole company, and they became so interested in the Orphanage that, since then, they have furnished most of the funds for the new superintendent who followed Mr. Li.

BUT let us go back to the time before the Orphanage, when God provided for my former family of twenty orphan children. There is one street in Foochow City, every stone of whose irregular pavement could tell a tale of some prayer of mine, for I never took my sedan down that pavement without being impelled to offer a prayer for that special street. Strange I have never been called to prayer for another street but this; and as I rode along, I often asked if I should not enter some house and speak to some person, but I never had any such permission; only I must fulfil the service of constant prayer for that street.

Years rolled by and still I felt I must pray. Finally I understood why. Having been granted funds with which to open day classes for women, I asked for guidance where to open the work. Each direction where my judgment led seemed blocked. Then, one Sunday, a strange Chinese lady came to church and greeted me, saying, "I have decided to become a Christian and want my whole family to be so. I hear you wish to open a class for women. Will you come to my house and hold it!" She lived on my "prayer many things have grown out of this beginning fostered in prayer.

AMONG that group of women in the Station Class was one who seemed well-to-do. She had fine prospects, but during the year her husband suddenly died of cholera, and she was left with six young children, one a baby boy. One Sunday I went down to find her swollen-eyed, looking as if she would never stop weeping. After the Christian Endeavor meeting I asked what was the trouble, and learned the "go-between" was at her home, waiting to close the bargain to sell her baby for her, and the women had persuaded her to wait until I came to see if some way would open to avert this. How could I bear to be the means of bringing a woman to Christ and stand by and see her children sold, one by one, into heathenism? I then said I would ask God to help care for them and to assume the support of the family. God then sent me money for two, through a letter from a lady in America whom I had no recollection of meeting, but who knew about me and wrote me saying that she had two children, and wished to have each of them have a namesake in China, so she wrote to ask me if I would find two children, a Rachel and a Norman, for her. The children were waiting and needed no finding, so God provided.

When I went to America on furlough, I had a waiting list of children, and was praying God to lead me to friends to adopt them. I was worn out and went to Castile Sanitarium to Dr. Greene, who told me that I must not open my mouth to talk missions for a month. I dared not ask for permission, when one after another asked me to speak. There was a lady there from Nashville, Tenn.—Mrs. Byrd Douglas, who was soon to return home—and each day when I passed her on the verandah, she would catch hold of my arm affectionately and say, "Oh, Miss Hartwell, you will talk some Sunday night before I leave, won't you?" Finally I said, "I want to, but you know the doctor won't agree; but if you ask perhaps she will allow it to please you before you leave." So she asked and the doctor consented.

When I went to the sanitarium I had been led to pray about the table at which I was to sit. That table, or rather its occupants, gave me support for my family of children. This was the way of it. That night, I talked to a lady, the widow of a former governor of Vermont, Mrs. Farnham, who was moved to give a five-dollar bill which was found in her husband's pocket when he died. It was a very precious five-dollar bill and she wanted to make it grow, so she went around and asked others to give, and she secured pledges for five children for my family. That was consecrated money, and it turned into consecrated children. Mrs. Douglas' boy became the valedictorian of his class in English in Foochow College and then entered the ministry, choosing a place no one else wanted. Last November he was called home, but he left his little son with the wish that he should fill his place when he is grown to be a man. Another of the boys is now the general superintendent of the Sunday school work for his mission, and his sister is entering upon special evangelistic work, in connection with the girls' college from which she has graduated. One is now teaching in one of our girls' day schools. Her brother is a working man, earning an honest living.

WHEN the Revolution came and the Manchus were driven out, Miss Wiley and I were raising funds to feed a list of 1,100 needy ones. The son of Mrs. Farnham helped organize the Beacon Hill Farm Association and Mrs. Byrd Douglas was chairman of a committee that raised funds for the Cordelia A. Greene Memorial Girls' Industrial School, in which not only the Manchu girls of the Beacon Hill Farm Association live, but some of the girls of the Christian Herald Homes also.

And now I am praying over the children's pictures for the Christian Herald—just what children's pictures shall go in, and just when they shall be printed, and just who shall be led to see them and to adopt the children who need foster-parents.

Somewhere there is a father, or mother, or brother, or sister who wants to adopt one of these boys or girls. It is all in the great Father's heart of love and when his time comes, it cannot fail; but we must pray to know his time. Mary Lyon taught her girls that she feared only one thing, which was that she would fail to know or do her duty. God has led me to many a closed door and bid me wait; but when His time came, the door always opened.

I have thought it would interest you to see the new home of us women missionaries of the Woman's Board of Missions of the Interior, Chicago, which I have had the task of buying during the past few years. It was built originally by the abbot of Kushan Monastery (the third most famous monastery in China and located on the Kushan Mountain, street" and had been led to Christ by the homecoming of her son, a Chinese physician on a gunboat which had been stationed at Port Arthur, where he heard the truth through some Lutheran missionaries. I then understood why my service had been simply one of prayer. The teaching was to be done at Port Arthur until this time. The money and the oppor-

By Prayer and Fasting

ON the first day of the month, a resolution was introduced in the United States Senate by Senator Gallinger of New Hampshire, requesting the President to proclaim "a day of public humiliation, prayer, and fasting, to be observed by the people of the United States with religious solemnity and offering of fervent supplications to Almighty God for the safety and welfare of our cause, his blessing on our arms, and speedy restoration of an honorable and lasting peace." The introducer asked for immediate consideration of the resolution, and it was adopted without debate.

With a Song on Their Lips

THERE is an inspiration in the picture of 100,000 Americans—the flower of our nation's young manhood—going singing into battle. Such a scene, though presented in but a single sentence by the cable, thrills all who read it. We seem to see that gallant army advancing with sunlit faces, to which the confidence of a great and just cause and the certainty of ultimate victory impart a splendid enthusiasm that can best find its expression in song.

If any one ever had a thought that the hearts of our people are not in this war, that thought is now dispelled. For many months past the war spirit has been growing, until now it has become a national conviction that this Republic, with its unlimited resources, must take its part in the gigantic struggle between despotism and democracy. As we see our brave lads departing by tens of thousands to join their brothers at the front, the spirit of America is awakened within us and our hearts and prayers go with them.

Always, down the whole line of our national life, we have fought on the side of freedom and humanity. Now we are at the crossroads in the greatest of struggles, and for the same principles for which American blood has been poured out on many a battlefield. We shall not regret sacrifices if they come, for the cause is one which we firmly believe has the divine approval. And it is in this spirit, this belief, that our men, advancing on the plains of Picardy, go singing to the front. They fight that tyranny may fall, that liberty may be made secure for the nations of earth, and that wars may cease and enduring peace be restored to the world. May God bless them and keep them! May he who is ever on the side of righteousness, fight with them against the enemy, and crown their efforts with such results as will be a glorious augury for the future welfare of the world.

Time for Spiritual Stock-Taking

WITH the announcement of the Third Liberty Loan, it is necessary for many of us once more to have a spiritual stock-taking. We have to ask ourselves not only if we are prepared to assist our government to the utmost, but whether we can do so whole-souledly and with complete satisfaction. To many, the thought of war is abhorrent. The mere fact that the United States is at war may be sufficient to cause us to rally to the support of our country; but unless we can honestly and earnestly accept this war as our own, and feel that it is a war for righteousness and justice, the feeling of abhorrence will persist. Can we say with Elihu Root: "This is not a war for Serbia, nor for Alsace-Lorraine, nor for Poland, nor even for Belgium; it is a war between civilization and barbarism, between Odin and Christ!"

Perhaps we can even say this, feeling every word to be true, and yet be unable wholly to rid ourselves of the somber thought of the hundreds of thousands who are being hurried into eternity. At such a moment we are reminded, not of the utterance of any present-day publicist, but rather of the solemn words of the psalmist: "As for man, his days are as grass, as a flower of the field so he flourisheth; for the wind passeth over it and it is gone, and the place thereof shall know it no more. But the mercy of the Lord is from everlasting to everlasting, and his righteousness unto children's children, to such as keep his covenants, and to those that remember his commandments to do them."

It is for this righteousness that America is waging this war. And our children and our children's children will be proud that it was waged; for it is by this righteousness and by this alone that America as a nation can be exalted and made worthy of enduring.

Bearing these facts in mind, we can enter confidently and even gladly into this campaign to raise the necessary funds with which the war may be hastened to a speedy conclusion, and a peace promulgated that shall have the promise of permanency.

For some of us to do our full part will unquestionably involve sacrifice. What will be the effect of these sacrifices? It will be said that we shall clothe, feed, and protect our American soldiers; that we shall help to support those valiant missionaries, the army chaplains. All true, but behind lies a still larger truth. We shall be entering into the fuller, richer Christian experience. Through sacrifice, the life of the individual will be quickened spiritually and the life of the Church marvelously expanded.

Sacrifice for righteousness sake! Is it not that we may have lacked just that willingness to sacrifice? May not this have been the very reason why we have marked the mercy drops falling, but wondered why the showers of blessing did not pour upon our work?

To those who realize the cause for which appeal is made, the sacrifice demanded should be a means of grace. Such will give cheerfully and immediately, and they will prize the privilege of aiding the effort to establish righteousness and justice in the world.

Buy Liberty Bonds, preach Liberty Bonds, pray Liberty Bonds!

In many churches it has been the custom to inscribe on rolls of honor the names of those represented by the stars of the service flag. In the new Liberty Bond campaign, it should be the pride of every church and every Sunday school to have a roll of honor, on which are inscribed the names of those who have held in memory and helped to support and comfort the boys who grew up in the Sunday school, and who, "somewhere in France," yearn to sit once more in the pew.

It is for the Church to show that religion is not a failure because the heathen rage, and their people "imagine a vain thing" which they blasphemously call "the German God."

The task of raising this new loan will tax the efforts of all who love their country and who love righteousness. Let us approach our share in this task with our prayers supplemented with our pocketbooks, so that when the campaign is ended, America may repeat the words of Abraham Lincoln: "Nobly sustained as the government has been by all the churches, I would utter nothing that might appear in the least invidious against any." And the great War President invoked the blessing of God upon the Church.

Save Wheat and Save Civilization

WE have got to reach the point, each one of us, where we define every decision in our lives as an act of war policy. Everything that we do, plan, eat, wear, must be analyzed and measured from one single point of view—will it contribute to the carrying on of the war, or will it contribute to its prolongation? There is no other thing in the world for us just now but to define everything in our lives as acts of military necessity or policy.

The present necessity for us is to get a clear conception of the relation of wheat in the human diet and to divest ourselves of all preconceptions that a life of generations of ease, indolence and luxury has bred in us.

We are accustomed to regard wheat as a more or less indispensable article of diet. It isn't. Dr. Alonzo E. Taylor, of the United States Food Commission, officially declares: "Wheat is an article of luxury, and absolutely nothing else. Wheat possesses over oats, corn and rice absolutely no nutritional quality for man or beast. It has no more protein, and no better protein. It has no more fat and no different fat. It has no mineral salt better or in larger amounts. It has no more fuel or better fuel. It is just one of the cereals, and there isn't the slightest evidence that it is the best one, because, so far as comparative tests are concerned in animals, it isn't the best one; it is very far from the best one. Our predilection for wheat is solely a question of taste, comfort and convenience; it is absolutely nothing else."

We have all to decide whether we will serve the Allies, who need help the most, or whether we will serve ourselves who need it less. We had better begin serving the Allies now. They are fighting our cause. Shall we fail to make the sacrifices necessary to sustain them?

America has had the easier part in the war up to this time. The present crisis throws responsibilities upon us which we must not hesitate to bear. The gravest and most pressing of these responsibilities is defined by Food Administrator Hoover in a recent speech at a national meeting of hotel men.

"Our wheat situation is today the most serious situation in the food supply of the whole Allied world," he said. "We have had a stock taking in the early days of March and we find that our harvest was less than it was estimated. There is also another and more bitter difficulty in the delays of shipping, in the growing scarcity of ships, that has thrown a larger burden upon the American people in feeding the Allies than we had anticipated. We had all expected that the Argentine supply would be available in Europe before this time. Those supplies will not arrive for another two months in quantity, and even then will be less than we had expected. The consequence is that the supply of breadstuffs in Europe is at its lowest ebb. There is but one source of supply, and that is the United States.

"Therefore, my message is small and concrete—the service that we ask of you, that we ask of every well-to-do, every independent person in the United States today is, that he shall abstain from the use of wheat in any form until the next harvest."

The Food Administration has never taken the attitude of the general in command giving orders. Its attitude to the public has been consistent, that it should ask for service, that it should ask for self-sacrifice, that it should tell in a clear and direct way the why and wherefore of every request.

But inexorable circumstances form laws unto themselves, and disobedience means inevitable disaster. The people of our country must awake to the fact that bread is even more decisive than bullets and that every ounce of wheat saved helps our cause.

Support for Our Boys Over There

MOST Rev. Cosmo Gordon Lang, Archbishop of York and Primate of England, is very anxious to see the Third Liberty Loan succeed. Coming from England, he realizes acutely the need for aid. Great Britain is battling splendidly to hold back the Prussian hordes, but America must help back her up. The final outcome of this war admittedly rests in the hands of the Americans. The archbishop says:

"Although I am only a visitor to this country, I am happy to add one word to the many appeals which are being made at this time, that the people of America should do all that lies in their power to insure the success of the Liberty Loan. I have been impressed and refreshed, since my arrival in this country, by the vastness of the resources which the United States is able to place at the disposal of the Allied cause; and of the widespread and increasing determination of the American people to carry the war through to that end for which the free nations of the world are now happily united in a common effort."

There is no more practical way by which this determination can be expressed just now than by the securing of a steady flow of money from all classes of the community into the coffers of the government.

The sooner the irresistible might of this great Republic is organized and put into full action, the sooner the war will end. Every dollar invested in government securities works to shorten the war, to save the lives of American soldiers and sailors.

From hundreds of thousands of American homes, in answer to the call of their country and in obedience to the demands of humanity, American boys have gone forth and today are confronting danger and death. The duty of us who remain at home in safety to afford the means to make these boys powerful and victorious is a most imperative one.

The Preachers Appealed To

EVERY minister, priest and rabbi in the United States is to be asked to join in the campaign that aims to insure this year record-breaking crops of every farm product.

The United States Department of Agriculture, through the States Relations Service and by co-operation with the Federal Council of Churches, is sending a special letter to all preachers, asking their assistance in the Food-Production Campaign.

The preachers are being asked to get in touch with county agents and with the State Extension Service, which represents the State Agricultural College and the United States Department of Agriculture, and to devote as much time as possible during the remaining days of April to enlightening their people regarding the necessity of local food-production. They are being furnished with data regarding the great burdens upon the transportation system of the country, and, in sections where the food-production is insufficient for local needs, a special message is being sent to urge increased production to meet local demands.

No class will be found more ready to respond to any and all demands upon its patriotism than the ministry. The service now requested is a most important one.

The Inclusive Sacrifice

SUNDAY, April 21. II Cor. 8:5. "They first gave their own selves unto the Lord." They gave their own selves to the Lord, and then they gave their money. The one followed the other in natural and vital succession. If the first gift is sincere, the second gift is certain. If the first gift is partial and hesitant, the second gift will be maimed and reluctant. The vital gift of self is gloriously inclusive of every other offering. It is the whole circle which encloses the varied segments. It is the integer which covers the fractions. It is the great surrender which draws everything else into its train.

When self has been yielded to the Lord, all other interests and possessions in our life will bear the marks of the Lord Jesus. Everything and every circumstance will be regarded and welcomed as part of the surrendered host. The healthy spiritual life is not so much a procession of sacrifice as a spirit of inclusive consecration. The queen bee has winged her flight in a certain direction and the entire swarm is in her train.

Now this is the secret of the Christian life, to make the inclusive sacrifice. Religious life is inevitably tedious when it consists of a conscious yielding of our smaller things and a withholding of our central strength. It is one thing to surrender individual dollars, it is quite another thing to consecrate our wealth. It is one thing to build altars here and there on the road, it is quite another thing to consecrate the journey. It is one thing to be religious in spasmodic conflicts, but it is quite another thing to hallow the entire campaign. If our self is kept back from the Lord our religion will be a procession of reluctances and irritations. Every circumstance will present a separate problem instead of being caught up in the sweep of a mighty consecration. And that is the trouble with a great many people. They try to be religious in smaller surrenders while the great surrender has never been made. And these smaller surrenders encounter curbs and restraints, and the soul is annoyed and discordant. The large surrender brings us into God's large place. We pass into the glorious freedom of God's children, and his statutes become our songs. J. H. J.

The Beatitude of the Hungry

MONDAY, April 22. Matt. 5:6. "Blessed are they that do hunger and thirst after righteousness: for they shall be filled." In answer to the question of a scientist, addressed to some hundreds of bright young men and women, as to what induced them to take the first step in the Christian life, two persons, one a woman and the other a man, replied, "I felt homesick for God." "I felt my life was incomplete without Christ." The prayer of Augustine strikes this same note: "O God, thou didst make us for thyself, and we are not at rest except in thee." A generation ago a young and brilliant college professor wrote in his diary, an intimate personal journal which he intended no other human eye to see, "What I want is Perfection; what I am hungry for is the Absolute, the Unconditioned. I will be satisfied with nothing short of the Infinite." The man was sick, but his mind was not sick. His thoughts were clear as any star. Our age has seen no more brilliant mind than that of this man—Henri Amiel. He was still young when he knew he was afflicted with an incurable disease. Indeed, he knew he was dying when he said, "Nothing but the Eternal can complete my life." That was yearning, longing, hunger and thirst. And, in our best moments, we all have it. The function of religion is to satisfy this deep desire of the soul for experiences which transcend the limits of earth and time. "Oh taste and see that the Lord is good." "The secret of the Lord is with them that fear him." C. C. A.

Conscience

TUESDAY, April 23. Rom. 2:15. "Their conscience bearing witness, and their thoughts the meanwhile accusing or else excusing one another." Paul is speaking of the Gentiles, but what he says about conscience applies to all men. They all have in their heart an approving or disapproving censor of their actions. The conscience in them is an inexorable judge, who will not be bribed or intimidated, whose decisions are flashed into man's consciousness quick as lightning, and whose verdict is always quite simple and intelligible: Guilty, or Not guilty. Men can ignore the decision which their conscience renders upon their actions; by habitually setting aside its ruling they can render themselves impervious to its warning voice; by a supreme effort they may momentarily stifle their consciences. In such cases there is said to be a sleeping or a dead conscience. But the conscience is not really dead. "As the winter-frozen serpent seems lifeless, but is only benumbed, and when brought to the fire again feels and uncoils and stings, so when conscience is asleep it is not dead." Suddenly it awakes, it may be because of some outward provocation, as a remark during a conversation that has some bearing on certain facts of a person's inner life, but it may also be without any palpable cause. Thoughts are arising in a person's mind for which he cannot account by anything that he is engaged in at the time. He is made to wince as if an accuser has pointed a finger at him. Men cannot rid themselves of the invisible inspector, not only of their public acts, but of their most private thoughts. The important question now is: How can a person make this silent monitor in his bosom his friend? For if he is not his friend, he will be his enemy. Jesus alone can give a person a good conscience. His atoning sacrifice has purged men's consciences. Baptized into him, we have our hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience. By constantly appropriating the merits of his sacrificial life and death, we keep our conscience at peace, and his godly teaching and example enforce the urging of our good conscience and keep us from wanton sins against our conscience. W. H. T. D.

His Power to Save

WEDNESDAY, April 24. II Cor. 3:18. "We are changed into the same image by the spirit of the Lord." Jake Parsons, a worthless, drunken wretch, awoke from a night's debauch a changed man. He says that on that night, "Jesus appeared to me in my sleep. His face seemed so pure, so lovely and so friendly to me that when I awoke I found I loved my Saviour. I could no longer displease him. He did not speak to me, he only looked at me, but his look told me I could be forgiven and purified. When I looked at him, I was too happy to be afraid, and when I looked at myself, I was too afraid to be happy." It is said that for thirty-five years Parsons led a blameless life till he fell asleep in Jesus. One such experience should be sufficient to assure doubting hearts that Christ is an almighty Saviour.

If our God in nature can evolve the diamond out of black carbon, if he can create the rich ruby and opal out of sand and clay, if he can grow the whitest lily out of the blackest earth, why should we doubt his ability, by his own higher alchemy, to transform the darkest heart into the whitest purity? Nay, more, if man can produce beautiful paper from black rags or from the dark log of a tree, if he can make shining porcelain out of mud, valuable statuary out of worthless stone, ornamental and useful glass out of sand, if man can reproduce all the forms and figures of nature, the sunsets, the mountains, the forests and flowers, and by hatching God's forces to his chariot can make them carry all his commerce, turn all his wheels, if man can turn night into day, distance into nearness, copying the bird and the lightning in the flight of his thought and person, if he can perform miracles like these, shall we limit his Maker, who has endowed man with such mighty faculties, and who has created the forces which enable men to act with almost superhuman power? Who, then, will question the ability of the heavenly Father to bring purity out of sinfulness, strength out of weakness, heaven out of hell? E. W. C.

Christianity's One Great Theme

THURSDAY, April 25. John 1:4. "In him was life, and the life was the light of men." Phillips Brooks was talking with a little group of his friends. He said, "I have preached a great many sermons, but as I review them, they may all be included in a single one. I have had but one theme and one plea." It was supremely true of that princely preacher. His theme in youth and maturity was ever the enrichment of life by the acceptance of Jesus Christ as the absolute revelation of the Father. That theme never grows old or tiresome. It is capable of infinite variations. The primary colors are few, but think what beauty flashes from them. The musical notes are few, but think how love and life, with all their emotions, are expressed by them.

This indeed is the great message of Christianity to the world in all ages. Human life is the same. Burdens are still heavy. Phantom lights still beckon, which, if we follow, will lead us into deep morasses or over perilous precipices. Selfishness is still selfish, and sin is still spiritual death. God is near, and Christ is God's answer to our need for more abundant life. We have as much to leave as the early disciples had when they left all and followed the Master. We have as much to gain by following him as they had—and as much to lose if we hear his voice and fail to follow him, in whom alone is life at its best. C. C. A.

The Perfect Love

FRIDAY, April 26. II Cor. 12:15. "I will very gladly spend and be spent for you; though the more abundantly I love you, the less I be loved." Thus spoke Paul, the great apostle, to the congregation at Corinth. Of all the disheartening experiences with which his ministry among the Gentiles was replete, the soul-trials which he underwent because of the unjust censure of his person and his labors by the Corinthians were the most painful. The words at the head of this meditation occur near the close of his glorious defense. They show that the humiliations to which he had been subjected had not made him peevish. He still commands powers of resistance which are able to defeat the powers of opposition arrayed against him. That power in him is his unselfish love. He has gloried in the fact that his ministrations have cost the Corinthians nothing. He provided his own support while serving them. What he has earned by the labor of his hands he will willingly spend in their service, and in addition he will spend himself. He will wear himself out, devoting the last ounce of strength in proclaiming to them the love of Christ who became poor that we might be made rich, and in guiding them with the gentle patience of a loving friend into the full knowledge of that heavenly truth and compassion for sin-blinded and ungrateful men that is without parallel in the annals of the human race. He expects nothing in return for the absolute sacrifice which he is making of himself and all his powers of body and mind. Love should beget love, but he is willing to forego also this happy reward of his generous service. Even if the reverse should happen, and he should receive an increasingly cold treatment for his redoubled zeal in loving them, he will not complain. The elevated sentiments here avowed were fully carried out. Ultimately they won the day for Paul also at Corinth. Love conquers all obstacles and is conquered by nothing. W. H. T. D.

Cut Down in Youth

SATURDAY, April 27. Ps. 102:24. "I said, O my God, take me not away in the midst of my days." Every young soldier in the world war can well pray that prayer. Is it not natural to long to live till the harvest time of life, till the ripened grain is ready to be gathered into the garner? How unnatural for the sun to go down in the morning; how we long to journey till the evening time when we wrap the drapery of our couch about us and awake in God's eternal morning! Here we behold one of the cruelties of the awful demon war. What an appetite the monster has for the youth of the land who are just stepping across the threshold of being! Millions of throbbing hearts, budding hopes, bright eyes and rosy faces have failed to satisfy the terrible hunger of the maw of war. Other millions are crowding in where these have disappeared, down his hellish throat.

O War! What a waste of riches is drunk up in thine awful maelstrom! Not of gold only, but of golden manhood. Would that war itself could perish as the beast dieth rather than the noble, heroic young men.

One consoling thought we have: life is not in years, but deeds; one may be old and yet unprepared to change worlds. If for you to live is Christ, to die at any time is gain, for you enter sooner the broader field and grander opportunities of the endless future, and are shielded from the temptations and trials of time. Remember that your divine Captain finished his work while in young manhood, and that you are following him up your Calvary of self-sacrifice for your country and your God. E. W. C.

Seat of the World's Ancient Civilization as Seen at the Present Day.—By MAYNARD OWEN WILLIAMS

EDITOR'S NOTE: Turkestan, Bokhara and Afghanistan, through which our correspondent has just traveled, have suddenly become a new theater of the great war, as the Central Powers' proposed route to India and China, cessions by Russia giving over this vast territory to Teutonic exploitation.

HISTORY, like Homer, was born in several different places, and enough cradles of civilization are recognized by scholars in which to rock the world. The claims of Egypt and Mesopotamia have been repeated so often that even Damascus runs the risk of being disputed when she claims to be a genuine antika, mellowed by time. But there is something to be said for Turkestan. The Murghab, the Zeravshan and the Oxus are as old as the Nile, the Tigris and the Euphrates, and the peoples who live beside them are as wrinkled and bent with age as are the Egyptians. But the hands that once rocked the cradles of civilization no longer rule the world.

Our doorway to Turkestan was Krasnovodsk, a mediocre city consisting of a railway station, two churches, several wharves and other things too numerous to mention. It has spread itself out at the base of some tawny hills very much like the African hills along the Red Sea and basks in the desert sun with a supreme disregard for its own slovenliness. Not only is the railway station the main architectural feature of the town. Its sentimental value is only equaled by that of the several wharves. If history ever emigrated from Krasnovodsk, it simply obeyed the common impulse.

From here, the Central Asia Railway runs southeast as far as Dushak, keeping as close to the Persian frontier as possible, after which it turns to the east and north till it reaches the mud walls of Bokhara. Then it goes on past Samarkand and splits into a Y whose arms reach to Tashkent and Andizhan, directly south of Omsk and north of Bombay. From Andizhan to Chengtu, in West China, whence I set out on my Russian pilgrimage, is about two thousand miles overland and I went seven times as far to get there.

TURKESTAN is a monotonous land of desert dust and dreariness. Yet it is traversed by six large rivers and in many places irrigation has made it a fertile land. Its inhabitants insist that in spring there are green spots here and there, but in few places is there enough rain to give an annual housecleaning to the dusty trees and shrubs. Turkestan, including the Khanate of Khiva and the Emirate of Bokhara, is three times as big as Texas, yet it is almost lost in the Russian domain. It has as many people as New York and Massachusetts combined and there are as few Russians there as there are native-born Americans in Manhattan. Its two largest rivers keep a small sea about the size of Vermont, New Hampshire and Massachusetts from drying up into a salt pile.

The first point of interest along the line is the Akhal Oasis, which can easily be distinguished in spring but resembles the desert in the late fall and winter. It is the largest oasis in Turkestan, 160 miles long and about ten miles wide. Here dwell the Tekke Turkomans, huge, fine-looking men who wear sheepskin hats a foot high. Many of them are more than six feet tall and one of them, looking at the Professor, who is six feet five, had to admit that his great skyscraper hat was all that saved him.

The Turkomans used to be the most dreaded robbers in all of Central Asia and the Russians had a hard time conquering them. The last stand of these magnificent rascals was at Dengil Tepe, where Skobelev stormed their great mud fortress after a siege of more than three weeks and defeated 25,000 armed men with one-fourth their number. In those days, the Russians were fighters, but one wonders how they ever had the courage to attack these desert giants, whose cruelty was well known. The Turkoman spots where the successive editions of Merv stood. Merv is mentioned in the Zoroastrian books of wisdom and like every other old city owed its existence to a river—the Murghab. Seleucus Nikator once founded a colony here and for a considerable period it was the home of a large band of Nestorians. But it was not until the Arabs, to whom modern civilization owes so much, took charge, soon after the death of Mahomet, that Merv became a true metropolis. Huge dams were erected on the Murghab and the entire oasis was well watered from the irrigating ditches. Merv then rivaled Bagdad as the greatest city in the Orient.

Five centuries later, Jhenghis Khan, enraged by the death of his son before the ramparts of the queen city of the world, utterly destroyed it. The Arabic writers assert that nearly a million persons were killed at this time. Arabic writers estimate figures in a typically free handed way.

For two hundred years Merv was a ruin, but in the fifteenth century it was rebuilt and continued to exist until 1795, when the Emir of Bokhara destroyed the wonderful dam at Sultan Bent and thus turned the lovely oasis into a desert. Massive as they are, the ruins of Old Merv are devoid of interest. The young Commissar in speaking of the ruins said, "What sighs and tears these crumbling walls have cost!"

Three beautiful horses, furnished by the government and driven by a picturesque old coachman in a red shirt and sash, black vest and white coachman's hat whirled us back through the various sites of ruined cities to the small town of Bairam Ali where a new system of irrigation is building up a new city. Old Merv is an interesting proof of the "Sie Transit Gloria Mundi" phrase but it was built in "Sie Transit" style, of sun-baked bricks. Only a battered mosque, a great convent and several huge bee-hive ice houses remain above the scarred plain where great cities stood.

AFTER lunch, we set off through the demesne for Hindoo Kush, where there is a dam and an electric generating station. There was not time to drive to Sultan Bent, the site of the old dam and of a new one whence the water comes for irrigating the demesne of 300,000 acres. The government maintains a fine experiment station and sells water to the farmers, but does not farm any large part of the estate itself. There is a modern cotton ginning mill in Bairam Ali with machinery for extracting cottonseed oil and making briquettes for fuel from the hulls. But this year has been a very bad year on the demesne.

Many of the laborers are Austrian prisoners. One can't help liking these fellows. They are industrious. They mind their own business but salute stiffly when noticed. I have never heard of their making trouble and the Russians are said to like them as workers.

The thirty-mile drive to Hindoo Kush was full of interest. On both sides were the well-irrigated fields of the demesne and one could always see the transmission towers which the ignorant shepherds use as observation points until the high pressure current kills them. A tradition has grown up that a devil lurks in the wires and the Afghan shepherds are gradually coming to give him a wide berth.

Pheasants ran along beside us at many places and as night drew on a jackal stopped in his flight to howl a protest. We visited the black tents of two Afghan caps must have had much the same effect as did the heavily moustached war masks of the Japanese samurai.

When one sees how well the erect Turkoman with his stalking camel or his loping horse fits this desert vastness he wonders why the Russians wanted to conquer them and humble them as they did. Was it the valley of the Indus that beckoned them as it had Alexander's army, or was it protection against these robber bauds?

AT Geok Tepe, which is the station beside the mud walls of the old Turkoman fortress, there is perpetuated a silly insult to the conquered race. Here stands a museum where the triumphant Russian exhibits paintings of the storming of the fortress and of the torturing of Russian soldiers by the Turkoman troops. For Russia at present to lord it over the lordly Turkomans is a strange anomaly, but the indomitable spirit of the desert men is said to have been broken. That individual Turkomans are not lacking in bravery is shown by the unusually large number of Georgian crosses among them. I snapped a picture of one Turkoman hero who had served in Galicia during the great retreat, while he sat on the steps of this museum which Russia has erected as a gratuitous insult in the heart of Turkoman territory.

The Turkomans owe as much of their charm to their fantastic headgear as does Gaby Deslys. When they remove them and reveal the shaved heads and embroidered skullcaps underneath, they seem commonplace. Yet there are many of the older men whose majesty of bearing is not a matter of costume alone. Their red cotton gowns or *khalat*s give them a princely stateliness which the trousered Russian with his shirt flopping lacks.

We passed by New Merv and went on to Bairam Ali, named after one of the sons of Timur, which is the station for Old Merv and the demesne of the Murghab, formerly the property of the royal family. Bairam Ali resembles the great Pyramids in that it stands between the desert and the sown. Accompanied by the twenty-year-old Commissar, a remarkably intelligent young Russian upon whom devolves the task of governing the district with a decreasing police force, we visited the various ruins which mark the

How the Kingdom and the Church Differ

I
ONE of the articles in last year's series on Prophecy was entitled, "God's Covenant with David, or The Coming Kingdom," in which it was stated that God is not now and in this age setting up his Kingdom, but doing something else, namely, building up his Church, which is called the Body of Christ. The time will come it was added, when this Body will be completed and the Church caught up to "meet the Lord in the air." (I Thess. 4:16-18). Afterward, Christ will return to the earth and in him God will set up his Kingdom which is the Kingdom promised to David and now in abeyance.

A later article bore the title, "The Place of the Church in the Plan of Redemption," where it was shown that the Church did not come into being until after the death, resurrection and ascension of Jesus Christ, i. e., on the day of Pentecost. It was also shown that the Church has a particular and a limited work to do on the earth, i. e., the building up of itself until, as a spiritual organism, it is complete or perfected, when the translation above referred to takes place.

The management of the Christian Herald believes that something more on the above themes was called for by its readers. In this article, therefore, the Kingdom and the Church are brought together in one view, in such a way that it may be seen more clearly how they differ.

II
TO speak first of the Kingdom. The word is a translation of the Greek "basileia," and is never translated any other way. There are two phrases descriptive of it in the New Testament, "the Kingdom of God" and "the Kingdom of Heaven," which in the popular mind are identical and interchangeable, but this is an error. The first is the broader and more comprehensive term, universal in fact, "including all moral intelligences who are willingly subject to God." These are the good angels, the saints of all past and future dispensations, and the true Church of the present dispensation. (See Luke 13:28, 29; Heb. 12:22, 23.)

On the other hand, the Kingdom of Heaven, as distinguished from the Kingdom of God, is a limited designation, and takes its rise in the divine promise to David in II Samuel 7:10-17. The story is like this: At the creation of man God gave into his hands the dominion over all the earth, which man lost to Satan at the fall, the latter then becoming the "prince of this world" (cf. Gen. 1:26-28 with Matt. 4:8-10, and John 14:30). Immediately, however, God revealed his remedial purpose in Jesus Christ, the seed of the woman, who should bruise the serpent's head (Gen. 3:15). This purpose was to restore the dominion to man, and through man, again to bring it back to himself. Two thousand years later this purpose further revealed itself in the divine call of Abraham to become the father of the nation of Israel (Gen. 12:1-7). This nation was to be instrumental in the execution and fulfillment of the original purpose. Again, one thousand years after the call of Abraham, and when the nation which had come out of his loins was established in its land, and David his descendant was reigning over it, that purpose still further revealed itself in the promise to David that the Lord would set up his seed after him and establish his kingdom forever (II Sam. 7:10-17). This is the beginning of the Kingdom of Heaven.

it is to be realized or manifested in heaven, but because the thought of it originated there, in God's purpose of love and grace toward his creatures, and because it is heavenly in its principles and in its authority. In other words, to quote Dan. 2:44, it is "the Kingdom of Heaven" because "the God of heaven" shall set it up, but it will be set up on earth, nevertheless, and will have Jerusalem as its capital (Isa. 24:23; Joel 3:16, 17). At first it will be established over Israel when she shall have been regathered to Palestine and converted to Jesus Christ as her Saviour and Messiah; but ultimately it will be established over the whole earth (Ps. 2:8; Isa. 2:1-4; Ezek. 37:21-25; Zech. 9:10).

Furthermore, the thought that God is to set up the Kingdom of Heaven should be dissociated in our minds from any idea that man will set it up. That is, it will not be brought to pass by any legislation of men, nor by any international treaties. Neither will it come by "persuasion," through the preaching of the Gospel and the progress of Christianity for example, but rather by the exercise of divine power and through purifying judgments on the world powers in connection with the second advent of Christ (See Ps. 2; Isa. 9:7; Dan. 2:35, 44, 45; Zech. 14:1-9; Rev. 19:11-16).

As the Scofield Bible says, "it is impossible to conceive to what heights of spiritual, intellectual and physical perfection humanity will attain in the coming Kingdom," but we know it will mark an age of peace and righteousness. The meek will inherit the earth in those days; longevity will be increased; beast ferocity will be removed; justice and equity will be the rule; and the great majority of earth's inhabitants will be saved by the grace of God, for colonies and bought some saddle bags from the miserable occupants. Both of us wore overcoats, but the Afghan children, dirty of face, white of teeth and bright of eye, were almost naked. The old sheik at the second place beamed with delight when I greeted him in Arabic with the customary "Peace be with you, brother" and none of the people lived up to the fierce reputation which the Afghans have won by right. At two in the morning, with the full moon still flooding the cold desert with light, an Austrian prisoner came to drive us to Yulotan on the Merv-Kushka. The day had been hot but now the cold air three degrees below freezing nipped our cheeks and added a new note to our knowledge of Turkestan. Early morning found us in Merv, pawing over the lovely rugs in the great semi-weekly market, which is twenty times as big this year as it usually is, due to the fact that the cotton crop is a failure and wheat is selling at unheard-of prices, so that rugs are the last barrier to the wolves of hunger.

TOLSTOI in his fairy-tale of Ivan the Fool tells how the devil, seeking to gain the upper hand in Ivan's kingdom, offered gold for everything until the day came when, on trying to buy a herring with a gold piece, the woman replied,

"I don't want it, my good sir. I have no children to play with it, and I myself already have three coins as curiosities." The Turkomans have almost reached the same point in regard to the new money which the Russian Government is printing off as fast as presses can run.

A hundred and fifty miles beyond Merv, the train rolls out onto the long iron bridge over the Amu Darya. The history student will weary you with the fact that the Amu Darya is the ancient Oxus; that Alexander fought here and that Antiochus Theos once ruled this territory. But no modern Russian burdens his mind with that material. He knows the Amu Darya as the river in whose valley grows the Tehardzhui dienna, a muskmelon which half the world would die to taste and the other half would die from overeating.

For the present, we will skip past Bokhara and Samarkand, those two great cities with a wonderful past, and enter the great plain of fertile Ferghana, next door to the Pamirs, with India beyond and Chinese East Turkestan.

For Ferghana is a land with a future. When the Wagon-Lits car attached to the Petrograd express slips into the station of Andizhan after its 2,770-mile run, it finds itself in one of the most beautiful and wealthy parts of the Russian domain. And the secret of the wealth is cotton. Ferghana produces nearly one-half enough to supply the Russian people, and while the Moscow factories are idle and long lines of women wait all night in the Red Square in order to buy enough cotton cloth for one-third of a dress, baled cotton is mounting higher and higher in the warehouses and stacks of Andizhan and Kokand. Alexander, Jhenghis and Timur were not so dependent upon locomotives.

We were in Kokand on the day of the Thieves' Market, which did much to make me realize how needy Russia is. There were wagon-loads of stuff there which we would pay to have carted off to the dump.

But there were many articles that were quite worth while. Kokand makes a specialty of the goitre and one person in five carries one in a prominent position. The bazaars there are dimly lighted out of deference to the class of goods that are sold.

Andizhan, however, is the brightest little city one could expect to find. An abundance of sidings, good warehouses and plenty of rolling stock greeted the eye.

Andizhan was formerly the terminus of the railway, but fifty miles have recently been added and another line reaches to Namangan, traversing the well-watered plain between the mountains that block the way to Kashgar and the others that slope away to the Hunger Steppe, home of the nomadic Khirgises. In Andizhan, one will see dromedaries and camels in the same long string, and here the driver does not ride a diminutive donkey but swings along on the back of the foremost camel.

BETWEEN Andizhan and Namangan one passes endless fields of cotton with the white bolls lighting up the dark brown mass of stalks. Cranes strut about looking for frogs in the well-watered fields and rushing waters abound.

Between Kugai and Uchkurgan we saw scores of mud wall enclosures built in seven tiers of huge blocks and from ten to fourteen feet high. Inside were the homes, the barnyards and the sheepfolds and the idea seemed to be to catch the sun and ward off the cold winds that sweep across this plain in winter. At the corners of the walls there was a curving up-slant, reminding one of the Chinese temple roof and possibly indicating Chinese influence here in the heart of Asia.

Andizhan was our terminus. But the thought of Kashgar and of the pass into India, away from the puffing locomotives and the electric lights, made us wish that it was our starting point for a longer journey to the valley of the Ganges or the heights of Tibet.

The Measure of a Man

By GRACE LIVINGSTON HILL LUTZ
Author of "The Witness"

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

JANET GRAYSON and Harley Bruce had grown up as playmates and school comrades in the village of Springdale until Harley left for college. When on his return he called at the Grayson house, he was accompanied by Lotta Lomond, whose appearance and manner were in marked contrast to the simplicity of the village girl. Harley took the girls out for a spin in his car, in which they were accompanied by Thaddeus Wiltrone, a worldly-wise young friend of Lotta's. The next morning he called, but found that Janet had gone on a trip to New York, from which she returned on an evening train. Next Sunday Janet was relieved to see Harley at his old place as teacher of his class of boys in the Sunday school. But on Sunday evening she received a visit from the aristocratic mother of Harley Bruce, who had come to explain to Janet how impossible it would be for her son to find anything in common with a simple country girl.

CHAPTER IV

WHEN Janet came dashing in at the front door her mother was seated quietly in the library reading at the big mahogany table under the drop light. The girl appeared in the doorway breathless, like a sudden bit of landscape torn out of a storm. There was lightning and thunder in her white face and flashing eyes, there were drenching tears behind the flashes. With the breath of a sob she gasped out:

"Oh, mother! Go out and talk to Mrs. Bruce quick! I can't!"

"Why, dear child!" said her mother aghast, "what do you mean?"

But she was gone up the stairs, and when her mother reached the hall there was nothing but the echo of her turning key in the lock of her door above. Bewildered, Mrs. Grayson stepped to the front door and looked out, but her eyes were blinded by the light and she saw nothing. She went uncertainly down the steps and peered out into the yard, but there was no one there. With a confusion of fears she went up and tapped on Janet's door, calling gently: "Janet, dear, let mother in."

At first there was no response but smothered sobs, but finally the door was reluctantly opened and Mrs. Grayson sat down on the bed and took her daughter in her arms, soothing her gently until at last she was comparatively quiet.

"Now, dear, tell mother all about it."

The girl shuddered and the tears came once more.

"Oh, mother! I can't! It was dreadful! I hate her! Yes, I do, mother! I can't help it!" sobbed Janet wildly.

"Why, darling! What can be the matter! You must explain! Has anything happened to Harley?"

"Don't speak his name!" said the girl shrinking visibly, "I never can look him in the face again!"

"Oh, yes, you can, daughter! If Harley is all right he can't be affected by anything his mother has done, I'm sure. She always was a peculiar woman, you know."

"Oh, you don't understand, mother! Such disgrace! Such humiliation!" moaned Janet.

"There, now, Janet! You are going too far. There is no disgrace where you have done no wrong. Come! Explain this matter to me at once. What happened? Why did Mrs. Bruce come here?"

WHEN the story was finally told Mrs. Grayson sat silently smoothing her daughter's hair.

"Dear," she said at last, "if I were you I wouldn't mind that so terribly. We've known what Mrs. Bruce was for years. It is humbling to your pride, of course, to have her take you for a common, ignorant girl who is running after her son; but inasmuch as we know, and Harley knows, that this is not so, what can it all really matter? Of course it makes me indignant that she should take my pearl of a girl for a creature like that; but then she doesn't really know you, hasn't seen you for years until tonight, remember, and you say she only saw you in the dark then. It seems to me that the very sound of your voice must have conveyed some sense of what you were to the duldest ears, but I doubt if she has fine perceptions. She couldn't have or she wouldn't tolerate the people she has around her whenever she comes here. They are always loud-voiced, gaudily dressed, coarse-looking people. She might not be able to appreciate my little girl even if she saw her in broad daylight. It is a wonder of wonders that Harley has always been so fine with such a mother. You think he is just as fine as ever, don't you, daughter?"

"Oh, I don't know," sighed Janet wearily. "He seems so, but he has to live with such people, and there are so many things pulling him another way, and I have had so little chance to talk with him about real things—"

"But I thought he seemed glad to be back on Sunday—"

"Yes, I know," sighed Janet, "but somehow since his mother has been here everything is all mixed up again. I can't bear the thought of her, and I can't see how I can ever speak to Harley again!"

The girl dropped her face into the pillow and sobbed softly. Her mother patted her gently on the soft hair and was silent awhile. Finally she said thoughtfully:

"How would you like me to go and see her, Janet?"

Janet sat up on the bed as if she had been shot up, and her eyes flashed in the darkness.

"No, no, no! Mother! Never! She shall not have a chance to insult you too!"

"Why, she could scarcely do that!" laughed her mother amusedly, "and I really don't think I should mind if she did. I know that I have quite a large circle of people who respect me and who loved and honored your father. Why should a selfish, foolish woman like that annoy me even if she does choose to misunderstand me? She couldn't insult me if I didn't take it as an insult, dear."

"Well, she shan't have a chance," flashed Janet excitedly. "And I think it is a great deal better not to say a word, as you said first. I wouldn't have Harley know what his mother said for the world. He really loves you a lot, mother dear, and I know it would hurt him like everything that his own mother had insulted us. He may be changed in some things, but I know he wouldn't stand for that. He said once you had been more a mother to him than she had. No, mother, let's just keep quietly on our way. I'll go away a lot. I'll go over to Aunt Nan's—and perhaps—Harley will—get out of the way of coming."

SHE arose suddenly and walked over to the window looking out into the dark garden, but her mother could see the swell of her throat as she tried to keep back the tears. She longed to take her little girl in her arms and protect her from all the sorrow and harshness of the world, but she knew that could not be, and while her heart burned with indignation against the woman who had wrought such havoc of Janet's friendship, she felt that the experience might yet work out for good.

"Well, there is one thing about it," said Janet in a conquering voice as she whirled back to the light again with a steady face. "I shan't get invited to any more dinners and things over there, and I shan't have to get up excuses to keep away from that disgusting crowd they have over there. I'm sorry for Harley, for I don't believe he likes them any better than we do; but he's got to choose some time what kind of things he will have in his life, and he might as well do it now as ever. Come, Mummy, let's forget it. Come down-stairs and I'll play you the Beethoven Sonata you love so much."

JANET dashed cold water over her face, and they went down to the piano, putting aside the disagreeable subject for each other's sake. Janet played as she did not often play, and her music said deep things to her anxious mother. When they kissed each other good-night they both wore cheerful faces; yet each knew that the other's heart was burning with the sting of the insult that had been given, and with anxiety about the friend whom they had loved so long. They lay down to rest, but not to sleep, for a long time; and once Mrs. Grayson, hearing a soft drawn sigh and a stirring in her daughters' room, called softly: "Jan, dear! Are you awake?"

"Yes, mother."

"Well, I just wanted to tell you that I thought you made the very best reply to that woman that could possibly have been made. It was sweet and dignified and calm, besides telling her the plain truth! You couldn't have done better if you had prepared for the interview for months."

"Thank you, mother," said Janet in a relieved tone, "I was wondering about that."

"It was all right. Now dear, aren't you going to sleep?"

"Yes, Mummy, right away. How about you?"

"Oh, I'm asleep long ago!" And then they both laughed in a tender happy way they had over their little loving deceits.

Late on the quiet of the night under a waning moon, two motors drove up to the Bruce mansion and unloaded. Janet heard voices calling sharply through the stillness, but somehow a peace had fallen on her troubled spirit and she slipped away to sleep again.

HARLEY threw a light suitcase over to the piazza, where it slid emptily along the boards, and ran his car around to the garage. Then without saying good-night to the guests he stalked in the back way and upstairs to his mother's room, where she lay among silken cushions in a becoming negligé reading a novel.

"Mother," he said gravely, standing before her, "I've come to have this thing out with you. I can't stand this kind of thing any longer. That was a frame-up tonight to get me off on another joy ride with that abominable gang! If they have got to stay around here any longer, then I leave! The girls are a mess and the men are worse! I'm ashamed to drive through the streets with them. And those two girls didn't mean to leave on that train at all! Their suitcase was empty! There wasn't any such train as we started for, and when we got there the station was all closed up, not a soul around! Those fool girls just sat there and giggled! Now I'm done! I thought I ought to tell you."

"Harley! for pity's sake don't try to be dramatic. It doesn't suit your style. You've been in a bad humor ever since we got here. It's the place. I knew it would be so, and I didn't want to come, you remember! I wanted to go to the shore, where there would have been some life—"

"It's not the place," interrupted Harley. "It's a perfectly good place! It's the people. It's these girls you've brought down! They just infest the house. I can't stir but one of them is tagging me, and I'm sick of my life!"

"Harley, you are the most exasperating boy in the world! Where you ever got your low tastes and old-fashioned ideas I don't know. I'm ashamed of you from morning to night. I came down here to humor your whim to stick yourself off in the backwoods where there isn't a thing to do and nothing to be had fit to eat, and you repay me by prancing off to a country church and making yourself ridiculous singing in an uncouth country choir! Then you go off nobody knows where and leave your guests—"

"My guests!" cut in Harley. "Well, I rather guess not! I wouldn't have one of them if I were cast on a desert island! They aren't fit to have around!"

"Well, you certainly are hard to please, but there's another girl coming tomorrow whom you will like, I'm sure—"

"Another girl!" groaned Harley in disgust. "Heavens!"

"She's a perfectly charming girl. She's the governor's daughter! She has a large fortune in her own right."

"Hang the governor's daughter! I don't want to see another fool girl, and I won't! Do you suppose it makes her any better because she's the governor's daughter? She's only had that much more chance to get spoiled. Charming! They're all charming, only they don't charm me!"

"No, they don't charm you!" said his mother indignantly, throwing down her book and sitting erect. "Nothing charms you but a little ignorant country girl! I'm mortified to death. Ever since we came you've done nothing but run after that girl down the street. I thought after all your education and travel you would hold yourself above such things. And if you won't do it for your own sake you ought to be gentleman enough to do it for hers. You know perfectly well what it means to a simple village girl to have a man of breeding, fortune and good looks paying her attention. You know it always brings her disgrace!"

"Mother! What do you mean?"

HARLEY'S tone was stern and commanding. He was white to the lips with anger.

"I mean that I won't put up with your actions any longer. I simply won't have you running with that Grayson girl any more. Lotta says you actually invited her here to dinner, and took her with you on a motor trip! It is an insult to girls who are our guests to have you flaunt an attachment like that openly! When gentlemen do those things they at least contrive to do them secretly!"

"Take care!"

The young man clenched his hands, and took a step toward her.

"If you were a man I'd have to knock you down for that!" His voice was trembling, and his face was white with anger.

"Oh, don't let that hinder you in the least!" sneered his mother contemptuously. "By all means knock me down! You will feel much better after it. But remember that I happen to control your fortune. If I choose to cut you off you have nothing left but this place and five hundred dollars a year, barely enough to keep the place in repair!"

"What's a fortune at such a price?" he flashed, standing tall and straight with burning lights in his eyes. "I could at least run the farm and earn an honest living like a man. That would be infinitely better than being the human parasite that I am now, no better than a tramp! But, mother," and he drew a deep breath and sought to get control of himself, "you can not understand! You must have been somehow misinformed, or you would not cast contempt and insult on one of the whitest souls that ever walked the earth!"

"Oh, really! A youthful sentimentalist to be the judge, of course. Well, she may be white-souled enough for all I know, but she'll have to walk her way apart from you hereafter. I suppose she thought she had you hard and fast because her mother used to let you stay there hours at a time when you ought to have been at home with your tutor. But I've disabused her mind of that idea. I don't fancy she'll try to come here any more after last evening. I had a little talk with her and opened her eyes to a few things."

If Mrs. Bruce had not been so complacent over what she had done she would have noticed the peculiar quality of her son's voice, and his face as he looked steadily at her and said in a low, startled voice:

"You have been talking to Janet Grayson?"

"Yes, I have been talking to Janet Grayson!" she mimicked. "Is there any law against that? I merely let her know that she wasn't in your class at all, and she needn't expect anything more from you. I gave her to understand, too, what it would mean for a girl in her station if a man like you spent much time in her company. I think she understood!"

"You said that to her?"

Harley's face was aglazed. After looking steadily at his mother for a moment he hid his face in his hands and groaned. There was silence, while his mother surveyed him with a half disgusted triumph. Then he lifted his head and said in a low tone: "You must apologize." His voice was like a command.

"Apologize!" sneered his mother haughtily. "Never!"

"Oh, mother! You don't know what you have done! She will never get over it! She—"

"Oh, don't worry about her!" interrupted the mother, utterly mistaking his meaning. "I can assure you she recovered instantly and gave me a sample of her sharp, nasty tongue. She may have a white soul, but you can't say as much of her tongue. She actually had the audacity to say she wasn't sure whether you were fit to be her friend or not!"

Harley lifted his white face for an instant and looked at his mother as if she had dealt him a blow. Then he quivered from head to foot, and dropped his head with another groan.

"I was afraid she felt that way!" he murmured in a low tone of agony, "and she's about right. I'm not!" Then he turned with one last stricken look at his mother and went away down the hall to his room.

"You—fool!" called his mother with the utmost contempt in her face and voice, and then settled back to her book again. Harley would come to himself in the morning and be ready to bend his will to hers, of course. He always had. Let him have his tantrum by himself. How tall and handsome and like his father he had been as he stood there flashing his eyes at her when he was so angry! He might be something to be proud of if he only would act like other young men! Well, just wait till the governor's daughter came, and they would see!

Then the fortunes of the hero of her book engrossed her once more, and her ruffled brow gradually smoothed.

HARLEY did not come to the breakfast table, and his mother, thinking his ill humor was not yet passed off, let him alone; but when he did not appear at lunch time she was vexed and went in search of him. She found no sign of him in his room, and none of the servants could give any account of him. It was most annoying, because she wished him to go to the station to meet the governor's daughter, Miss Granniss, who was to arrive soon after two o'clock.

After lunch Mrs. Bruce sent the servants in every direction, even sending one to the Grayson house to see if her son could be found, but no Harley appeared. She herself searched his room carefully, hoping at least to find a note which would give a clue to his disappearance, but there was not even a scratch of the pen to relieve her anxiety. Not that her anxiety was for her son's safety. Far from it! She never had been known to waste time in anxious solicitude for his welfare or comfort. But her plans were upset by this continued stubbornness and absence of her son, upon whom she had counted to entertain this girl, who, to tell the truth, was somewhat out of her own line. She was not a little exercised to know how the various elements of her present household would mix, and she had counted on Harley to be a sort of insulator between the two. For Mary Granniss had the name of being rather exclusive and conventional, and nothing would have tempted her hostess to invite her if she had not been the governor's daughter, and of fortune so fair.

But Harley was undeniably and undeniably absent when Miss Granniss arrived, and Mrs. Bruce was forced to make the best of matters and send the chauffeur to meet the train, vexed anew at the thought that Harley was missing this excellent opportunity to make his first impressions upon her. What would she think of the absence of the son of the house when it had been particularly stated in the invitation that he would be at home?

SHE welcomed the girl effusively and sent her off to her room to rest, while she plied anew her search for Harley. Surely, surely he would return in time for dinner! But dinner time came, the meal was delayed as long as possible, and still he had not come. His mother with ruffled spirit but with smooth brow and smiling lips told of an unexpected business trip to the city which must have delayed him longer than he had intended; and they sat down at last, the guest of honor looking about the table in vain for some congenial face.

Mary Granniss was a tall, handsome girl with a manner that made her at ease in any company, but which somehow made the members of the present company ill at ease. There was something about her fresh, beautiful face and cultured speech that made Lotta uncomfortable, and silenced even Thaddeus Wiltrone. She was not the kind of girl on whom he usually plied his arts. She had too frank and keen a way of looking straight through a man and making him conscious of all his weaknesses and shortcomings.

The Gardner sisters, with Billy Thatcher and Eddie Love, carried on a furtive conversation among themselves full of giggles and glances; but the party did not seem to assimilate. With every word that Mary Granniss uttered her hostess wondered more and more why the girl had accepted her invitation; and as if the girl read her thoughts she suddenly said:

"Mrs. Bruce, I wonder if you know that I have a friend here in Springdale, a girl whom I love very dearly? She was my roommate in college. In fact, the hope of seeing her again was an added inducement for me to put aside three other almost engagements and accept your most kind invitation."

"Oh, how delightful!" cried Mrs. Bruce, snatching eagerly at a diversion from the labored conversation. "Where is she staying? Who does she visit here? Do tell us, and we will send for her at once. I am sure anybody stranded in Springdale will be glad to get away to a company of young people."

"Oh, she isn't visiting, she lives here!" said Mary eagerly, "and I'm sure you must know her. Nobody could live anywhere in the vicinity of Janet Grayson and her mother and not know them. They are most delightful people. Tell me, does she live near? I haven't seen her for a whole year, not since commencement last spring, when we both were graduated."

IT is a pity that Janet could not have been there to see the look of arrested eagerness on Mrs. Bruce's face pass into startled chagrin and horror, and be quickly reduced to a mask of pleasant courteous smiles. It is well that Harley did not have the pain and mortification of seeing the difference it made to his mother to have a distinguished guest speak well of Janet.

"Janet Grayson!" she murmured in a well-feigned attempt to recall the person. "Oh, yes, I believe there is such a person living here, or used to be. I think Harley knew her. You know, we have been away so many years, and have been back but a few days, so that we have scarcely had time to look around and search out our old friends. So Janet Grayson is a friend of yours? Why, how altogether charming! We shall have to look her up!"

Mrs. Bruce's remarks were by no means made easier by the fact that Lotta Lomond's stare was upon her, in amused scorn; but she struggled bravely through, wondering what in the world she was to do now. Would there be any possible way of diverting this strange girl's thoughts from her one-time friend and averting the calamity of having to open again relations that had just been so satisfactorily closed?

"Yes," went on Mary Granniss, "we are the dearest of friends. Her father was on the supreme bench of this state when my father began to practice law, and they were close friends all their lives. You know Judge Grayson belonged to the old Grayson family so noted in this state; and they are the very refinement of culture. Mrs. Grayson belonged to one of the old New York families, and she has all kinds of money; but you never would suspect it, she is such a sweet, homey, unassuming sort of person. You know her, of course? Isn't she a dear? My mother just loves her. And Janet is the brightest girl I know. In Vassar she took all kinds of honors and scholarships and things; and yet so dear and lovely with it all. She's a perfectly charming girl!"

MRS. BRUCE'S face had grown crimson with mortification, and then turned white with fear and humiliation as the recital went on. Shades of all her ambitions! What fatal blunder had she made? Judge of the Supreme Court! Old families! All kinds of money! Vassar honors! What would she not give to go back and undo the past twenty-four hours! Oh, if this girl with her revelations had but come on Saturday!

It appeared that Mary Granniss, once on the subject, could talk of nothing but the Graysons, and Mrs. Bruce, adept in guiding conversation though she was, frantically searched her brain for some more engrossing topic to introduce and failed. But this time the entire table was giving attention, even the giggling Gardners being reduced to awe over the memory of the brief ride they had taken in company with this paragon; and Thaddeus Wiltrone with somewhat heightened color was trying to recall his part in that afternoon's experience. It was not often that his discernment fell so wide of the mark.

Mrs. Bruce was searching about in her mind for some excuse for her own blindness. What right had such distinguished people to hide themselves away in that old-fashioned house, and in that isolated village? How could she be expected to know that the girl who had played with Harley had been anything but a little common village child? It was Harley's fault. Why hadn't he told her? Then her nerves fairly snapped at her guest's next question:

"You will take me to see her the first thing in the morning, won't you, Mrs. Bruce? I feel as if I could hardly wait over night. Couldn't I telephone her? You have a telephone, haven't you, even in the country?"

Mrs. Bruce gave the signal to leave the table, and tried to smile in an unconcerned way as she said indulgently:

"Oh, not tonight, my dear. Wait until morning. We want you all to ourselves this one evening at least, without any old friends to absorb you. And wouldn't it be best to send for her to come to you? I think it would. I'll send a note over the first thing in the morning. And now, shall we go into the other room—or out on the piazza—which?"

It was like trying to mix oil and water to live through that difficult evening and try to harmonize the various elements of her house party. They simply would not mix; and it was evident that the guest of honor had nothing in common with the other guests. To her hostess's infinite relief she withdrew quite early in the evening on the plea of having a slight headache after her journey, and Mrs. Bruce left the other young people to themselves and retired to her own room to think what she should do next and how she could word a note to Janet Grayson that would prevent her coming to see her friend; at the same time leaving nothing to be desired in the way of courtesy.

CHAPTER V

THERE was an air of insolence about the note which Mrs. Bruce finally sent by her servant to the Grayson house next morning, which neither its delicate perfume nor the rich cream-laid vellum on which it was written could dispel. It was not even addressed to any one; and the servant had instructions to hand it to any one who came to the door and wait for an answer.

It happened that Mrs. Grayson was standing on the front path with the watering can in her hand, wherewith she had just been watering the pausy bed when the servant arrived. Janet had been on her way to Aunt Nan's more than half an hour. Mrs. Grayson adjusted her glasses and read:

"Miss Mary Granniss desires to announce to Miss Janet Grayson that she is a guest of Mrs. J. Breckinridge Bruce, and would be glad to see Miss Grayson if she should care to call upon her."

Mrs. Grayson looked keenly at the man.

"Who sent this note, Mrs. Bruce or Miss Granniss?" she asked.

"Mrs. Bruce gave it to me," said the colored man, "that there's her writin'!"

Mrs. Grayson pondered a moment: "Then you may tell Mrs. Bruce," she said deliberately, "that Miss Grayson is away on a visit."

The man touched his hat respectfully and was gone, and Janet's mother went into the house trying to think what to do next. She knew that Mary Granniss was deeply beloved by Janet and that it would be a great disappointment for her daughter to miss seeing this dear friend; but under the circumstances of course it would be utterly impossible for Janet to go to her at the Bruce's. It was well that she was already gone to her aunt's. But the mother was not at all satisfied with leaving the matter here. She was very foud of Mary Granniss herself, and felt that some further explanation was due her, so she sat down at her desk and wrote:

"DEAR MARY: Janet will be deeply grieved to miss you, but I am at home and shall be very glad to see you. Run over as soon as you can, dear. Very lovingly, MARGARET GRAYSON."

THEN Mrs. Grayson went out and wiped the breakfast dishes for Hannah, the maid, while Hannah carried the letter to the post office. As she wiped the dishes she pondered whether she would call up Janet and tell her what had happened. She decided to wait awhile and see what developed before complicating Janet's affairs any further. Janet would perhaps feel that she ought to come home, and yet if she did, and if she tried to see anything of Mary during her stay at the Bruce house, it would be most difficult to keep out of Harley's way, and to keep him from finding out what had happened between his mother and Janet. Mrs. Grayson momentarily expected a visit from Harley, and her thoughts were much perplexed as to how she should answer him if he demanded to know where Janet had gone.

However, Harley did not come. Meantime the morning wore on, she ate her solitary lunch, changed her morning gown for a daintily made white dimity, and sat down in the big cool living-room to await results. The postman came on his afternoon rounds. He would have her note tucked in among others in the big brown leather bag he carried. In a few moments more Mary Granniss would very likely be in possession of it.

The Y. W. C. A. Denies a Canard

THE absurd story, widely circulated in the daily press, that three thousand girls had been hired by the Young Women's Christian Association to dance with soldiers at Camp Lewis, Washington State, under ministerial chaperons, is denied in every particular by the National Board of the Y. W. C. A., and by the local association officials in Seattle. The news agency which sent out the story subsequently sent out a denial. Mrs. James Stewart Cushman, chairman of the War Work Council of the National Board, states that the one hundred and thirty-two workers in hostess houses in the cantonments are mature women employed as hostesses, cafeteria directors, and emergency war workers. The one hundred and one recreation leaders placed in club centers near cantonments are specially chosen to interest girls, and incidentally their men friends, in games and athletics. Wholesome recreation for girls is one of the objects for which the Association exists. No funds have been appropriated for the entertainment of men.

Questions and Answers

H. G. J., Bismarck, N. D. It has been an almost universal practice among prominent men who were great Bible lovers, to mark the Scriptures. Some marked the Bible for emphasis, others made marginal notes, usually referring to related passages; while still others characterized or grouped certain parts of the Bible. Moody, the great evangelist, marked the entire Bible copiously, and this marked Bible was to him a convenient guide whenever he desired to speak on any subject, with all the passages connected conveniently indexed. Charles H. Yatman had a system of Bible marking peculiar to himself. He was one of those who first divided the Bible into prayer, praise, helpfulness, sickness, blessing, and over a score of other divisions, each containing all the passages of its particular class. Cromwell marked on his Bible all the passages that related to war, and had these printed in a little volume which he called "The Soldier's Bible," of about sixteen pages, with stout leather covers, which his "Ironsides" could carry in their pockets. There is little doubt that a very large proportion of Bible students have some method of Bible-marking which they find helpful and useful for quick reference. Certainly, to mark a Bible designed for public use, as in a church pew, would be out of place, but we can see nothing wrong in marking one's own Bible which is read in privacy at home. We ourselves remember passages we marked more than half a century ago, and which were more deeply impressed upon the memory by that act.

Mrs. W. J. C., San Diego, Calif. I have received the Christian Herald and Dr. Gray's lectures (which came in pamphlet form). It would be impossible for me to say in a few words how much I have enjoyed them, as well as others to whom I loaned them. . . . How much we enjoy the Christian Herald would require a string of Rev. Billy Sunday's adjectives to explain. Some people are eager to learn about Christ's Second Coming, and others are after everything else. There seem to be more isms, creeds, etc., on this coast than is believable. May God keep us true to himself and to Jesus Christ his Son.

A Subscriber. We do not think any one would be refused admission to membership in an orthodox church who believes in God, in Jesus Christ as Saviour of the world, and in his atonement and resurrection. All the rest is of secondary importance to these. We are not to judge of other men, even the unregenerate, but rather to do all we can to assure their spiritual awakening and to lead them to seek forgiveness.

We have the following from a poor pastor in North Carolina, whose name and address we will give to any interested reader: "I gave a good deal of my time, when I was younger, trying to build up the Lord's work in destitute places, as pastor of weak country churches. Now, at the age of about fifty, I am laid on the shelf, the churches wanting better educated and younger men. I have no pastorate now. I marry people, preach, conduct funerals and supply for other pastors sometimes, for which I get a little something. I have an afflicted limb, which bothers me in trying to do manual labor. Had I gone into business or engaged in some secular work entirely, I might now have plenty to eat and wear. I make out to get enough to eat to keep from starving, but I am in need of clothes. I have had no overcoat all winter. A good brother gave me ten dollars some time ago to help buy me some clothes, but I had to buy food with it. If you will speak of my needs in your paper, perhaps some of your subscribers have some slightly worn clothing they will send me. I still read the Christian Herald and have done so for, I suppose, nearly a quarter of a century. A friend sends it to me after reading it."

Several Readers. A club has recently been organized among the nine hundred women employees of the War Trade Board in Washington, to provide dormitory and boarding facilities at nominal rates, to establish educational and war work classes, and to maintain club-rooms for social recreations. The club is an outgrowth of the successful work being done by the Board to establish personal relations with the many workers. A twenty-room house at 2100 Massachusetts Avenue has been leased, and other dormitories will be established at an early date.

J. C. K., Ithaca, N. Y. When Liberty Bonds are lost, stolen or destroyed, the loser writes to the Division of Loans and Currency of the Treasury Department, at Washington, D. C., and the chief of that division, Mr. William S. Broughton, entrusts the matter of examining into the cases and recommending such as are subject to relief to the hands of a woman. Miss R. L. Lindsey is this woman, and she has been in charge of this work of investigating the cases of lost bonds for many years, so that Liberty Bond issues only add volume to work of a familiar character. Only registered bonds which are lost or stolen can be duplicated, although coupon bonds which have been destroyed may be replaced under certain conditions.

Mrs. A. S., Plattsburgh, Ohio. God reserves to himself the right to give or withhold the boons for which we pray. He knows better than we do what would be for our good to receive. As a wise and kind father does not grant every request his child makes, but, because of love for the child, refuses things that would be harmful to him, so God does not answer all of our prayers. Think of Paul's thorn in the flesh which God did not remove (1 Cor. 12:8), even after repeated prayer. When your prayers remain unanswered, you may know that the heavenly Father has some wise purpose to serve in not granting your petition, and you should acquiesce in his will, whatever it may be.

G. K. J., Philadelphia, Pa. Chronology, or the division of time, is of two kinds: mathematical and historical. The earliest form of chronological computation was by generations, or "the lives of leading persons in a nation." The Greeks measured time by Olympiads, or periods of four years each. The Romans dated events from the building of their city, the Mohammedans from the Hegira or flight of Mohammed in 622 A. D. The Romans and Greeks used their systems long after the birth of Christ. Until 1600, France computed by periods of fifteen years. The adoption of the Christian chronology did not generally begin until 527 A. D. Babylon, India, and China had elaborate systems of their own. The Hebrews reckoned from Creation.

D. L., Keokuk, Ia. It is a question in what part of the River Jordan Jesus was baptized. The evangelists would seem to imply that it was at Bethabara, "beyond Jordan," and John distinctly asserts that "these things were done there." It is also held by some that it took place at a point near Jericho. Other Bible students say the oldest Mss. declare that the baptism took place at Bethany.

M. A. S., Poughkeepsie, N. Y. Please explain Ps. 84:3.

There are two possible explanations. One is that a custom "existing among several nations of antiquity may have crept into the Jewish nation, of never disturbing the nests of birds that were built within their temples or without. Such bird-nests were regarded as under God's special protection. The other explanation, and one more probable, is that one line of the poem is lost." The Psalmist's meaning evidently was that as the sparrow had found a nest where safety was assured, so had he found such a resting place—the altar.

Anxious. Generally speaking, the name "Jesus" refers to the person of the Saviour, while "Christ" refers to his character of Saviour and to his ministry as working out the purpose for which he came on earth. There is no material difference in the use of either name.

Mrs. R. E. F., Meyerstown, Pa. The regimental band in the American army is a part of what is called the headquarters company, being directly under command of the regimental adjutant. The members of the band rank as privates, corporals and sergeants, the same as the members of any other company. The bandmaster has the rank of sergeant.

E. S., Newark, N. J. Paul was probably baptized by Ananias. As will be seen by reference to 1 Cor. 1:14, Paul regarded the matter of the person who administered the rite as of secondary importance. In 1 Cor. 1:13, he meant being initiated into the Mosaic Covenant. He was comparing the position of people under the old and new dispensations, and exhorted those under the new to be careful not to lose its blessings, as the Jews lost those of the old.

S. A. N., Fenton, Mich. Baron Morimura is a distinguished banker and exporter of Japan. He was born in Tokyo in October, 1859, and worked his way up from obscurity, and for two decades was the leading importer and exporter of Japan. He was once director of the Bank of Japan, and is now a director of the Morimura Bank. He was created a baron in 1915.

F. L., Covington, Ky. Bolshevism, the name applied to the new revolutionary order in Russia, is regarded by some writers as a religious rather than a political system. "Your true Bolshevik," says one authority, "believes in the Golden Rule, and he also believes in the land being for the people, and that those who farm the soil should hold it." The Bolshevik leaders are intense, earnest and emotional, holding views which others might pronounce fanatical, and which have been crystallized by long-continued oppression and cruel injustice. They come closer to Christianity—rough and uncultured, but sincere—than many who talk much of the religion of Jesus but put very little into their lives.

M. O., Dayton, Ohio. "Sinn Fein" is Gaelic and means "Ourselves Alone," or, more freely translated, "Ireland for the Irish."

Reader, Kremlin, Mont. There are two ways of doing things—God's way and the way of the world. If all could be persuaded to accept God's way and follow it faithfully, in perfect obedience and trust, it would be well with them. But such perfect faith and trust do not exist anywhere today, save in the hearts of those who are living in daily communion with and dependence upon God, and who are true disciples of Jesus Christ. All of your argument, therefore, resolves itself into this concrete proposition: that the Gospel is the only power that can save the world. We have seen the failure of non-Christian civilization; we can only work and believe and hope for a Christian civilization to come.

R. S. D., Poughkeepsie, N. Y. Leon Trotsky, the revolutionary leader in Russia, is not of Russian stock. His real name is said to be Leon Braunstein, and, according to several correspondents claiming to be well informed, he is of German-Jewish descent. When escaping from exile in Siberia, the name Trotsky was written on his passport, and he has used it ever since. He is educated and is an ardent Socialist of the Marxian type.

M. N. J., Decatur, Iowa. This journal is neither premillennialist nor postmillennialist. It teaches what the Scriptures say concerning the Second Coming, but leaves time and circumstance to be disclosed when God sees fit to do so. It teaches all so to live that they will be in accord with the divine will in the matter of prayer and preparedness. Without espousing any aspect of the controversy, it tries to make reasonable presentation of all phases of the question, by men whose scholarship and reverence for God's Word cannot be successfully disputed.

M. M. W., Alabama. Please explain II Peter 1:2.

The blessings of grace and peace multiplied will abound only as we abide and advance in divine knowledge, namely, in knowing God. "It is making me," as one careful student puts it, "better acquainted with a thing I knew before, a more exact viewing of an object that I saw before afar off." This spiritual knowledge which brings us into closer relation to God through Jesus is the secret of grace and peace.

Mrs. Charles H. C., East Stroudsburg, Pa. The question whether the brethren of Jesus mentioned in the New Testament as James, Josés, Simon and Judas were his proper brothers and thus children of Mary and Joseph is an open one. Some hold they were relatives or cousins. The early fathers of the church held that Mary had no other children. Several modern commentators hold to the opinion that the brethren in question were the sons of Joseph and Mary, and that Mary's mother's sister had two sons named James and Josés.

A Reader, Boone, Iowa, sends this interesting comment: "The only right interpretation of the word 'generation' (Luke 21:23) is that given by Farrar, who says that 'the word genea in the original is race; and that the Saviour referred to the Jewish race.' Farrar refers also to the fact that the Jews remain a distinct race. I also notice that in the Danish translation of the passages of Scripture referred to, the word 'race' is used."

E. P., Bennett, Ill. The fifth petition is rendered by some, "forgive us our debts"; by others, "forgive us our trespasses." Both are correct, as both relate to the same moral obligations not fulfilled by us, that is, sin.

O. T., Pasadena, Calif. Please explain II Peter 1:6.

The word "temperate" has undergone a change in the last few years in popular usage. To be temperate meant moderate in the use of intoxicants, then it came to mean total abstinence. The word here means self-control—to be self-controlled in everything and master over one's appetites, to do nothing in excess, to have control over emotions, feelings, mind, speech, actions. This temperate life is the victorious life, and it can be attained only through the workings of the Holy Spirit.

German War Practices

AN official book of 96 pages has been issued in Washington under the title of German War Practices.

A copy of this book will be sent free to any reader of the Christian Herald. It sets forth the details of the system that has made Prussianism a word of reproach for generations to come.

It describes specific instances, individual cases, as well as broad policies such as that of Belgian deportation.

It is based on official sources: the archives of the State Department, German official proclamations, reports of American officials, as well as the field diaries of German soldiers.

It contains statements especially prepared by Herbert Hoover, Frederic C. Walcott, and Vernon Kellogg.

To get a copy of this free book, send your name and address with a 2-cent stamp for return postage to the Christian Herald Information Bureau, Frederic J. Haskin, Director, Washington, D. C.

In a Far Place

By
MARGARET E. SANGSTER

THEY sat around the phonograph—three men who were far from home. It wasn't a new phonograph and the music that came from it was rather shrill; but, after all, it was music. And it brought a touch of home into the dingy little cabin.

The song came to a sudden, shrieking stop, and the oldest man rose abruptly from his place to turn off the machine. He sighed as he lifted off the needle.

"It's years," he commented to himself, "since I've heard real music. In this forsaken place there isn't"—he paused as he fumbled through the pile of battered records—"there isn't anything real!"

"But," it was the youngest man who spoke and there was an eager note in his voice, "but some of us, you know, have got to go to the forsaken places of the earth. Some of us have got to be pioneers, or else there wouldn't be any nations—much!"

The oldest man fitted a second worn disc onto the phonograph and turned the crank half-heartedly.

"Here's another," he said gruffly, "five years old, anyway. I reckon. How I wish that we had some new music!"

"You're discontented tonight, Bill!" The youngest man's voice held a note that might have meant reproof. "What's the matter!"

The man named Bill cleared his throat before he answered.

"The mail came in today," he said in a voice that he tried to make casual. "There were papers with the mail, and the papers were full of the war. Every regular man's at the front fighting. I'm not. . . that's why!"

THE man who had not spoken moved out of the shadow. His eyes held a serious light as he looked up.

"Ah, Bill," he said—and his voice was a resonant voice that must at one time have been a singing voice—"the boy here is right and you're wrong. The nation has sent some of her men—most of them—to the firing-line. A few of them have had to go to the far places. We're in the last class. That's all!"

The oldest man stretched out a hand as the song on the phonograph jangled into silence. He turned it off with a jerk.

"If the papers hadn't been full of it all I wouldn't feel so," he muttered; "but the papers are full of it. Want to see them?"

The youngest man was out of his place in a flash. "Want to see them?" he echoed. "Do I want to see them! Well, rather!"

The oldest man burrowed in his pocket and produced a few crumpled sheets. The youngest man pounced upon them eagerly.

The man who had been looking on from the shadow moved over to the window and stared out. The stars seemed very large and very near the earth. They do sometimes in far countries.

"I was in a war—once"—he said slowly, half to himself. "It wasn't pleasant, even though it wasn't much of a war, compared to this one. I was under fire quite often. And yet I know how you feel, Bill. I'm envious of those fellows back there, who are living it. . . But the Boy's right, we are pioneers! And there must be pioneers."

The Boy was talking excitedly, his eyes lifted from the crumpled paper.

"This is great stuff!" he was saying. "Did you read this, I wonder, about the battle in the air! It's like a page from some marvelous romance! And about the chaps who went 'over the top' with never a gun! I don't blame you, Bill,

"Where is your brother now?" he questioned.

The Boy hesitated for a moment, and he flushed before he answered. At last he spoke.

"I don't know, Bill," he answered. "We were pals, we were; but I don't know. You see, I'd gone into the service before he was out of college, and I couldn't keep my eye on him for the last two years. And those last two president of the college and asked questions. I'd always been in quite right with the faculty. I was the steady sort, you see; not brilliant like my brother, but—steady. And I'll never forget that the president looked me in the eye and said: 'Only a chap that was yellow would run away—only a chap that was yellow.' And I had to go back, when my leave was up, with only—that."

The oldest man was leaning forward.

His face showed, a tense, white blur, in the lamp-light.

"And you've never heard a thing?" he questioned.

"I've never heard a thing," answered the Boy. His voice was rather stifled. "You see, the kid was wild and impetuous, and—well, the president of the college didn't know. It wasn't that he was yellow; it was just that he was a kid and couldn't understand until it was too late. He's been sorry, I know, ever since! That's why I haven't heard from him. Because he won't come back until he has atoned in some way. He was the youngest, and he always looked up to me . . . to my opinion. . ."

THE Boy choked and stared down suddenly at the paper in his hand. It shook a bit as though the hand that held it wasn't quite steady. "It was that lullaby that brought it all back," he said in a voice that somehow matched the unsteady hand. "She used to sing it to us. She never lived to know about Dicky—"

"His name was Richard!" The oldest man had started—was leaning forward—"His name was Richard!"

The face of the Boy went suddenly rather white. His hand crumpled the bit of newspaper.

"What do you know about him?" he asked in a strange voice that was very even. "All night you've been nervous and different. You've had something on your mind—about Dicky. What is it?"

The man who didn't speak often had taken the sheet of newspaper quietly from the Boy's hand. His glance traveled feverishly over the printed page. At last he found what he was searching for. . .

The man named Bill was talking. "I read it in the paper when the mail came in," he said huskily. "I sensed right away, that it was him. I'd heard of him before, you see, and it's a strange name—Richard Ridgeway."

The Boy's voice cut like a whip through the slow sentences.

"In heaven's name," he asked, "what is it?"

The voice of the man who seldom spoke read, suddenly, from the newspaper—read seriously, with an intonation that might have fitted a great cathedral.

"Richard Ridgeway—killed in action—in the twenty-second year of his life!" he read, "after holding single-handed a machine-gun position until reinforcements could arrive." He paused.

THE Boy was standing, straight and tall, by the phonograph. He looked like a sleeper who has been awakened suddenly in a too brightly lighted room.

for feeling too far from it all." His voice died away and his eyes lowered again to the paper.

THE man named Bill put a new record, rather nervously, on the machine. It had been used less often than the other records, and the music of it crept out, rather sweetly, through the cabin. It was a woman singing a lullaby.

The man by the window spoke. "That girl has a right pretty voice," he said approvingly. "A right pretty voice. I wonder—"

The Boy interrupted. The paper hung loosely from his hand.

"We've not played that before—not lately—have we?" he questioned. "If you all knew how that song takes me back! My mother used to sing it to us when we were little tads. It's an anachronism to hear it in this cabin at the end of nowhere—"

The man named Bill spoke, and softly.

"Us?" he questioned. "How many of you were there, Jimmy?"

"There were just two of us," answered the Boy—"me and my kid brother. He was a wild boy if ever there was one! He was younger than I was; but, say! he could beat me out at any game. We were great pals—" his voice drifted off.

The oldest man spoke with a curious intensity. Perhaps it was his tone that made the man by the window turn and stare.

years were hard on him. . . He was sort of wild, you see, and I wasn't there. I'd always been his balance wheel, and without me he was like something let loose. He got into some sort of a scrape—" The boy's voice crept off again into the stillness.

THE man who was standing in the shadows moved forward. One noticed that, though he didn't speak often, he usually spoke at the right time.

"There, old fellow," he said, patting the Boy's shoulder with a firm hand, "you don't have to go into details with us. We understand. . . Take that record off the phonograph, Bill, it's run down!"

The oldest man got up stiffly and jerked the machine to a standstill. But he didn't speak. For the Boy was talking again.

"But I want to tell you about it," he said. "It's been heavy on my heart for this good while. Because he's all the family I've got, no matter where he is or what he's done. And we were always great pals."

"He got into a nasty mess, there, at college. And there was a great deal of explaining to do. And I reckon he was in the wrong. For one morning he just wasn't there. And he hadn't left any trace. . ."

"I got leave and went up to find him, if I could. My mother'd always told me that I must look out for him; I was the oldest, you see. And I went to the

Jesus Rebukes Selfishness

International Sunday School Lesson for April 28. Mark 9:30-50

The Failure of Selfishness

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph.D.

AFTER the great experience of the Transfiguration Jesus continued his walks and talks of instruction with the twelve as they journeyed about the quieter sections of Galilee. He continued to stress the necessity of suffering and sacrifice in his way of life, and the disciples continued to stumble and fail in the effort to grasp so unworldly a teaching. How repugnant to the unspiritual man is humility of spirit! How instinctively we shrink from sacrifice until the glory of the unseen is revealed to us! Surely we can be sympathetic in our attitude toward Christ's blundering followers when we read the sad story of their contention during the journey home to Capernaum, though it contrasts so strikingly with the scene on the mount, and the words of their Lord and ours. Have we not known the time when self-interest has prompted strife among modern disciples even within the portals of the Church and after a mountain peak of worship too?

The Dangers of Privilege

In fact, such is human nature that it seems clear that their recent privilege had aroused their selfish ambitions. Perhaps the argument had originated among the three who had received the highest distinction. Peter and James and John had gone up with Jesus to the Mount of Glory. Which of these was actually first in the Master's esteem? Then we can imagine the rest of the group disputing the pre-eminence of the three. Perhaps they accused them of forming a clique within the little band. Even Christians are prone to be jealous of one another's leadership. It is very bad and very sad. Privilege should mean responsibility, but too often it means pride and self-will.

Just because they had found the Messiah, just because they shared the high hopes of great things to come, they disputed with one another on the way, who was the greatest.

Ashamed of Their Ambition

If it is natural to be selfish, it is also instinctive to be ashamed of selfishness. Jesus asked, oh so gently, what it was that interested them so tremendously on the way. But they held their peace. He did not have to rebuke them harshly, directly, because their own consciences condemned the self-assertiveness that had characterized the whole discussion. When they faced Jesus Christ their ambitions and claims seemed unworthy.

How is it with you and with me? Would we dare to tell Jesus what things most interest us and what are the real objects of our striving? Are we greedy for place and power, and little concerned to serve and to give? These are searching questions, and it is best to face them now.

The True and Christian Emulation

But we must not make a mistake that has greatly harmed religion in the past, namely, to decide that Christ wishes to have his followers supine, nerveless, and colorless. He does not condemn ambition, but wrongly directed selfish ambition. He does not want his disciples to lose their energy and vim, but to use them unselfishly. So he points the way here in a beautiful and positive teaching. "Do you want to excel?" he says. "Then be humble. Do you wish to be truly great? Then minister unto others; for true greatness is never found in self-seeking, but in serving a cause or in doing for men."

This is the true and Christian emulation; to excel in service, rather than in precedence or wealth or fame. Have a high ambition, but not a vain one. Remember that the mightiest saints have had the biggest desires, but in the right way. Paul said, "I must see Rome." He had an ambition to preach Christ in the very capital of heathenism. Zinzendorf made this gigantic claim, but in the most Christ-like spirit: "The world is my parish." Livingstone "thought in terms of continents," and would not rest till he had explored Africa as his contribution to world-evangelism. Ambition makes the missionary, for he says, like Stewart of Lovedale in his boyhood, "I shall never be satisfied till I am in Africa, with a Bible in my pocket and a rifle on my shoulder to supply my wants." The emphasis is not on the personal pronouns, but on the vision of work to be done for God.

Competition in well-doing is quite different from the clutch for power. It fulfils Jesus' word, "Whosoever would be first, let him be servant of all."

A Hymn of Service

In our school we are using a beautiful anonymous hymn of service. You can readily find music that will suit it.

Love thyself last. Look near, behold thy duty
To those that walk beside thee down life's road;
Make glad their day by little acts of beauty,
And help them bear the burden of earth's load.

Love thyself last. Look far, and find the stranger
Who staggers 'neath his sin and his despair;
Go lend a hand and lead him out of danger,
To heights where he may see the world is fair.

Love thyself last. The vastnesses above thee
Are filled with spirit forces, strong and pure;
And fervently these faithful friends shall love thee;
Keep thy watch over others, and endure.

An Example of True Greatness

Jesus was wonderful in his object lessons. He called to him the little child of the house (perhaps it was Peter's) and took him into his strong arms of love. Then he told the twelve that in the eyes of God it was a greater thing to treat a little child with kindness than to win the highest of earthly honors. Indeed, to receive one of such little children in the name of Christ is to receive him, and receiving him we receive God.

Do you want to serve God? he asks. Then minister to childhood! What an arresting thought for us as teachers in the school of the Church! Are we realizing the splendor of our opportunity? If your work has become an old story to you, picture Jesus Christ with a child on his lap asking you if you love as he loves. Imagine him standing by your side as you prepare this lesson, saying unto you as he did to Peter of old, "Feed my lambs." Are we really giving them the Bread of Life that will make them strong in the Lord and in the power of his might?

An Uneasy Conscience

Something was troubling John as he listened to Jesus, and with his keen insight gripped his principle more clearly than the others. "Teacher," he asked, "what about our attitude to others who think they are serving thee? We found a man who was unselfishly ministering in thy name, but we forbade him, because he was not a member of our group." It had seemed the right thing to do at the time, but now John feels that it was the same old self-assertiveness and jealousy at work. Jesus confirms John's new point of view. Arrogant exclusiveness is really a form of selfishness. "He follows not us." Yet according to his light the stranger was following Jesus, doing just the sort of thing that Jesus used to do. The persecuting spirit is more anxious about following our ways than in following Jesus' ways. The church during the centuries has made the same error too often. It makes a present-day student of the Life of Christ wonder if the councils and dignitaries really read their New Testaments. How could they read "Forbid him not" and then denounce, imprison, put to death, men who were preaching Christ and ministering in his name, even if they were not ordained by the established church?

Toleration an Evidence of Unselfishness

The better spirit of cooperation among Christians of every name is an evidence of a genuine humility and brotherliness in Christ. No longer do little groups arrogantly claim to be the sole custodians of the entire body of truth. We are beginning to understand what Jesus meant when he said that no one could do a mighty work in his name and then very easily work against him. All religious men are at least favorably disposed to God's will, however partial is their apprehension of it. We have a sense of fellowship with all who sincerely seek to serve. It is still marred by the exclusiveness of certain sects who claim a monopoly of grace, but all right-minded people today are tolerant.

Christ's great prayer was that his disciples might be one. As we look out upon the great needy world today, let us learn the lesson which St. John took so deeply to heart that it softened his whole character and brought brotherliness to the front in his view of the Gospel. If any missionary has scored a success let us rejoice with equal joy, whether he belongs to our denomination or not. If any organization has ministered to our soldiers and sailors, or cared for the homeless refugees, or protected little children, let us honor it whether it is our organization or some other. With so much need, with so much to be done, with so many awaiting the ministries of Christ, it is more vividly true than ever before that "he that is not against us is for us." Let us claim as brothers all who are casting out the demons of hate and lust and drink. Let us fellowship heartily with any man who will do Jesus' work in Jesus' spirit.

The Value of Even the Smallest Service

Jesus pointed out that even the smallest service carries with it its own sure reward. How much more then the greater service which they had been so narrow as to forbid! It is an absolute fact that every act of ministry, every deed of love, brings the truest and most worthwhile of rewards: an increased capacity for God, a greater Christliness of soul. The most desirable thing earth or heaven can give is to be like Christ. One becomes like him by unselfish service.

It is the daily good turn that makes the genuine Boy Scout, not the uniform or the book learning. When our scouts tell us their good turns we are glad to find that the homeliest duties have been the means of bringing out character. In that deep true sense "all service ranks the same to God."

It is not the deed that we do,
Though the deed be never so fair,
But the love that the dear Lord looketh for,
Hidden with holy care
In the heart of the deed so fair.

The Sin of Hindering Others

Jesus passes to the opposite thought. If it is glorious to do the least of services, even to give a cup of cold water in Jesus' name, it is hideous to put the least stumbling-block in a brother's way. We all realize that it is dreadful to do any one a physical injury, but most of us fail to realize the guilt of doing any one a spiritual harm. But to hurt a soul, or to lead one into temptation, or to confuse the very conscience of another, is the crowning iniquity.

It seems as though Jesus must have been thinking of the frightful harm caused by dissensions between his followers, and the spiritual wickedness of intolerance and exclusiveness. The unknown disciple whom they had censured so severely might be dissuaded from a life of ministry, and all who should have been redeemed through him might be left in their misery. Only God knows what "might have been" had all selfishness and arrogance been cast out from the hearts of Christians everywhere.

If you could watch HAVOLINE OIL in the cylinder

If you could see the cylinders of your automobile motor cut in half, with the piston going, you would see the reason for Havoline Oil.

You would see a film of oil evenly spread between piston rings and cylinder side. You would see the piston moving with lightning-like rapidity, hundreds of strokes per minute.

You would see heat as high as 3,000 degrees at the cylinder head, with the walls below at some 400 degrees—heat which the most perfect cooling system could not prevent from ruining your motor were not good oil protecting the closely fitting steel surfaces.

HAVOLINE OIL

"It makes a difference"

It takes an oil like Havoline to maintain this thin film constantly even and indestructible under the wear and great heat in your motor. One little break in that protecting oil film would put dry metal against dry metal, and friction would quickly get in its deadly work.

Then, too, that fine film of Havoline between piston and cylinder wall acts as a seal to prevent the gases escaping between cylinder wall and piston. Should these gases break through they would eat into the oil, and kill its lubricating quality, then would begin your motor's breakdown. If you could see this you would know that Havoline is the safest oil you can give your motor under all conditions.

Havoline Greases are compounded of Havoline Oil and pure, sweet tallow. Your dealer knows the kind of Havoline Oil and Greases for the motor and gears of car. Ask his advice.

Sunday School Work and the War

By FRANK L. BROWN, General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

WHAT is the effect of the war upon the world's Sunday schools?" is the question frequently asked in these days by Christian people.

It is encouraging to know that never has Sunday school progress been so great as in these very years when the spirit of pessimism is so much abroad. It is realized too by leaders in church and state in all countries that in the strategy of world reconstruction the Sunday school, because of its numbers, world-wide organization and leadership can be trusted to put the right moral basis under the future. It has the needed message of world brotherhood, with the binding power of the Bible studied now by 35,000,000 Sunday school scholars the world over. This organization has penetrated every country, and the gain in Sunday school membership in the last four years has been at the rate of a million a year. The principal gain has been in America, which has now 20,000,000 in its Sunday school membership. In England and her colonies there are some 10,000,000 enrolled in the Sunday schools. India alone has 600,000. In the Philippines, where sixteen years ago there was not a single Sunday school, there are now well on toward 100,000 members. In Japan there has been an increase of 40,000 in the last two years. So alarmed indeed have the Buddhists in Japan become at the Sunday school increase in numbers and strength that they have organized a Buddhist Sunday School Association in opposition to that of the National Sunday School Association of Japan. They have taken outright some of our Christian songs, substituting "Buddha" where "Jesus" occurs. Korea enrolls 200,000 in its Sunday schools. China's membership of 200,000 is being pushed up by live American methods.

DURING the war the Sunday schools have cared for their increased expenses due to graded literature, and have contributed largely to the Red Cross, Y. M. C. A. and Armenian Relief campaigns. The secretary of one denomination took to Washington a check for $100,000 contributed by the Sunday schools of that denomination for Red Cross work. The Washington officials were so surprised by this exhibition of the patriotism of the Sunday schools that they gave increased recognition to the Sunday school War Council in Food Conservation and other measures. And at the recent Christmastide the Sunday schools cooperated in placing $1,000,000 at the disposal of the Armenian and Syrian Relief Committee to care for the 400,000 Armenian orphans in Bible lands.

THEN, too, the Sunday schools are keeping alive the spirit of the boys who have gone out from their membership as soldiers and sailors. Then you can measure increasing interest in the Sunday school by the popular demonstrations in its interest which are occurring in all the fields.

In the city of Rosario, in the interior of Argentina, South America, there were 2,500 children from forty Sunday schools in one great Sunday school parade. Recently another such parade occurred in Santiago, Chile. In Manila, in the Philippines, 5,000 Sunday school delegates, who had come in from a radius of sixty miles, knelt in the baseball park, under the open sky, to dedicate themselves for better and bigger schools. They later formed a torchlight parade a mile long.

In the city of Shanghai, China, a while ago some 10,000 Chinese Sunday school scholars came together in a great recreational day in one of the principal city parks. The Chinese Mercury, in commenting on the personnel of that gathering, said: "If China is ever to be regenerated, as it must be, we can trust its reconstruction to young people of the type that we saw yesterday in that Sunday school gathering." In Seoul, Korea, 16,000 Sunday school members of that city formed one of the most impressive demonstrations ever held in the Orient. They marched and counter-marched in the old palace grounds which had been reddened with the blood of Christian martyrs, and the singing and Amens of this great company were wonderful in their volume of enthusiasm. In Japan there have been repeated parades of the Sunday school forces. One of these reached 12,000 in number, and so impressed the Emperor as it marched by the palace grounds in Tokyo that he ordered the hoisting of the flag in recognition.

THE Sunday school is meeting the call for its service as a character-making institution by a world-wide organization. This great world-wide organization is directed by a World's Sunday School Committee with headquarters in New York and London, and with representatives in every field. Business men like Mr. H. J. Heinz, Hon. John Wanamaker, Mr. E. K. Warren, and Mr. Arthur Harris are giving of their means, energy and ability to forward this work.

Baron Shibusawa, one of Japan's greatest leaders, searched up and down Japan for some plan that would shape the moral and business character of future Japan. At a dinner of business and Sunday school men in Chicago he said that he discovered that the product of the Christian Sunday school was the thing he was after. And he is backing up the Sunday school work in Japan, and is one of the leaders behind the invitation to hold the next World's Sunday School Convention in Tokyo, following the war.

ANOTHER factor of great promise is the world-wide increase in Bible study by men. In America three million men are enlisted in organized Bible classes. In Europe one organization alone, the Scripture Gift Mission, has distributed over 10,000,000 copies of the Scriptures to soldiers. Our own American Sunday school children have given nearly a million and a half of Gospels and Testaments to European soldiers. Our own soldier boys are being generously supplied with these.

In China, as the result of the campaigns by Dr. Mott and Sherwood Eddy, thousands of China's scholars and civic leaders are now gathered in Bible study groups under a pledge that they will follow the light of the Word even if that light leads them to Christ. In Foochow 5,000 students meet weekly under this plan. At Kiukiang and other places city officials are turning over Confucian and other temples for Sunday schools and Bible study.

In China, the Philippines, Japan, India and Korea, great Bible study and evangelistic campaigns are now under way, the leadership being both American and native. In Manila a small group of young men organized a Bible class, calling themselves "We brothers of '99," intending to secure 99 men for their class. They recorded one Sunday an attendance of 717. Up and down the Yangtze Valley great Bible classes have been organized on American lines. In one city in Korea a body of 900 men engaged in Bible study met for two weeks at six o'clock in the morning in an unheated room with the thermometer around zero, often as low as 10 degrees.

In America in the last two years a million young people in their teens have been organized in 45,000 Bible classes in the Sunday school. They are feeling the pulse of this world movement and are responding to the world call. Everywhere in the foreign field America's spiritual leadership is recognized, backed by America's unselfish motives in the world struggle. These young people and millions of others in the Sunday school will pour their gifts and life in increasing measure into the world's spiritual regeneration, and America's Sunday school leadership and American methods will go hand in hand with American statesmanship and business push in shaping a new world order. And this new world order will have its finest and surest foundation in the character produced by the Sunday school.

"The Witching Drop of Lemon Juice"

Use It As Chefs Do

FAMOUS Chefs now seldom serve fish without lemons. They serve it garnished with California lemons, sliced or quartered.

Noted cooks get incomparable flavors by substituting lemon juice for vinegar on vegetables and in their salad dressings.

They urge the use of lemon juice instead of cream in tea.

Do likewise in your home for there's more than tempting flavor to be gained.

Lemon juice is a rare appetizer — a valuable digestive aid — due to the salts and acids it contains.

It furnishes the vitamins also, which are necessary for balance in the diet.

The Right Kind of an American

How Frank Hoyt Gailor, Rhodes Scholar, Showed the Stuff of Which a Bishop's Son Is Made

By FRED B. PITNEY

THIS is the story of an American boy in the Great War. He is Frank Hoyt Gailor, son of the Bishop of Tennessee.

Before the war Frank Hoyt, as he was known to his family and friends, was a Rhodes scholar at Oxford, a big, strapping young fellow, twenty-two years old, a football, baseball and tennis player and one of the best athletes at Oxford. Nineteen-fourteen was the year the Harvard second crew went to Henley and walked away from all the rest in the eight-oared race. Two American crews, Union Boat Club, of Boston and Harvard, fought out the finals between them on July 4. It was unprecedented and Frank Hoyt was the happiest man at Henley.

No one in England imagined at that time that the country would soon be involved in the greatest war in history. The murder of the Archduke Ferdinand had taken place at Sarajevo a week before, but the general belief was that Austria would be reasonable, Serbia would be yielding and the affair would be arranged without bloodshed. But, at any rate, if war came, it would be confined to the southeastern corner of Europe. Sir Edward Grey was still the greatest living diplomat and statesman and the English people rested safe in their estimate of hisadroitness and ability to find a way out of the threatening difficulties.

A month later the war was in full course. Von Kluck had crossed the Belgian frontier and King Albert, instead of lying down before the German might, had called out his armies. Gailor came up to London from Oxford. He was very restless.

"You know," he said, "a fellow has to do something. You can't sit still and watch this sort of thing go on."

He was in and out of the office a dozen times a day. "I've got to have something to do," he said. "Give me some work."

"Do you want to enlist?" I asked him. "It's those Belgians," he replied. "I want to do something to help them."

I gave him work and he put in fourteen or fifteen hours a day, as we all were doing. But he got more restless instead of less so. The Belgian situation worried him constantly. He could have enlisted in the British army at any time, and every little while he would come in with some new story of an American he had met wearing the British uniform. But it was the injustice to the Belgians that was worrying him, the destruction of their country, the ruin of their homes and the outrages they were suffering, and the starvation.

Finally, Hoover formed the Belgian Relief Commission and Frank Hoyt Gailor came in with the proposition, "Boss, can I have leave to go over to Belgium?"

"How are you going?" I asked him. He was all smiles. "For the Relief Commission," he answered. "I'm going to get into this and do something."

He was gone three months on that first trip. Part of the time was spent in Brussels, but he was all over Belgium, distributing food to the starving inhabitants. Oxford, at that time, would let the English students off for the period of the war, but she still insisted that the Rhodes scholars should put in a certain amount of time each year in college. "Business as usual" had not yet disappeared from the English vocabulary and Oxford was trying to prove that even the greatest war in history could not prevent her from being the greatest university in the world. Gailor had to give up war work to go back and put in a term at Oxford or lose his scholarship.

But what he had seen in Belgium was too much for him. He could not pursue his studies in scholastic quiet at Oxford with the thought of Belgium always with him. He came up to London again within a few weeks. "I think I am going to get it fixed to go back to Belgium," he said.

"You can't keep out of it," I remarked.

"I have been over there and seen it," he replied. "You have no idea of what those people are suffering and how they are treated."

You will observe that Gailor's thought was still of Belgium and the people of Belgium. His idea was not to go into the army and fight the Germans. It was to help the Belgians.

So he went back. The next time I saw him was several months later in Paris, where I had been transferred. He came to my apartment there and announced, "I am going into the American Ambulance Corps."

"When did you get back from Belgium?" I asked.

"Just out," he replied.

"Why?" I asked.

"Couldn't stand it any longer," he said. "Those Germans. And, besides, they wouldn't let me stay any longer."

"Tell us about it," I suggested.

"I was not only in Belgium this time," he began, "but in the invaded regions of France, near Lille and down around Sedan. Those people had nothing to live on except what the Relief Commission sent in. The Germans took every bit of food away from them. And we had to fight the Germans all the time, we had to keep the closest kind of watch on them and check up our warehouses twice a day to keep them from stealing our stuff. We would lose cars in transit and then trace them into the German depots and have to fight with the Germans to get them back again. They didn't care anything about the people starving to death. All they were thinking of was stealing our food for their army, while they worked to death those who did not drop in their tracks from starvation."

"Down near Sedan, there was a little old lady living alone in a little house beside the road. I saw her one day as we were going along in our car and stopped to speak to her. She could not cultivate her little land and was living on roots she found in the woods nearby. I had a little flour with me and I gave it to her. She cried. She said it was the first white flour she had seen since the Germans came. I asked her why she stayed there and she said the Germans would go away some day and she was trying to keep the home until her son came back from the war. Every day as long as we stayed there, I went to the old lady and carried her something to eat. And the Germans hated me for it."

"They had a guard with me all the time. I couldn't even sleep alone. Two German officers slept in the same room with me. And they hated America and were always sneering about America and insulting Americans. They said insulting things about President Wilson all the time."

"One evening at dinner, when they were busy insulting the President, I told them they were not very well bred to sit there at our table, where they had not been invited, but had forced themselves upon us, and insult us and our President. But I said we Americans could stand it very well, because we, with our President, had it all over them with their Kaiser."

"And they said, 'What do you mean, you with your President have got it all over us with our Kaiser?'"

"Why," I said, "we chose our President because we wanted him, but your Kaiser was wished on you."

"The next morning they sent to Brussels and demanded that I should be recalled. So I was sent back to England. Now, I want to get where the fighting is and help fight those fellows. They've got to be licked. This world will never be a fit place to live in until they get theirs."

Gailor got into the American Ambulance and was sent with a field section up to the Bois le Pretre. That was in the autumn of 1915. February 17, 1916, they were moved down to Bar-le-Duc and two days later they went to a little town opposite Verdun on the left bank of the Meuse. On the 21st the big German attack began.

From then until the middle of April the section worked from their little base town of Souilly right up to the front, bringing in wounded. They made an average of four trips a day and were constantly under fire. Their cars were riddled with shrapnel and shell holes. One village they had to pass through was under observation from the German lines, and the cars were always shelled as they went through that village. They would come up to the first houses and stop a minute or two, while the driver got down to have a last look at his engine. Then, they would dash through the village at top speed, with the German shells tearing up the road behind them and ahead of them.

Gailor's engine was struck by a piece of shell one day, while he was in the middle of the village. He had to get down and spend five minutes repairing the engine under fire. This was only one of the incidents of the work. At night the Germans sent star shells over the village so they could watch for the ambulances and shell them. But the American boys never stopped their work. They lost twenty-four cars but not a wounded soldier.

Back from Verdun came Gailor with a new determination.

"I am going to fight in this war," he declared.

"I thought you were in the Ambulance," I said.

"That isn't enough," he replied. "I've got to fight. I've seen the Germans from both sides, now. In Belgium and northern France I saw them at work on their own side. That was bad enough. It made me feel that I had to get in it in some way to do something against them. Now, I have seen them at work from this side, and it isn't enough to do something against them. I have got to fight them. And I am going in the army."

Frank Hoyt Gailor went back to England once more. He and some of his friends among the American Rhodes scholars talked it over and six of them left Oxford to go into the army. Gailor went into an Officers' Training camp in England, and before America entered the war, a year ago, he was an officer in the British Royal Artillery.

I like to think of Frank Hoyt Gailor. I am tremendously fond of that boy, and I admire him greatly. It was a splendid thing to watch him grow and develop as he did in less than two years. He always had it in him. There was never any mistaking that. But in July, 1914, he was a big lovable, likable boy that one expected something of some day, when he settled down to serious work. Two years later he was just as lovable, just as full of happy courage, but the big crisis had come and he had risen to it. He had not disappointed his friends, but made them prouder than ever of him.

He typifies the spirit of America in the war, we think, and it is good to have this concrete example to help us appreciate what our young men are doing—not only the young men, but all Americans. For we are all, men and women, young and old, making sacrifices, doing our bit to help win the war. One of the things we at home are doing, one of the big things, is buying Liberty Bonds. Let us think of Frank Hoyt Gailor and the two million other young men like him at the front and buy more bonds to help in the greater sacrifice in which they offer themselves for our sakes.

THE Bulletin of the Student Volunteer Movement issued in January, 1918, gives a summary of calls for workers in foreign missionary service, from which it appears that 60 mission boards and societies have asked for 1,046 workers, divided as follows: Asia, 740; Africa, 97; South America, 63; Central America, 6; Mexico, 53; West Indies, 27; Europe, 1; Canada, 8; and the United States, including Alaska, 51. The boards ask 403 workers for evangelistic work; for educational work, 348; for medical work, 220; and for miscellaneous posts of usefulness 52. The Student Volunteer Movement seeks to align Christian students and keep them in touch with the secretaries of the mission boards of the denominations, so as readily to supply the latter with educated young men and women who can be trained for special lines of missionary work.

Through Literacy to Light

"THOUSANDS of men of draft age are learning to read and write in order that they may communicate with their families when away at camp," is the statement of Mrs. Cora Wilson Stewart, heroine of the Moonlight Schools of Kentucky and president of the Kentucky Illiteracy Commission.

"In Kentucky we started to concentrate our work on these future soldiers last summer. During the hot nights of July and August, the men who were expecting to be called in the second draft worked eagerly and patiently. We had special soldiers' readers bound in red, white and blue. The first page began 'I go. I go to war,' and one of the first sentences was 'There is the camp. There is the flag.' By the time they were drafted most of them could sign their names to Liberty Bonds and write home to their people. One boy told me with pride that he could now write to his mother and to young ladies."

The National War Council of the Y. M. C. A. has adopted these soldiers' readers for use in the camps.

The Army of Righteousness

WITH the offering of a Third Liberty Loan come new appeals to patriotism. These are fitting and worthy our most serious consideration. But beyond patriotism is a still stronger appeal.

America is calling on behalf of the boys in uniform whom she must feed, and clothe, and protect; she is calling to her sons and daughters to redeem the pledges she has given; she is calling to them to redeem themselves and draw nearer to the American ideal.

But with the call of America comes the call of Humanity. Not merely for ourselves, for our boys, for our honor, but for a suffering world we must make this Third Loan a magnificent success.

The crucial period of the war has arrived. When the big German drive began, civilization seemed to hang in the balance. Men held their breath as they read of the advances being made by the foe. Would the British line hold? It swayed, it bent—but, thank God, it held!

In those tense hours Americans no longer saw as through a glass darkly, but face to face. They saw the Beast in all his horrible ugliness. Resolutions were made. Anything rather than that America should be invaded by such a horde as that which had devastated Europe.

Now, as the days go by, as the immediate menace to ourselves diminishes, even while the risks of those who represent us at the front increase, we are able to appreciate more fully what those others have suffered for whom we entered the war, and the anxiety with which they issue their call in the name of Humanity.

THE British premier has not disdained to tell America how serious the situation is as he sees it, and the urgent need of every help we can give immediately.

The stricken nations must not appeal in vain. We are called upon to wrestle against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places. It is our fight here at home just as much as it is the fight of the men in the trenches.

We must realize this. We must keep the realization always before us that we have been drafted for the Army of Righteousness. We must confirm every resolution and apply them to work for the Liberty Loan. The day should be started with the purpose of doing all we can in office, in shop, in home, for the cause.

It will not suffice that we buy Liberty Bonds. There is no great service in investing a certain amount of money at fair interest. We would not merely loan to Humanity as we loan to America. We would give to Humanity. Then let us give freely. Let no call upon personal comfort, upon time, upon social engagements be ignored. Rather let them be accepted readily as opportunity to draw near in spirit to those who have suffered martyrdom that liberty should live; let it be eagerly seized upon to unite us with those of our own blood who have offered their lives, if necessary, that "government of the people, by the people, for the people shall not perish from the earth."

THE one thing that shall make the success of this Third Loan so emphatic that it shall bring cheer and encouragement to our Allies as well as to our own soldiers now locked in the greatest struggle of the war, is individual solicitation.

Something more than the raising of money is involved in the outcome. It is to be seen whether the nation is to experience a new birth. This result will not be effected by oratory or by articles in magazines and newspapers. It will be effected by heart-to-heart talks in which individuals come to see clearly their duty to one another as well as to their country, in which they will reach a better understanding of one another. Employer and employee, getting together to work for humanity by participating shoulder to shoulder in this campaign, shall never in the days to come be so far apart as they have been in the past. Sectionalism, prejudice, shall be minimized.

All who enter upon the crusade shall share in the final triumph, glad in the knowledge that they have strengthened themselves while they fought for the cause.

Plan now to do your part as a good soldier in the ranks. Make those arrangements that will be necessary to leave you as free as possible for what you have to do. Organize your home circle; give all a share in the work, and inspire all with the glory of that work.

A Soldier Boy's Death-Bed

IT was 8:30 P.M. The Y. M. C. A. building No. 43, Section 3, Camp McArthur, Waco, Texas, was filled with soldiers from the Wisconsin and Michigan troops, comprising Engineers, Signal, Ambulance Corps and Quartermaster's Department. Some were writing letters to mother, loved ones and sweethearts. Others were busily engaged in reading the magazines and books furnished by friends at home. Outside, in the light of the moon, men were playing checkers and chess.

A different scene was being enacted at the base hospital, a mile away. Carl — of Troop B, First Wisconsin Cavalry, had been operated on a few hours before, but owing to his delay in calling the doctor's attention to his trouble, hope for his recovery was abandoned. The Christian nurse in attendance asked him if he wished to see a minister. He replied, "Yes," so Secretary R. A. Norton was called and Rev. Benjamin F. Butts, the Christian Herald evangelist, was also told of the request. A motor was secured and the two were taken to the hospital, Ward 11.

"The parson," as the boys in camp call Mr. Butts, asked the dying soldier boy if he would accept Jesus Christ as his personal Saviour and King? He replied that he would. Then another question was asked: "Do you believe Jesus accepts you now?" "Yes, I do," was the answer, spoken with a firm, steady voice and a smile upon his face. After a few minutes' talk and a brief prayer, calling upon the Holy Spirit to seal the dying soldier's decision, the evangelist withdrew, first asking the nurse to call him again if he were needed.

At 10:30 P.M. the call came for him to return to the hospital at once. A passing auto was hailed and the hospital was reached in a few minutes. Carl was unconscious and breathing his last. At one side of his cot stood a Catholic nurse and on the other a Protestant nurse. With the dying soldier boy's hand clasped in that of the evangelist, prayer was offered that the Heavenly Father would receive this trusting soul, and that he would sustain the sorrowing relatives in their great loss. As the two nurses joined in the closing "Amen," the young soldier of Camp McArthur quietly passed into eternal life, trusting in Jesus Christ as his Saviour.

If We Could Only Know

SAID a gentleman in the audience to a food-conservation speaker in the quiz period: "If there were only some way by which we could know, when we do not buy meat or sugar or eat white bread, that we were really helping to get that much-needed food to the soldiers or the Allies, there would be no trouble about getting the people to substitute and save."

Well, according to the statement made by the Food Administrator, that can be known practically. For instance, he says, "Every grain of wheat and every ounce of flour and bread saved now is exactly that amount supplied to some man, woman, and child among the Allies."

Of course it is not altogether easy to visualize, but the logic is clear enough. If you do not buy the retailer can not sell to you, and the less he sells the more he will have to sell to the Allies.

Bakes bread an inch higher

These loaves were made from the same amount of dough and baked in the same sized pans in the same oven at the same time!

Try this test yourself with any ordinary pan and Pyrex. You will be amazed at the difference!

When you cook in an ordinary pan, only one-third the oven heat reaches the food. All the oven heat floods through Pyrex. Every food baked in Pyrex is more evenly, thoroughly, deliciously cooked.

Dealers everywhere sell Pyrex. Each dish is guaranteed. Oven heat does not break it. It lasts a lifetime. Try your first dish today. You will say it cooks so much better, is so much cleaner, so much more beautiful, that you will never again use an old-fashioned pan.

Daily-Vacation Bible School

B. Y. P. U. Topic. Zech. 8:5

NO doubt the streets of the New Jerusalem will be a safe playground for the children; but the streets of our modern cities, with their congested traffic, their trucks and street cars and autos and pushcarts, their mud or dust, and their accumulated refuse waiting for the cleaner, are deadly enemies of child-life, schools of crime, and second only to the houses that face them as breeders of disease.

The heart of humanity bled for the children of the streets and the result has been playgrounds, fresh-air homes, (one of the first permanent institutions of this kind was the Christian Herald Children's Home at Mont-Lawn, Nyack, N. Y., which was opened in 1894, river and lake excursions, yet still there are children in the highways. As far back as 1866, some one in the First Church in Boston thought of opening a free summer school for the children. From then until 1894 there were sporadic outbreaks of the same idea. In the same year, the Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor in New York City secured the use of four city school buildings in which they maintained classes in manual training and allied subjects. In 1897, the New York School Board adopted vacation schools as a permanent part of the public school system. Then the churches began to realize the opportunity that the vacation school offered to them to reach the people of their neighborhoods through the children. In 1907, there were nineteen Vacation Bible Schools reported in American churches in four American cities, in which seventy teachers met 5,083 children. In 1914 there were 297 such schools in sixty-seven cities, with 1,940 teachers and 64,535 pupils.

The public vacation school is made a vehicle for additional work in the common branches, although it includes play and manual training. The church school is interested solely in the spiritual instruction and physical well-being of the child. Its session opens with devotional exercise followed by twenty minutes or less of music and calisthenics, then comes a half-hour of Bible story, not study, and drill, then an hour of handwork, then play under the guidance of the teachers, then the closing exercise. In the afternoons the teachers visit the homes or take the children on outings.

These schools reach many children whom the Sunday schools do not touch; they have proven especially effective in neighborhoods where the people were of foreign origin, Jewish or non-Protestant. Attendance is voluntary; discipline is gained by love and interest instead of through fear of authority. The Bible teaching, told in simple sentences by consecrated teachers, sinks into receptive minds, and, with the Gospel songs that the children carry home, affects the whole life of the neighborhood. The children gain new ideas and ideals and are better men and women and better Americans because of the vacation school. Juvenile delinquency and street accidents diminish wherever the vacation school operates.

The teachers, who are usually public school teachers or college men and women on vacation, and who serve most often without pay, gain much themselves. They learn how to make Christ real to a child, and a minister who can do that will find few grown-ups asleep in the pews. They learn the psychology of childhood and are therefore better teachers, ministers or parents in the years to come. They get for themselves a deeper spiritual experience, and they learn many things they need to know about the different races which are being merged into the American of today.

The Vacation Bible School is not necessarily confined in its application to the big city churches. It will be a blessing wherever there are children who care enough to come. Full information about the whole subject with plans and programs and courses of study may be secured by addressing the American Baptist Publication Society, 1701 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

The Power of the Cross in City Slums

Luke 14:15-23

THIS topic is closely allied to the B. Y. P. U. topic above. The child is the best medium through which to bring Christ to the slum. In the slum, sin and ignorance, poverty and suffering join hands for mutual multiplication. The adult population suspects the church, sometimes justly; it either loves its sin or is helpless in its toils. The adult of the slum is not hopeless, but every circumstance of his life bars his way to the cross. But the child, through the Sunday school or the Vacation Bible School or the settlement classes, may find the Saviour and learn of his love and his power. Through the child it is often possible to reach the parent, and many a neighborhood has been transformed by the power of the Cross working through a mission Sunday school and the children it taught. The Cross uplifted in the slum shames its sin and purges its filth. One by one it rescues lives and sends them, transformed in heart and reenergized in purpose, back to steady work, respect and prosperity. Slowly it leavens the lump about it. Once that center of infection, the saloon, is gone forever, the byways of the slum will more quickly become the highways of our Lord.

The Ruin of a Masterpiece

Epworth League Topic. Eph. 2:10; I Cor. 3:16, 17; Rom. 5:12

WOULD you destroy the temple of God? The world hoaps execration upon the Germans because their guns have wantonly destroyed a masterpiece of man's art, the cathedral of Rheims. Yet you would destroy a masterpiece of God, your soul, by defiling the temple in which it must reside, your body. If the soul and body were less closely related, the disaster might not be so great. But when the body yields to appetite, the soul is weakened, and when the mind yields to lust, the soul is strangled. When the thoughts turn to slander, the soul is shriveled; when the purposes of the heart turn toward falsehood the soul is withered. When worldly ambition rules the life, the soul is imprisoned; when faith ceases, the soul dies. Thus the masterpiece is ruined, for a man whose soul is dead in trespasses and sins is a temple razed. Rheims can never be fully restored. But as for your sins, if you believe in the crucified, risen and glorified Saviour, they will be blotted out, and your body, by the power of the Spirit, will be swept and garnished and made fit again to be a temple of God, blessed with his spirit, perfected in his love.

S. S. Superintendent 64 Years

FOR lengthy Sunday school affiliation, probably there is no other person in his state who can equal the remarkable record of Professor William Moyer, of Freeburg, Snyder County, Pennsylvania. Born in Freeburg, September 27, 1834, the son of Mr. and Mrs. F. C. Moyer, founders of the Musical College of that town, he early in life became a member of the Lutheran and Reformed Sunday School. He is serving his sixty-fourth year as superintendent, and has also served as teacher, librarian, and secretary during the seventy-eight years in which he has been a Sunday school member. He was present at the first State Sunday School Convention of the Pennsylvania State Sabbath Association, held in Philadelphia, 1862. He highly prizes a gold medal presented to him by the association. He has also taken a great interest in music, and has conducted the choir of the Reformed congregation since 1855. In addition to his many other duties he has been justice of the peace since 1872, and was county superintendent of the Snyder County public schools 1863 to 1872, and 1881 to 1884. Despite his eighty-four years of active life, he is hale and hearty, and has never worn glasses.

This comparison of the old and the new shows Mr. Alexander Winton in his 1903 Winton car, and in one of his later models. Both cars are equipped with Timken Roller Bearings.

One Specification that Hasn't Changed

If you should see one of these old models on the street today, would you recognize it as the fore-runner of the impressive touring car or limousine of 1918 made by the same company?

So swift and sweeping has been the development of the automobile, that hardly a trace survives of the original design.

Mechanical changes are as great as those in outward appearance. Motor-construction, lubrication, cooling, carburetion, lighting, starting, ignition, suspension—wherever you turn you find many radical changes.

But out of sight at the points of hardest service is one important link between past and present, one part so good that it could not be improved in design, one specification that is unchanged after all these years—Timken Roller Bearings.

Cars cover greater distances now than they used to in the early days. They are higher-powered and carry heavier loads; but Timken

Bearings stand up to all demands of road and load in modern models as perfectly as they did in the earliest ones. In fact there has never been any demand for a better bearing than Timken.

And when now and then we run across a survivor of that first generation of motor-cars, we almost invariably find the original set of Timken Bearings still in place, and giving a good account of themselves.

Timken steel and Timken refinements in manufacturing have given Timken Bearings still finer quality; but in every principle of design the bearings started right—and no improvement has been either possible or desirable.

This record is so unusual, so remarkable, that you owe it to yourself to learn the reason why. You'll find it in the booklet "How Can I Tell," sent free at your request.

5 MORE DAYS!

Last Warning:

BIBLE PICTURE STUDY OUTFITS MUST BE ORDERED BY APRIL 22d

But—

YOU WILL THEN HAVE TILL MAY 31st TO CHOOSE AND SUBMIT YOUR ANSWERS

FIRST DAY FOR SENDING IN SETS—APRIL 23d: LAST DAY—MAY 31st

YES, orders for Outfits mailed by you even on the last day to order—April 22nd—will be filled by us even though the orders may not be delivered to us until several days later. The postmark on the letter will show you ordered on time.

We will mail your Outfit to you at once, including all the 30 pictures, so that you will be able to start right away to comparing pictures and verses, and writing your selected verses in the Answer Book.

Participants will have until May 31st to mail or bring in their sets of Answers, and sets postmarked that day will be accepted, even though they arrive later.

Your Complete Equipment

All you need to participate in the Third Bible Picture Study are the Reference Book of about 2,000 Bible verses (called International Bible Readings), the Answer Book, and the 30 pictures. You choose from the Reference Book of verses those that best fit what the pictures show, write your chosen verses in the Answer Book, and send it in to the Christian Herald. Those who make the best selections, according to the decisions of the Committee of Judges, will receive the $5,000.00 in cash rewards, divided into 1,001 prizes.

Order your complete Outfit today—you will be delighted to find what untold benefit is gained by participation!

Read These Important Directions

Be sure, in sending in your set of verses, to attach full postage. Tell the postal clerk that the package goes as first class mail, upon which postage is now 3 cents for each ounce or fraction. One Answer Book, in an envelope or light wrapper, will require at least 9 cents postage; if the wrapper or envelope is heavy, still more postage will be required. Have your set of answers weighed by the postal clerk.

Do not fold or roll your set—wrap it up flat.

In order that there may be no mistakes as to the final dates in the Third Study we print below those portions of the Rules which bear upon them:

"Participants may order Outfits up to and including April 22, 1918. Orders mailed or tendered after that date will not be filled. Participants may submit Sets of Answers after April 22, 1918, but not later than May 31, 1918—which is the last day for submitting answers. Sets of Answers sent by mail must be mailed not later than May 31, 1918. Sets of Answers sent by express must be delivered at the express office on or before May 31, 1918. Participants who present Sets of Answers at the Christian Herald office personally or by personal messenger must do so before 5 P.M., May 31, 1918."

That Little War Garden of Yours

By WINIFRED BLACK

THERE is a new idea in the U. S. School Garden Army. It's this: What are you going to name your own little plot of ground, little sister, if you are lucky enough to have one of your own in your own back yard?

What are you going to call your potato patch, brother, you with the bright eyes, that weren't so bright the day you went down to the station to see big brother off with his regiment?

Oh, yes, you fell in behind the soldiers and kept fine step to the music of the band and held up your head, and felt big enough and strong enough to march a thousand miles and take a million German prisoners; but when he had gone and you went home and mother put her arms around you and laid her head on your shoulder and asked you to help her to be brave, something queer happened to your heart and you have never felt quite the same since, have you?

And now they are beginning to tell you in school about Russia, and what a rich country it is, and how much it will mean in food if the Germans really get possession of it; and at home sometimes your grown folks look pretty serious and you wonder if it could be possible. No, it isn't; and you are going to help make it impossible, you and those strong little brown hands of yours. You and your brave heart and your loyal soul. You and your war garden that you are cultivating for Uncle Sam.

You'll have good luck with your garden or good success with it. There isn't much luck in the garden business. It all just simmers down to hard work and the right kind of care, and it is going to be hard work, too. Nothing easy about it; not a thing!

You wouldn't want to be doing something easy, would you, with big brother in the trenches and Uncle Sam calling you to help?

There will be hot days when your back aches and you want to go swimming; and cool days when your knees ache and you want to curl up in the loft of the barn and read, and go out in the lot and play baseball, especially if you're a catcher and have a perfectly good catcher's glove; and you will have to stick to the garden and do your work for Uncle Sam.

What are you going to name that little garden of yours?

I will tell you what I am going to name mine—mine is going to be called Sam Brown, because Sam Brown is a boy who never had a chance in his life till the war broke out, and then he saw his chance and took it, and he is over there in France today fighting for you and for me and for Uncle Sam, and I am going to name my little garden after him.

WHAT are you going to name your garden? Who is the soldier you know? Who is the one you think of, when you hear them singing "Over There" and "The Long, Long Trail"?

It's a long, long trail he's following, that brave boy—a long, long, trail and far away from home and those who love him. May he follow it till it turns and brings him home again—home to love and shelter and friendship—home to the old fireplace and the old books and the old songs at evening, and to the little brother who has been so faithful to his memory ever since he's been gone.

And in the meantime, let's name the little garden in our own back yard for him, so that if there is a county fair and some of our garden truck goes on exhibition, the name of our particular soldier boy will be there at the booth for every one to see—and remember.

Come, little sister; you are doing your part, too, and doing it faithfully whether you are tired or not; whether you wish you could go down town and have an ice cream soda and forget that there was such a thing as a rake or hoe in the world. You are the comfort of your lonely father's heart nowadays.

Where's that picture of the boy in uniform? Your own particular soldier?

You wouldn't take anything in the world for it, would you? How handsome he is, and how brave! It makes your eyes fill with tears of pride even to think of his name. Call your little garden after him and write to him over there in the trenches and tell him about it, and just wait till you get back his letter in reply.

"Sam Brown"; that is going to be the name of my garden.

What is going to be the name of yours?

Her Battle Won Through Prayer

near Foochow) but the Chinese government would not allow the abbot to open the woman's industrial school he had built the house for, so it was offered for sale and we secured it. There are sufficient grounds, so that we can entertain large companies of Chinese, and when Orphanage boys and girls grow up and are married, they will be married from this home, to which they are always welcome.

You will see among other pictures, one of a bridal group. I sat beside the bride. Her wedding veil is the new style adopted by Chinese brides who wish to follow semi-foreign style. This was a rose pink and quite becoming, but it looks white in the photograph. The boys in lighter clothes at the right of the picture are our Manual Training School boys of the Orphanage, who are taking the Higher Primary course together with manual training. At the left the girls are those belonging to the Orphanage and Beacon Hill Farm Association, who are at home from the different denominational and government schools at which they study during term time, but who come back to the Cordelia A. Greene Memorial Industrial Home for vacation, where they are taught to sew and prepare their own and the Orphanage boys' clothing. Only the boys and girls in the Higher Primary courses were invited to the wedding, but the little girls sitting on the ground came to see, with their mothers who attended.

As you look at the faces of the Chinese boys and girls, most of them just coming into the years when they need more advanced training, you will rejoice at the privilege of helping them to fulfil God's purpose and will for their wonderful and beautiful land. There is a long list of other boys needing special industrial training to fit them as Christian industrial leaders for this great land, with the largest undeveloped resources of mineral wealth of any country on earth. The young republic looks to the strongest republic for help in these days of beginnings.

If you can adopt a boy or girl, how happy will you be; if you cannot, then cut out their pictures and you can pray for them every day. Perhaps you can give toward the industrial work they so much need; perhaps you can tell some one else and pray that others may become interested to help this great need to be met.

A nation can only become what that nation's boys and girls make it become. The boys and the girls are the hope of the world for America and China. These two nations are opposite each other on the Pacific Ocean; if the two republics speak peace, may the Pacific realize the prophecy of its name—pacific waters, pacific peoples on the waters,—telling a different tale from the troubled waters of the Atlantic and Mediterranean; but if this is to be so, it must be because you and I help make it so by our prayers, our words and our works. The Christian Herald will receive and answer all applications for adoption and all gifts intended for the work. I leave the whole problem in your hands, hoping and praying that every little orphan will find a Christian Herald patron by adoption, and that you may find a great blessing in the work.

Among the Workers

TWELVE hundred officers at the Presidio training camp at San Francisco have signed this pledge, formulated by the National War Work Council of the Y. M. C. A. "We undertake to maintain our part of the war free from hatred, brutality or graft, true to the American purpose and ideal. Aware of the temptations incident to camp life and the moral and social wreckage involved, we covenant together to live the clean life and to seek to establish the American uniform as a symbol and guarantee of real manhood. If we become officers we pledge our example and our influence to make these ideals dominant in the American army."

ARTHUR M. HARRIS is about to sail for Y. M. C. A. war work in France. Mr. Harris is actively identified with organized Sunday school work, being superintendent of the First Baptist Bible School of Plainfield, N. J., a leading officer of the New Jersey Sunday School Association and Treasurer of the World's Sunday School Association. Recently Mr. Harris' son enlisted and the father said: "I expect some one to look after my boy, and now I want to do my part in looking after other fathers' sons."

REV. GEORGE P. HOWARD has been on a Sunday school evangelistic tour in Chile and states that on the first evening 412 were present and at the end of the week 828 were crowded into the church in Santiago. As a result 150 new converts were gained who were promptly put to work winning others.

EVANGELIST Rev. R. E. ("Bob") Johnson and party continue work in the Tabernacle at Carney's Point, N. J., with increasing interest and results. The people, learning of a shortage of coal, offered donations. An auto was sent to their homes and two tons or more were gathered in that way; the tabernacle was kept warm and services not allowed to close.

or over were sunk, seven under that tonnage and five fishing vessels were lost. The Italians lost three vessels of more than 1,500 tons and ten small sailing vessels. On April 3 Edwin N. Hurley, chairman of the Shipping Board, sent a telegram to the manager of every shipyard engaged in government work, in which he declared that production in March had proven a keen disappointment, the production being eighteen ships, of 162,200 tons, completed and delivered, and thirty-six, of 232,786 tons, launched. Chairman Hurley's message was to the effect that "The American people want ships, not excuses." It was announced also on April 2 that thirty vessels, of a total of 250,000 tons, would soon be delivered by Japan, and would be put into transatlantic service. It was also announced that private capital in Oregon had agreed to construct 150 wooden ships of 3,000 tons each, to be equipped with sails and Diesel oil engines, to be used in the Pacific trade and to release fast steamers for the Atlantic.

On April 3 the Senate Commerce Committee, after hearing testimony which showed that ship construction was being delayed through the lack of material, adopted a resolution empowering its chairman to call and urge upon the President the facilitating of steel shipments. The Committee was told that twenty keels could have been laid at Hog Island in the preceding week had steel been available, and that at this one yard they were 55,000 tons behind their schedule of steel shipments from the mills. Orders were issued by the War Industries Board, on April 4, to all steel mills to speed steel to the shipyards.

Tokyo dispatches of March 28 confirmed the reports as to the agreement between Japan and the United States, and announced that a total of 450,000 tons would ultimately be delivered to this country.

In order to secure more eastbound tonnage, no delay will be permitted in future in the loading of cargoes at European ports. The west bound trip will be made in ballast if cargoes are not ready.

WISCONSIN IS LOYAL. The election for senator in Wisconsin, on April 2, on which the eyes of the whole nation were centered, resulted in the election of Irvine L. Lenroot, by a plurality of more than 10,000 votes over the Democratic candidate, Joseph E. Davies. Victor L. Berger, on an anti-American platform, ran a poor third. The votes stood: Lenroot, Republican, 142,527; Davies, Democratic, 132,203; Berger, Socialist, 96,802. Both Lenroot and Davies promised complete support to the Administration in the conduct of the war. Davies's campaign had been strengthened by a personal letter from the President expressing the hope that he would be elected. The vote itself was a sufficient condemnation of La Folletteism, but to make it emphatic the voters of Wisconsin snowed under the La Follette candidate for the State Supreme Court, electing his opponent by a majority of more than 75,000. The only fly in the ointment of Wisconsin's loyalty is an increase of 280 per cent. in the Socialist vote, the Socialist candidate for the Senate in 1916 receiving but 28,908 votes. The Socialist mayor was reelected in Milwaukee, which also gave Berger his largest single block of votes, but the non-partisan candidates for treasurer and controller were elected over their Socialist opponents. The Socialists made a net gain of one member on the Board of Aldermen, which they do not control.

ARMENIANS DRIVE TURKS. Dispatches received from Moscow through London on April 4 reported the recapture from the Turks, by an Armenian army corps assisted by volunteers, of the city of Erzerum. The Armenians were also reported to hold a line extending some 100 miles running eastward from Erzerum. The Armenians were supposed to be operating in connection with the Georgian army of 250,000 men, the organization of which was reported by the Christian Herald correspondent, Maynard Owen Williams, some months ago. Since the Turks had already reached and lost Batum it would appear that the Georgians and Armenians had succeeded in driving them back in the neighborhood of sixty miles. The Russian Black Sea Fleet was also reported as having a successful engagement with a Turkish-German fleet, and Petrograd reported unsuccessful attempts of the Ukrainians and Germans against Odessa. Russia is forming an army of 1,500,000 men, reenlisting all of the old officers who are willing to serve the present government.

Turkish official reports on April 6 claimed the capture of Ardahan and the heights west of Sarikamish in the Russian Caucasus, and declared that the former Russo-Turkish boundary had been crossed in the direction of Batum. The Armenian-Georgian army is said to have in use all of the artillery of the former Russian army of the Caucasus. Armenian factories are making ammunition. An Armenian organization in New York is said to have received a cable message asking for immediate and generous help from the Allies.

FRAGMENTS OF NEWS. The announcement that the government was going to commandeer platinum was transcribed to the minds of a great many women into a desire for their personal ornaments of this metal. The government has received a great many pieces of jewelry which it has no authority to accept, and which it has no facilities for using. When the government wants privately owned platinum in present use it will make a definite request for same. . . . Provost Marshall General Crowder, on April 5, proposed to the President revisions to the draft regulations which would put slackers to work. Every registered man who has secured deferred classifications will be given to understand that such deferment is a privilege and not a legal right and that it will be revoked if unfair advantage is taken of it. Idlers, gamblers and followers of other "harmful" pursuits will, if the regulations are amended, lose their exemptions and be drafted at once.

Uncle Sam's army on April 1 totaled 1,506,084 men and 127,712 officers, divided as follows:

	Officers	Enlisted Men
Regular Army	11,006	501,218
National Guard	15,438	410,652
Reserve Corps	101,268	78,250
National Army		515,964
Totals	127,712	1,506,084

Of these 100,000 are Smiths, 15,000 are William Smiths, 15,000 are Millers, 15,000 are Wilsons, 1,000 are John Browns, 1,200 John Johnsons, 1,040 George Millers, and, of 262 John J. O'Briens 50 have wives named Mary.

The War Department on April 6 issued a call to the states for 150,000 men to report to the colors in the five days beginning April 6. . . . President Wilson on April 6 appointed Edward R. Stettinius and Frederick F. Keppel to be Assistant Secretaries of War. Mr. Stettinius will have charge of all purchases and will be, in effect, a Minister of Munitions; Mr. Keppel will have charge of the non-military activities of the soldiers, looking after the comfort of the men and supervising their amusements. . . . The Shipbuilding Labor Adjustment Board on April 6 adopted a uniform wage scale for all workers in the shipyards on the Atlantic coast, extending to other yards the scale adopted at Philadelphia and Baltimore.

outskirts of Cantigny, northwest of Montdidier. Between Montdidier and Noyon the battle was largely an artillery duel but the French won some ground near Orvillers west of Lassigny.

There were two interesting announcements on April 4th and 5th. One was that American aviation mechanics had rendered invaluable assistance to the British air corps in the groundwork necessary to keep a maximum number of machines in the air. The other was that Italian reserves were also under General Foch's command, indicating that the western front, in the thought of Allied chancelleries, ends no longer at the Swiss frontier but at the Adriatic.

The Italian intelligence service reported great concentrations of Austrians on both sides of Lake Garda and evident preparations for an attack against the lines guarding Brescia and Verona. A break through here would force an Italian withdrawal from the Piave line which Austria apparently considers too strong to be attacked since she is reported to be moving troops from the Piave line to make up her attacking force in the Trentino.

April 6th, the anniversary of America's entrance into the war and the seventeenth day of the battle in Picardy, saw the Germans held fast along the whole front from Montdidier to Arras. At Mesnil-St. Georges, at Monchel, at Hangard, where the Allied positions were improved slightly recovering gains made by the Germans on the day before, and at Denuin all in the Montdidier region, and at Mont Renaud, near Noyon, the French broke up or repulsed enemy attacks. East of Noyon and southeast of Chauny in Coucy wood, where the new fighting lines merge into the old front, the Germans launched a series of violent attacks. The French resisted on the line of advanced posts until heavy losses had been inflicted on the enemy and then fell back slightly to prepared positions. The British front north of the Somme saw only local engagements, following the night of the sixteenth day, in which the intense German pressure was maintained, with slight gains southwest and north of Albert, which they could not extend. Elsewhere the British threw back with great loss the German massed attacks.

On April 7th, the eighteenth day British counter-attacks recaptured the ground taken by the Germans on the 5th in the Aveluy wood north of Albert and made further gains in the neighborhood of Hebuterne, taking men and machine-guns. Attacks on Buequoy were stopped by artillery fire. The Germans continued their attack in Coucy wood making some further progress, reaching the villages of Biehan-court, Antreville, and Barisis, near the southern edge of the wood, and claiming the capture of 1,400 men. This action was apparently intended to give the Germans more elbow-room for their drive toward Amiens and to relieve French pressure on their left flank. The German official report of this day's fighting also told of the repulse of French and British attacks along the Montdidier-Arras front showing conclusively that, for a time at least, the direction of the fighting along this front had been reversed and that the attacker himself was being attacked.

The American forces in the sector northwest of Toul celebrated the first day of their country's second year as a belligerent by repulsing, on April 7th, two hard pressed enemy raids, which came to close quarters in the outpost positions. One raid was covered by a box barrage and the other by a gas shell bombardment.

Secretary Daniels announced in an address on April 6th at Cleveland that the American Navy now had at work in the war zone abroad a total of 35,000 men under command of four admirals, that the force of 150 ships included battleships, cruisers, destroyers, submarines and submarine tenders, gunboats, coast guard cutters, converted yachts, tugs and various other vessels and that America was fighting the submarine over a million square miles of sea. The whole force is commanded by Vice-Admiral Sims. Rear Admiral Wilson is in France, Rear Admiral Niblack is in command in the south, Rear Admiral Rodman commands the battleships and Rear Admiral Dunn is on special duty. The Secretary stated that one detachment of destroyers had in six months steamed over 1,000,000 miles, attacked 81 submarines, escorted 717 single vessels, and 86 convoys and had spent a total of 3,600 days at sea. Only two American vessels have been sunk by submarines, the destroyer Jacob Jones and the converted Alcedo.

The Christian Herald Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

THE Senate of the United States on April 1 adopted without debate the resolution printed on the editorial page of this issue of the Christian Herald.

For months earnest Christians have been hoping and praying that the head of the nation would call the people to its knees, that we might meet with true faith, with humble penitence and with God-given purpose the Kaiser's blasphemous claims to the favor of heaven. But whether or not the President calls to prayer, the members of the Christian Herald Prayer League may well spend the noonday hour in supplication that the nation may receive God's guidance in this time of strife and may be strengthened by his power to battle victoriously for the right.

A. S. C. asks prayer that Christian harmony may prevail in a community where one pastor is serving two churches.

Mrs. M. acknowledges an answer to prayer in the recovery of her young soldier boy in a distant camp, and asks the prayers of the League for an aged mother in Wisconsin.

B. L. writes from a heart full of joy that a brother, who was on the ill-fated Tuscania, has written from a hospital in Ireland that he was rescued. B. L. now asks that if it be God's will the brother may return, and also that the great war may soon cease.

P. A. S. prays that a way may be opened to send some Bible students from an Indian school to the tribes; also that an aunt who is crippled may be cured without an operation.

C. M. K. and wife greet the Prayer League from the far-off island of Oahu, Hawaii, where they are doing Christian work among the men of many nations who labor on the great sugar plantations, and ask the prayers of the League that God's blessing may rest upon them.

Prayers are asked for revivals of religion at:

Gastonia, N. C.; North Leverett, Mass.; Merriam, Ill.; Winfield, W. Va.; Greenville, Ohio; Oxnard, Calif.; Selma, Iowa; Waterville, Vt.; Ooltewah, Tenn. (at the Greenwood Church); Montrose, Kan. (at the M. E. Church); Olney, Ill. (at the First Reformed Church); Hutchinson, Kan. (for the success of a revival); Portland, Ore. (that many may be saved during revival); Cincinnati, Ohio (that many may be saved during revival); Laurens, S. C. (that many may be saved during revival); Portland, Ore. (for a church that has been organized for uplifting the fallen); Niagara Falls, N. Y. (that many may be saved during revival at St. Paul's M. E. Church).

Miss S. T. A., South Carver, Mass., requests prayer that a minister may be sent this year.

Mr. and Mrs. N. M. F., Larussell, Mo., ask prayer that two churches may be united as one; Mrs. I. M. N., Rough and Ready, Calif., that a minister may be sent to her church.

Four friends ask prayer that their mothers' minds may be restored; Mrs. R. C. H., that son's mind may be strengthened; eleven friends, for mental restoration for themselves, relatives or friends.

R. A. asks prayer that father's sight may be restored; fifteen friends, for restoration of sight for themselves, relatives or friends.

Thirteen friends, for restoration of hearing for themselves, relatives or friends.

Forty-four friends ask prayer for a deeper work of grace, assurance of sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing.

Ten friends ask prayer for special blessing for others; including Mrs. M. L. W., that two nephews may return safely from the war zone; M. D. B., for a blessing upon the men of our country.

A subscriber asks prayer that a physician may be cured of the liquor habit; A Friend, that three sons may be cured of the habit; Mrs. H. B., that husband and son may be cured of the liquor habit; H. C. C., that son may be cured of the liquor habit; five friends, that relatives or friends may be cured of the habit.

One hundred and fourteen friends ask prayer for the healing of friends or relatives, including C. V., that sister may be healed without an operation; K. J. B., that daughter may pass safely through an operation; K. B., that niece may gain the use of limbs and learn to talk; K. E., that a missionary may be restored to health and strength; Miss J. F., that nephew may gain the power of speech; seventy-two friends, for healing of self; including Mrs. H. C. G., to regain the use of limbs; F. C., to be cured of stammering; A Mother, that an operation may be successful and health fully restored; D. H., that daughter may pass safely through an operation; Mrs. R. F. W., that mother may pass safely through an operation; D. H. S., that a friend may be cured of cancer; eighty-nine friends, for healing of self; including Mr. L. A. H., to be healed without an operation; A Mother, to pass safely through an operation.

Twenty-nine parents ask prayer for the conversion of sons; thirty-nine wives, their husbands; fifty-six, other relatives and friends.

Thirty-four friends ask prayer for help or guidance in financial matters.

Thirty-two friends ask prayer for the granting of various desires and needs, including Miss M. C., for rain in West Texas; three friends, for world-wide peace.

Four friends ask prayer that relatives or friends may be cured of the tobacco habit.

Acknowledgments of answered prayer have been received from the following:

Mrs. S. R. W.; Miss F. W., University Place, N. H.; Mrs. G. R., Williamsport, Pa.; Mrs. J. J. W., Tuscola, Ill.; Mrs. E. M. S., Spencer, N. Y.; Mrs. M. S. H., Wayo Mills, Canada; Mrs. M. L. B., Kissimmee, Fla.; A Subscriber, Scranton, Pa.; Mrs. M. H., Grooville, N. Y.; Miss I. E. K., Harrisburg, Va.; Mrs. E. H., Huntoon, Canada; A Believer, Lyons, N. Y.; L. E. B., Brooklyn, N. Y.; Mrs. R. G., Boulder, Colo.; Mrs. F. C. R., Newark, N. J.; M. W., Hemp, Va.; Mrs. E. O. L., Grooville, N. Y.; Mrs. J. M. S., San Antonio, Texas; Mrs. L. L. C., Grenada, Miss.; Mrs. S., Billings, Mont.; Mrs. S. E. S., Urbana, Ill.; J. A. S., Montgomery, Ala.; J. M. S., Hutchinson, Kan.; Mrs. G. H. A., Garrison, Kan.; A Friend, Pinewood, S. C.; S. E. P., Greenfield, Ohio; A Believer, Lockport, N. Y.; Mrs. K. J., Louisville, Colo.

"Yes?" he breathed. "And then—Go on!"

The resonant voice read along through the short newspaper story—read through the brief clipping that was as brave as it was brief. But it was only when it spoke of being mentioned in dispatches—spoke of a War Cross laid over a silent heart that the Boy broke down—

"And I'm here!" he half sobbed—"while he—he was only a kid, and reckless—was out there, doing real things! He needn't have held that gun position, but he did! And I was sitting here, safe, thousands of miles from it all—not helping—"

It was Bill who answered him. "Not helping!" he said, and the hand that he laid on the Boy's arm was a tender one. "Why, if a nation doesn't have pioneers—"

Quite suddenly the Boy flung off the hand—"It was bravery," he said, "but it wasn't necessary that he should be the one—I always felt that he'd come back—It was recklessness—"

The man who held the paper in his hand spoke,

"He has come back," he said quietly. "And it wasn't recklessness—or even bravery. It was his atonement!"

There was silence in the little room as the Boy sat with his head in the crook of his elbow. And then, suddenly, moved by some half-blind impulse, the oldest man turned to the phonograph. The record that he set on it was a record chosen at random, but as the first bars of it sounded, the Boy's tear-blind eyes were lifted and the paper dropped from the hand of the man who sat beside him.

SOMEWHERE in the midst of a red chaos of war mud-stained figures were fighting and going bravely out to meet the Bravest Adventure. But there, on the outskirts of a far place, three men, dim-eyed, stood erect in a lonely cabin, and listened to their nation's anthem.

The wife of a self-made man is often very much dissatisfied with his job.

When a man says: "The milk of human kindness has run dry," ask him if he has fed the cow.

If You Love Your Country—UP WITH THE STARS AND STRIPES

THE least thing you can do for your country is to—show its flag. Let your neighbors know that yours is a patriotic home. You'll need this flag for holidays too—in fact for every day during these strenuous times.

A Large-Sized Old Glory, six feet long and four feet wide. The very Flag you've wanted. It will add much to your celebration of Memorial Day and Independence Day. You'll need it, too, for other National Holidays and local celebrations when the American Flag is indispensable.

The illustration is an actual photographic reproduction of this splendid large flag, which we have procured for readers of the Christian Herald. To insure durability the stripes are double-stitched. Excellent bright colors, guaranteed not to fade, nor shrink. Pole is not included.

Let your children get their first lessons in patriotism in your own home. If you stand solidly behind the great principles of Freedom and Human Rights, let the flag tell it. Pledge your allegiance to your country by displaying "Old Glory." We will make it easy for you to show your colors. Here is an offer that brings you "Old Glory" at half the price you would pay for a similar flag if purchased in a store—and at the time it is most needed. At this critical time in the history of our country you should display the Stars and Stripes.

By placing an order for thousands of these Flags, we were able to purchase them at a considerable reduction. We are glad to give readers of the Christian Herald the benefit of this saving in the liberal offer mentioned above. This flag cannot be purchased in a store for less than $1.50.

Special Flag Offers:

We will send this large American Flag, all charges prepaid, and The Christian Herald for one year, (new or renewal) all for only

$2.75

We will send one of these large American Flags, all charges prepaid, to any present subscriber who will send us $2.00 for one new yearly subscription to The Christian Herald.

Foods That Fight!

We all know that the chemist in his laboratory has to be extremely careful in combining chemicals or he will cause an explosion. But what many of us do not know is that the human body, plants, flowers, everything—every drop of water and every bit of food are composed of exactly the same elements that the chemist handles so carefully. And in our ignorance we continue to juggle foods about carelessly—we mix them at our own pleasure—we pour them into our stomachs in such combinations as would cause an explosion if mixed in a chemist's retort.

That is what we mean by "Foods That Fight." There are many foods, good in themselves, but when poured into the stomach in improper combinations, attack each other as one vicious bulldog attacks another. You can imagine how this "fighting" disturbs the proper work of the stomach and connecting organs of the body.

Why We Get Sick

Health is a natural condition. Nature, if not interfered with, would keep every one well. But we heedlessly or unconsciously put obstacles in Nature's way—we eat "foods that fight"—or we in some other way disobey Nature's laws and then we become sick. All disease is caused by the violation of Nature's Own laws.

Of all Nature's laws, the law of Nutrition (converting and absorbing food into the body) is probably least understood—and consequently most often violated. So little is it understood, indeed, that one eminent scientist estimates that 90% of all human ills are caused, directly or indirectly, by disobedience to this one law.

The Law of Nutrition

Yet this law is very simple. It sets forth only three fundamental principles: First, that food must be selected which will supply all the elements that the body needs. Second: that food must be eaten only in such combinations as will agree chemically. Third: that the correct proportions shall be eaten so as not to supply too much of some things and not enough of others.

Obey these three rules and you increase bodily health, strength and vigor. Disobey them and you disturb Nature's systematic working, weaken your resistance and invite disease.

True Purpose of Food

The true purpose of food is to promote growth and sustain life.

That person enjoys the best health, the keenest mental and perceptive powers, the highest mental and physical organism, who can select and feed upon such articles as will supply all the things the body needs in their purest form and in right or natural proportions.

But the best food is often rendered useless—many times positively harmful—by taking quantities larger than can be digested or in combinations that are chemically inharmonious.

The Secret of Health

The remedy for all disease is to remove the cause. Medicines may give temporary relief. Permanent cure can be effected only by removing or correcting the cause of the trouble.

When you consider, therefore, that a majority of all disease is caused by stomach disturbances, you see how important it is that we study very carefully how to keep the stomach in its natural healthy condition and how to restore that condition after it has once been disturbed.

How, for example, can you prevent stomach disturbances if you do not know the "foods that fight"? How can you decrease your weight unless you know the foods that make fat? How can you increase your weight and strength unless you know what foods supply fat and strength? How can you keep the body well unless you know what makes it sick?

One Great Authority

One of the greatest—if not the greatest—students of this subject is Eugene Christian, the eminent New York Food Scientist, whose work has secured for him an enviable reputation throughout the country. It is to him we are indebted for putting in simplified form the fundamental principles which underlie all the processes of building, rebuilding and keeping the human body in repair.

This he has done in a course of what he calls Little Lessons in Corrective Eating. These lessons—there are 24 of them—contain actual menus for breakfast, luncheon and dinner, curative as well as corrective, covering every condition of health and sickness from infancy to old age and for all occupations, climates and seasons. They tell not only the foods that fight but hundreds of other things about food that we all ought to know.

Every point is so thoroughly covered that you can scarcely think of a question which isn't answered. You can start eating the very things that will produce the physical and mental change you are seeking the day you receive the lessons and you will find that you secure results with the first meal.

Little Lessons in Corrective Eating and Christian Herald for One Year $5.00 Value for $3.00

Nearly two hundred thousand sets of Eugene Christian's Little Lessons have been sold during the past two years at $3.00 each, but through a special arrangement with the publishers, the Christian Herald is able to offer its readers this remarkable set of lessons, together with a year's subscription to Christian Herald for only $3.00. This means a $2.00 saving.

The Christian Herald has fully investigated Eugene Christian's food system and can confidently recommend it to its readers. Already over 7,000 of our subscribers have bought sets of these books and have fully tested their value. Their approval confirms our opinion as to their merits. Eugene Christian's system is not to be confused in any way with the medical systems; it is wholly scientific hygiene reduced to the last point of simplicity. We believe that its adoption by all of our readers would result in their overwhelming endorsement of it; hence, being fully convinced of its merits we see no reason to withhold the Christian Herald's unqualified commendation of a system which is capable of doing so much good.

Only a limited number of the Little Lessons are available, however, so immediate action is necessary. Mail the coupon today.

the knowledge of him will cover the earth as the waters cover the sea. Especially should it be noted that Satan will then be removed from the scene and from active participation in human affairs. (Rev. 20:1-5).

And finally, as showing more clearly the relation of the Kingdom of Heaven to the Kingdom of God, let it be repeated that the Kingdom of Heaven has for its great object the ultimate establishment of the Kingdom of God in the earth. That is to say, the "Kingdom of Heaven merges into the Kingdom of God," when Christ, having "put all enemies (of the Kingdom of Heaven) under his feet," "shall have delivered up the Kingdom (of Heaven) to God, even the Father" (1 Cor. 15:24-28).

III

COMING to the thought of the Church, it is the translation of the Greek word "ecclesia," which means the called-out ones, as when a number of people are called out from their private concerns to a public meeting, an assembly of some kind. In the New Testament it is used (1) to designate a local church, as when Paul speaks of "the church which is at Cenchrea" (Rom. 16:1); (2) a group of churches, as when he speaks of "all the churches of the Gentiles" (Rom. 16:4); (3) the visible body of professed believers, "all the churches of Christ" (Rom. 16:16); and especially (4) the body of the truly redeemed in this dispensation, no matter of what locality, or to what class they belong, "the Lord added to the Church daily" (Acts 2:47) "the Church which is His body" (Eph. 1:22, 23), "the Church of the first-born" (Heb. 12:23). These are the called-out ones in the sense that God, by his Holy Spirit, has called them out of the world unto himself through the exercise of their faith in Christ. They have been "delivered out of the power of darkness, and translated into the kingdom of the Son." (Col. 1:13.)

Thus we see that the Church is not revealed in the plan of God till we reach the New Testament. Then it is that Christ appears on the earth, he who is the Seed of the woman promised in Eden, the Seed of Abraham and the Seed of David, the Son who should proceed out of him and in whom his Kingdom (i. e. the Kingdom of Heaven) should be established forever (Sam. 7:12, 13). "In those days came John the Baptist, preaching in the wilderness of Judea, and saying, Repent ye, for the Kingdom of Heaven is at hand" (Matt. 3:1, 2). And Christ himself at the initiation of his ministry in Galilee did the same (4:17). But Israel did not repent, but instead she kept on in her wicked way and rejected "him of whom Moses in the law and the prophets did write." When this rejection became evident and fixed at the time of Peter's noble confession of him as "the Christ, the Son of the Living God," then it was that Christ announced the new program about the Church which had been "kept secret since the world began" (Rom. 16:25). He said "upon this rock," i. e., upon this confession of me, "I will build my Church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it" (Matt. 16:18). This building process began on the day of Pentecost, and has been in process ever since, and will continue until the building is completed, when "the Church which is His body" (Eph. 1:22, 23), will be caught up to meet its Head in the air (1 Thess. 4:16-18). (See the previous article referred to, "The Place of the Church in the Plan of Redemption.")

It thus appears that the Church at present bears something of the same relationship to the Kingdom of Heaven that the latter bears to the Kingdom of God; in other words, it has for one of its objects at least, the ultimate establishment of the Kingdom of Heaven upon the earth. (Eph. 5:29-32; 1 Tim. 2:12).

IV

ciated. For example, consider (1) the terms used in representing each. The Church is "built," the Kingdom is "set up." The first word is never used in connection with the Kingdom nor the second in connection with the Church. Consider (2) the relationship sustained by men and women toward each. The Church has its "elders," its "messengers," its "servants," but the Kingdom has its "heirs." We "see," we "receive," we "enter," we "inherit the Kingdom," but these terms are never used in Scripture of our relationship to the Church. Consider (3) the way in which reference is made to each. The "advancement" and "extension" of the Kingdom are spoken of, but the "cleansing" and "edifying" of the Church. (4) The Kingdom is a unit, the Church an aggregation. The word "Kingdom" is never found in the plural, but "Church" is very commonly referred to thus. (5) The Church will reign with Christ, but the Kingdom will be reigned over by Christ and his Church. (6) The Church is an election, taken out of all nations; the Kingdom will be universal. (7) The Church is now in the world and longs for the time when it will be delivered out of it, but the Kingdom is still in abeyance and prayed for in the familiar words, "Thy Kingdom come, thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven." (8) The Church is temporal so far as its establishment on the earth is concerned, but the Kingdom is an everlasting kingdom.

Years ago there lived and ministered in Boston an earnest though somewhat eccentric individual known as Father Taylor, pastor of the Seamen's Bethel. He was a godly man but not very cultivated, and one day, while preaching, he became considerably tangled in his utterance and broke out with the words, "Brethren, I seem to have lost the track of my nominative case; but one thing I know, I'm bound for the Kingdom!" He was right. Though he had been in the Church a great many years, he realized that the Kingdom was still future. Father Taylor, in other words, was not guilty of the blunder of a university president (also a minister) whom we have seen quoted as follows: "The Christian Church is the Kingdom of God on earth, viewed in its objective or institutional form. God's Kingdom among men is as old as human history!"

THERE are two or three textual objections to the foregoing that may suggest themselves. For example, what about Christ's words, "My Kingdom is not of this world," and "The Kingdom of God is within you" (John 18:36; Luke 17:21)? And the words of Paul, "For the Kingdom of God is not meat and drink, but righteousness, peace and joy in the Holy Spirit" (Rom. 14:17). Some have found embarrassment in reconciling the first with the idea that the Kingdom is to be an earthly one; but there is no more conflict there than in the case of the Church. Christ's Church is not of this world, but it is in the world. It is the same with the second text, which the margin renders, "The Kingdom of God is among you, or in the midst of you." The Kingdom could not in any sense have been within the persons to whom Christ addressed these words, because they were the wicked and contentious Pharisees who were expecting the Kingdom to come by such methods of observation as they could appreciate. Christ's words rebuked them. The Kingdom was already in the midst of them, or among them, in the sense that the King was there, if only they had eyes to see him. And as to Paul's words, of course, righteousness, peace and joy are already in the earth, but this does not constitute the Kingdom to be set up after the coming judgment on the nations, and which is to constitute the throne of David.

Hence we see that the true attitude of the Church today must be that of the best days of her history, one of loyal and loving expectancy, as she continues to pray: "Thy Kingdom come; Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven."

Reflections After the Skidding Accident

Reflections that show Tire Chains as the only real dependable device for the prevention of skidding, do not come to some motorists until their bare rubber tires skid and carry them upon the rocks of disaster. How strange it is that some men are never guided by the experience of others, never take the lesson home to themselves until too late.

They read the newspaper accounts of disastrous skidding accidents caused by lack of Tire Chains, but they do not heed the warning. They wait until the skidding of their own bare rubber tires results in death, injury or car-damage before they realize that tires are safe on wet-slippy-skiddy roads only when encased in Tire Chains.

Weed Tire Chains

Pneumatic Tires

The world's largest automobile insurers, after long and vast experience in handling automobile accident claims, strongly advise the use of Tire Chains on every automobile they insure. The Aetna Life Insurance Company, The Aetna Casualty and Surety Company and The Automobile Insurance Company of Hartford, Conn., now print on their automobile policies the vital information that Tire Chains are the only real dependable device for the prevention of skidding. Could anyone imagine a stronger endorsement?

Saving the Money That Slipped Through Their Fingers

How an Investment of $2.00 Grew to $7,000 in Seven Years Without Speculation

BY ARTHUR H. PATTERSON

MR. AND MRS. B. live in Connecticut. He is a clerk in the office of a manufacturing plant. They have been married ten years, and for the first three years of their married life they not only failed to save but actually went in debt over $400. They now have two children, own a comfortable cottage home which is appraised at $3,500 and is clear and free. They have savings-bank accounts of $1,800 and $1,700 invested in 7% preferred securities. And every dollar of this money has been saved from salary during the past seven years, an average of $1,000 per year.

I am going to tell you their story, or rather let Mr. B. tell it as he related it to me. If you are facing the crisis in your affairs which the B.'s faced in those early days of married life, it may help you to meet it and come off victorious.

Listen to what Mr. B. says:

I am now 37 years of age; married and the Daddy of two children. When I was married I had exactly $750 on hand in cash, inherited from my father's estate. Up to that time I never saved a nickel and if this money hadn't come as a windfall, we could not have been married. I held a good position and was earning $2,000 a year. That was in 1907. For the next three years Jane and I just let things run along, living comfortably on my salary. The $750 which I inherited went for furniture and home needs and we did manage to buy—on the spur of early married ambition, perhaps—$300 more of furniture which we paid for out of my salary. But all the rest of it went for clothing, rent, food, amusement, books, cigars, etc. We spent it as it came and it was always a race between our cash and our bills to see which would be on top at the end of the month. Usually the cash lost. But the bills didn't press or worry me. I ran accounts with tradesmen who knew me and knew I was good for it. But gradually the bills distanced the cash and at the end of three years I was in a hole just $400; and then the situation grew serious because we had a baby and in order to pay the emergency bills of the occasion, I had to let my other creditors wait and they became restless.

Jane and I had tried time and time again to live within my salary and save a few dollars, but it wasn't any use. We lacked the backbone somehow and didn't have the necessary system to help us see it through. One day I came across a remark made by James Hill, the railroad builder, and it set me thinking. It burned itself into my brain. It was this:

"If you want to know whether you are going to be a success or failure in life, you can easily find out. The test is simple and infallible. Are you able to save money? If not, drop out."

You will fail as sure as you live. You may not think so, but you will. The seed of success is not in you."

I went home and that evening Jane and I had a long heart-to-heart talk. We sat up until one o'clock, studying, planning, debating, wondering how we could change our shiftless, easy-going habits so that we could feel that we were going to be classified with the successful ones and not the failures.

We made up our minds that from that night on not a penny would be spent for other than bare necessities until every debt had been paid. We resolved to live on half my salary, reasoning that if other people whom we knew could live respectably on $1,000, there was no reason why we shouldn't. Then Jane said: "We ought to keep a cash account and put down just where the money goes. We can't go by guess-work any longer. We've been living that way for three years. We'll begin now to keep a record of our money."

What Jane said brought to my mind an advertisement which I had seen only a few days before, about an Expense Book for family accounts. So I got the magazine and found the ad. It told about the Economy Expense Book for personal and household accounting. The description told me that it was exactly the thing we needed and before going to bed I wrote a letter ordering a copy. In a few days it came, and Jane and I had an interesting session studying it and entering the Cash and Expenditure Items which we had been keeping tab of since the midnight resolution.

That book taught us something about the science of home economics. We learned, for instance, that in a properly arranged budget a man earning the salary I did could save, without stinting, at least 30% of his salary. But we were beating that figure. We had raised the ante to 50% and that without suffering for a single need. Of course, we had cut out the theatre, the cigars, the expensive lunches and we'd begun to get acquainted with some of our discarded clothes all over again. And I learned that rent consumed in the balanced budget 17½% (which was about our cost); food was 25% and we cut it to 21%; clothes, 17%, we chopped to 5% that first year, and it never rose over 10% the first four years.

We started on the new system in April, 1910. The following April when we balanced the books for the first year we found this result: Every single bill paid and $653 in the savings bank! Glorious! We were out of the woods and for the first time in my entire business career I had visions of success on which I could actually stand without breaking through into the quicksands of despair. We celebrated that night in good style with a dinner and the theatre and that's become part of the program ever since—the annual dinner of the board of directors, Jane calls it.

The rest is easy. We were on the right track and once started nothing could turn us back.

We stuck right to the original program for three years, living on half my salary and saving the other half. Then I got a raise of $250 and that made it quite a bit easier. A year ago I got another raise, bringing my salary up to $2,500, where it now stands.

I've never had the least trouble, since starting on the first page of my first copy of Woolson's Economy Expense Book, in living within my income and saving money. That book brought us, not only independence, but it changed me from a worried, half-baked existence into a self-respecting, successful man. I am in a position, as the result of our joint efforts, where I need look to no man for favors; and further than that, my success has brought us into a circle of friends, both business and social, who value us because we are looked upon in our town as "worth while" and "the sort who are getting ahead."

Woolson's Economy Expense Book is designed to keep track of the income and expenses of the average family in a systematic manner. Each book is made to contain the records of four consecutive years.

No knowledge of bookkeeping or accounting is necessary to properly keep a Woolson Book. The lifetime experience of an expert accountant is in the book. He devised it for his own household and planned it so his wife could keep it.

Two minutes daily is sufficient to keep it written up to date. At the end of each week and month and year you not only know where every penny went, but you will have an analysis and comparative table of all the various expenditures, showing just what it went for. Every detail of money management is provided for by a simple, easy system that a 12-year-old child could handle.

This book has proved truly a godsend to thousands because it has taught them a sure way to manage their finances. With it you know every minute just where you are money-wise. It automatically shows every penny of income and outgo; just how much for groceries, dress, rent, medicine, amusement, car-fare, etc.—and all this instantly and plainly. It is not complicated or tiresome. In fact, once you have started keeping a Woolson Book you will find it fascinating as a game and a miser for saving money.

The publishers are desirous, while the interest of the American public is fastened on the problem of high-cost-of-living, to distribute several hundred thousand copies of the new greatly improved edition, and are doing it in this way:

Merely write to them and ask that a copy be sent you without cost for a five-days' examination. If at the end of the time you decide to keep it, you send $2.00 in payment, or if you wish to return it, you can do so without further obligation. Send no cash. Merely fill in the coupon, supply business reference, mail, and the book will be sent you immediately.

New York filled Broad Street from curb to curb to show its allegiance and buy bonds

A M E R I C A ' S new Liberty Loan for $3,000,000,000, the third of its kind, has set a new world record in the science of money-raising. It has swept on far along the road to success in a whirlwind of enthusiasm. Long before the period of its public offering closes, on May 4, it is believed that it will have gone "over the top," with a huge margin over-subscribed.

Our first issue of Liberty Bonds was a new experience for the nation. A certain degree of education was still necessary for the flotation of the Second Liberty Loan. In the first two Loans, the country has already absorbed $5,808,000,000 of Liberty Bonds. It would surprise nobody if at the conclusion of the third flotation, the total in Liberty Bonds should aggregate $10,000,000,000 or over.

The Third Liberty Loan found the country not only ready, but enthusiastically expectant. For weeks in advance of the opening of the Loan, the nation had been taking in deep draughts of inspiration from many sources. First, there was the news from the front in France, where our brave soldier boys were fighting shoulder to shoulder by the side of the Allies. When the great attack in Picardy began, day after day patriotic Americans looked at their morning papers with increased interest. Every mention of

American daring and every item that told how our troops were more than holding their own and meeting every test, gave new zest to the desire to back them up by buying Liberty Bonds. Every loyal heart from the Atlantic to the Pacific was glad that America had been in time to have a part—and not an inconsiderable part, either—in the greatest battle in history, possibly the final struggle in the war for democracy, justice and righteousness. These events of the three greatest weeks of the war, laid a foundation for the Third Liberty Loan which left little necessity for further education of the people, assuring plenty of workers and ample subscriptions everywhere. Liberty Loan Committees had their forces marshaled and ready for the opening of the campaign. In all the states, from the big cities down to the smallest villages and hamlets, the workers were ready for the great event to begin. Secretary of the Treasury McAdoo, the busiest man in America, had his forces at work everywhere, and himself spoke at many gatherings.

At 9 A. M., on Saturday, April 6, the great three-billion loan to win the war was officially declared open. Simultaneously, all the wheels of the vast mechanism devised by the management of the Loan Administration were set in motion. In the spring sunshine, immense crowds assembled in all the cities, and to the universal accompaniment of stirring music, patriotic oratory, Liberty Bells ringing, and impromptu parades, the subscriptions began to flow in like a flood, from Maine to California, and from Minnesota to the Gulf of Mexico. New York with a quota of $900,000,000, went well over the one-hundred-million mark on this first Saturday, the actual total subscribed being in the neighborhood of $105,000,000.

More than 200 communities throughout the country were able to report their entire quota raised, and in many cases even exceeded, in the first day's subscriptions. The question immediately arose as to which town would be able to claim the prize as the first to reach its quota. There were apparently 45 towns tied for first honors, and it was expected that at least 100 would finally qualify for a part in the multiple tie. Lynn, Mass., was probably the largest city to reach its quota so quickly. Sioux City, Iowa, Joliet, Ill., and Burlington, Vt., were first in their respective classes. Indeed, so fast and furious was the rivalry, and so emphatic the success of the Loan in these places, that Secretary McAdoo decided that, temporarily at least, no more reports as to totals reached in the campaign in the different sections should be announced, since he felt that the final success of the drive might be imperiled by overconfidence.

On the evening of the opening day, Liberty Loan Rallies were held in 10,000 schoolhouses in forty-six states, to celebrate the opening of the Loan. These were scenes of enthusiastic congratulation and the patriotic addresses and songs fittingly marked the close of a memorable day in the country's history. Everywhere was the universal conviction that, long before the month allotted to the work, the Loan would go "over the top" with a rush and away beyond.

On April 9th, Secretary McAdoo made a plea for the largest possible oversubscription, declaring that no greater blow could be dealt the Kaiser than a tremendous overtopping of quotas all over the country. President Wilson's inspiring address at Baltimore was echoed all over the country in the multiplied subscriptions of ardent patriots.

Secretary McAdoo, after warning against overconfidence because the loan had started with every indication of great success, said: "Let us not stop when we have reached our quota. Let us go forward and make the quota three or four times as great, if it is possible to do it, and let us at the same time make the number of subscribers to these bonds three times as great as it was before. There is no answer that will carry such discouragement to the enemies of America and of civilization as that 20,000,000

Americans have subscribed this time for Liberty bonds. We can get the 20,000,000 if we stay in the fight and make up our minds to do it.

"If we do this it will mean that the loan will be widely distributed, that it will not strain the resources of the country, and it will mean in addition that we shall not have three billion dollars, but four billion or five billion, to help our gallant men in this supreme test of all time for the liberties of the world."

On April 10th, the ban against the publication of total subscriptions was lifted in part, reserve banks being permitted to announce the total of subscriptions actually completed. The New York Reserve Bank was able to report on this basis $157,097,350, which included the subscriptions received up to the evening of the 9th.

Secretary McAdoo, again urged the danger of overconfidence. In spite of the enthusiastic response of the first days, the mounting totals, and the quotas exceeded, it was still, and will be until May 4th, necessary for every person under the waving folds of "Old Glory" to sell all he can and to buy all he can, and to put into the effort the last ounce of his influence and strength that America's answer to the German challenge of brute force may be unmistakable and irresistible.

By Monday of April 10, 600 communities had reported oversubscriptions and claimed the right to fly the Honor Flag. Official awards of the Flag had already been made to about half that number. In the great cities the volume of subscriptions continued to increase. A change in weather conditions made no impression on the public enthusiasm. In New York, so great was the enthusiasm that the Liberty Bell was kept ringing almost continuously. Drives in the financial, commercial and manufacturing districts, speeded up subscriptions greatly throughout the week. Rich and poor, millionaire and worker, capitalist and employee, bought their bonds side by side. The biggest subscription announced from any section of the country was $35,000,000 from the U. S. Steel Corporation. Banks, railroads and brokerage houses were heavy buyers. The New York Metropolitan district, by the morning of April 11, had $135,950,400.

At the closing of business on Friday, the contributions reported by the Federal Reserve Banks for the leading cities as follows:

Philadelphia	31,597,750
Boston	46,361,200
Richmond	6,916,150
Atlanta	3,259,750
Chicago	55,210,000
Cleveland	33,989,150
St. Louis	29,268,400
Kansas City	13,267,750
Dallas	15,347,250
San Francisco	11,426,600

The first five days of the four-weeks' campaign had been an unqualified success, being more than double the total for the first five days of the Second Liberty Loan drive. The fifth day brought up the total of subscriptions in the five New York City boroughs to $168,787,700.

From all other sources throughout the country, $451,744,000 was reported up to Friday afternoon.

Over 100 additional claims were filed for Honor Flags, up to Friday morning. The San Francisco district won 95 Honor Flags and 167 were claimed in the state of Oregon by towns and villages that had gone "over the top."

It was announced on Thursday afternoon that the state of Oregon had, on the showing of official returns, completed its quota. The State of Iowa had also made its quota but the Chicago Reserve Bank on Friday morning had not yet received the official returns. Both states felt that they had just started. Oregon had already subscribed $19.50 per capita and the city of Portland $48.90 per capita. Portland and Toledo, Ohio, were rival claimants for the first honor flag for cities in the class of 100,000 to 250,000. Both passed their quota in four days. Portland raising $10,120,000 and Toledo $10,700,000. Out of 168,000 persons in Toledo, 46,200 bought bonds.

Ten Congressmen See the Trenches

By Hon. C. C. DILL

[Mr. Dill, who represents in Congress the Fifth District of the State of Washington, was a member of the party of Congressmen who recently made a tour of the Western front in Europe.]

THE war is so big that America must supply millions of men and billions of dollars. This is my conclusion after visiting the French, English and Belgian battle-fronts from Switzerland to the North Sea.

It is impossible to give the details of the trip taken by the ten congressmen in this statement, so I shall give only a brief outline. We sailed on the American liner St. Louis. The St. Louis has five guns. They are manned by crack crews of American naval gunners. Besides, it was convoyed through the submarine zone by American destroyers. The maneuvers at sea, the practice shooting at targets, the sailing without any lights whatever through the darkness, and the impossibility of sending any wireless messages to the outside world, impressed us all very forcibly that we were moving into the world of war.

At Liverpool representatives of the British foreign when England's greatest statesman told of the wonderful deeds of valor of her sailors and soldiers on water and on land and over and under both. We had already seen the destruction in various parts of London caused by Zeppelin raids, just two days before our arrival, and as we hurried to our hotel that night along deserted streets at 11 P. M., we heard from every corner the cry of "Take cover!" being given by policemen and boy scouts, while the people hurried into basements and cellars.

We attended services in St. George's Chapel, the chapel of the king, and sat in the seats of the Knights of the Garter. Here we were honored again when at the close of the service, the organ pealed forth "The Star-Spangled Banner." That was the first time that tune was ever played in the king's chapel.

THEN we went to France. With two dirigible balloons circling over the boat and five destroyers riding around it, we all realized fully that it was a real danger zone.

In Paris it required two days to make arrangements for the trip to the front. During this time there was not an idle hour. General Pershing entertained us at dinner. We were taken into the crypt of the tomb of Napoleon and on the same day we laid a wreath on the tomb of Lafayette. We saw the Y. M. C. A. hotels for our soldiers and visited the American headquarters. Again we visited Red Cross hospitals and saw more of the wonderful women and men who are nursing back to life the soldiers who have all but died.

In military care, under the direction of Colonel Parker of the American army and Count LeMoix of the French army, we went to the battle-fronts. It was just at the time when French troops were leaving for Italy. We saw thousands and tens of thousands of infantry on the march, the long lines of lorries, the big guns, the roadside kitchens, and camouflage of every imaginable kind. We saw Soissons and its ruined cathedral. We visited Rheims and what is left of that once marvelous cathedral. While there we met and talked with Cardinal Lucon, who has never left his church, although it has been struck by 370 shells. Then we went to Verdun—Verdun, the mere mention of which makes the blood of every French soldier tingle with sadness and pride—sadness because of the terrible losses of men; pride because of the wonderful deeds done there by the brave men whose bodies are ground into the very earth of those hills. That day will never be forgotten by a single American congressman who was in that party. Colonel Dehay, the commandant, led us to the pulverized and shell-pocked top of Fort Souville, the point where the French stopped, overwhelmed and threw back the German hosts. He described the battle in great detail. Then, with a swing of the arm covering the whole hill, he said to us with a voice that quivered with emotion. "If all the men who fell here were evenly distributed, there would be five dead men to every square meter (yard) of ground."

Next we visited the American headquarters and the American camp. There we met the generals of Pershing's staff and saw that magnificent body of young men who form the vanguard of the great American army that is to follow. We saw them in their training camp, we saw them building hutments, we saw them living in the towns and mingling with the people among whom they are billeted, and they were everywhere healthy, cheerful and determined.

FROM there we went to the Champagne and Aisne country, visiting large areas of the devastated regions of France, held for from two to three years by the Germans. We visited that great battle-field of the Somme, where in three months fighting the Allies lost 900,000 men and the Germans 750,000 men, but which the Allies won. We stood on Vimy Ridge and looked across to Lens, then still held by the Germans.

The last part of the trip proved the most exciting and the most dangerous, because it was our trip to the Belgian front-line trenches, only ninety feet from the Germans. It was there that the snipers and German machine-gunners fired upon us.

We all realized our trip had been remarkable, both in the honors paid us and the things shown us. We went to see the war as it is and our trip was a wonderful success.

The supreme duty of the present is for every American to support and aid his country in every way possible in winning this war. We may differ sometimes as to methods and policies to be followed before the policy has been determined upon, but once the majority have spoken, all differences should end in a whole-hearted and united support, that victory and peace may be the more quickly won.

Douglas Fairbanks turns from the movies to move bonds. He is addressing the crowd shown on the page ahead office and of the American embassy took the members of Congress off the steamer shortly after the ship arrived.

We left for London at 2:30 P. M., and arrived at 7 P. M. Our first impression was that it was a city of darkness. This was because of the dim and hooded street lights. The British officials there wanted to entertain us for two weeks before taking us to France, but we dared not stay more than three or four days if we were to cover the battle-fronts and return for the opening of Congress in December. During that period they made a most wonderful use of the time. First they took us to some of their great orthopedic hospitals. We were most impressed at Ruehampton and Shepherd's Bush, where they remake broken men, where the legless are enabled to walk and the armless to do almost everything a man with arms can do.

We saw wives and mothers in some wards, sitting beside the parts of men that were left after operations which had just been performed. They had that wonderful look in their eyes that only those who have made the supreme sacrifice can have. We saw perfect physical specimens of men from twenty to thirty-five years old, whose nerves were broken, whose brains could not function—saw them learning to walk like babies of only twelve months of age, saw them trying to make their bodies do the many things they had always done before. We saw men with every conceivable kind of injuries, being cured and remade and all but hypnotized into believing they could still play a useful part in this world of struggle.

WE also went to St. Dunstan's Hospital for blind soldiers, where soldiers whose eyesight has been shot away are taught the trades and sounds they could not learn while they could see. All this was before we had seen the war itself.

Then we were taken to the House of Commons and the House of Lords, as guests of honor, on the day

General Haig Commands Britain's Lines to Hold

AT the close of the third week of the great offensive, the struggle was still indecisive. There was strong evidence, however, at many points that the strength of the German advance had diminished, and the Allies were holding the enemy in check at practically all the vital points. Fierce fighting had taken place south of Ypres in the struggle for the conquest of the Messines Ridge, but all attacks had been repulsed. There had also been heavy fighting near Bailleul and Neuve Eglise, but they remained in British hands according to last reports. An incident of the week was the evacuation of Armentieres, which was heavily bombarded with gas shells. Berlin cablegrams claimed the capture of a portion of the garrison, with its officers. The Germans also claimed to have made progress south of Bailleul, and there was sharp fighting at Vieux Berquin and Merris.

Up to Sunday, April 14, there was no material change in the general situation. The Allied battle-line had materially stiffened during the week. Little has been reported during the week relative to the struggle for Amiens, which is doubtless yet to be renewed.

Our American troops have rendered an excellent account of themselves in several sharp fights with the enemy during the week, with comparatively few casualties among our boys. The French general commanding in a neighboring sector personally congratulated the commander of the American units on the excellent offensive qualities of our men and the fine resistance they put up against superior numbers.

The Story of the Fighting

ON April 8, the nineteenth day of the battle in Picardy, the Germans continued their pressure against the French between the Oise and the Ailette and also began an intense bombardment on the British front from Lens north to the neighborhood of Armentieres. The British lines north of the Somme from Albert to Arras, especially in the neighborhood of Buequoy, were under heavy fire. South of the Oise, the Germans made progress, the French withdrawing to the western bank of the Ailette.

On April 9, the intense bombardment which had continued since the Sunday night before along the British front north of Arras was intensified. The back areas within five miles of the line were heavily gassed. Early on the 9th, the twentieth day of battle, the German infantry advanced against an eleven-mile front between Givenchy and Fleurbaix. The lines in the center of the attack were held by a couple of Portuguese divisions. Here, as at St. Quentin on March 21, the main effort of the enemy was aimed to drive a wedge between the lines of different tongues. All through the 9th and 10th of April the battle raged furiously. The village of Givenchy was twice lost by the British and twice regained. The British left flank was withdrawn slightly at Fleurbaix, but the British center with the Portuguese troops was pushed back over the marshy ground for a distance of more than five miles. Both Vimy Ridge on the south and the Messines Ridge on the north were still firmly in British hands.

On April 10 the fighting spread northward of Armentieres as far as the Ypres-Comines Canal. South of Armentieres the Germans succeeded in crossing the Lys and establishing themselves on the left or northern bank of the stream. South of Estaires to Givenchy the line, which here protected the important base of Bethune, only four miles away, stood fast against repeated assaults. At Givenchy over 750 Germans were made prisoners. North of Armentieres the Germans penetrated the British first position and fought their way into Ploegsteert Wood, but failed to gain the heights, although they created a dangerous salient about Armentieres.

April 11, the twenty-second day since the opening of the attack in Picardy, saw the crest of battle sweeping again over the plains of Flanders. From Givenchy north to Hollebeke, east of Ypres, the Germans continued the intense pressure of the preceding five days, making their greatest efforts from Estaires north to Wytschaete. Early in the day Armentieres was given up by the British, who straightened out their front along a line about four miles west of the town. This line, from the river Lys to Hollebeke, held throughout

The Germans made another determined thrust toward Amiens on April 12, in the neighborhood of Hangard and Hourges. At Hourges they failed, Hangard they penetrated, but were driven out later by French counter-attacks.

THE Germans on April 12 made a powerful attack on Allied positions in Brule wood in the Apremont Forest south of Verdun, penetrating some advanced trench elements. A counter-attack by French and American troops restored the position, the Americans taking twenty-two prisoners.

In Flanders, in the fighting which has come to be called the Battle of Armentieres, the British on the 13th and 14th became a stone wall against which the German forces dashed in vain. Although Berlin claimed progress, the progress represented yards where miles had been the objectives, and British counter-attacks, at the points of greatest danger, strengthened their positions. The enemy brought intense pressure to bear on Saturday against the British right wing from Givenchy to Festubert. He gained nothing. At Locon on the Lave northwest of Bethune the British regained the village. Before the Forest of Nieppe, west of Merville, guarding the railroad center of Hazebrouck, terrific assaults resulted in negligible gains. From Merris to Bailleul, although assailed by wave after wave of men and artillery fire, the line held.

Hindenburg is reckless of lives. These people in Germany are asking for the missing the day, although positions changed hands frequently. The British reserves were coming into the lines to meet the fresh German divisions, which Hindenburg was throwing into the attack in desperate attacks. During the whole of this day the British were still outnumbered. In the neighborhood of Ploegsteert the enemy made some progress. The day ended with the heights still in the British hands and the German troops suffering under a withering fire.

IN the fighting of April 12 the Germans maintained with thirty divisions, over 300,000 men, their heavy pressure against the British lines along a front of about twenty miles. At the southern end of the line near and north of Givenchy as far as Lestrem the enemy made no permanent gains. Between Lestrem and Messines the Teutons forced their way ahead until they were beyond the village of Merville, ten miles southeast of Armentieres, and were fighting for the village of Bailleul, eight miles northwest of Armentieres. Ploegsteert Wood and village were taken and the British were fighting west of that position at the village of Neuve Eglise.

In spite of their gain the Germans were still held off the high ground, but the positions on the Messines Ridge were becoming outflanked. As on the eve of the battle of the Marne Joffre commanded "advance at all costs and die where you are rather than give way," so at this critical juncture in the new battle of Flanders General Haig issued an order to "all ranks of the British Army in France and Flanders" as follows:

"Three weeks ago today the enemy began his terrific attacks against us on a fifty-mile front. His objects are to separate us from the French, to take the Channel ports, and to destroy the British Army.

"In spite of throwing already 106 divisions into the battle, and enduring the most reckless sacrifice of human life, he has yet made little progress toward his goals.

"We owe this to the determined fighting and self-sacrifice of our troops. Words fail me to express the admiration which I feel for the splendid resistance offered by all ranks of our army under the most trying circumstances.

"Many among us now are tired. To those I would say that victory will belong to the side which holds out the longest. The French Army is moving rapidly and in great force to our support. There is no other course open to us but to fight it out.

"Every position must be held to the last man. There must be no retirement. With our backs to the wall, and believing in the justice of our cause, each one of us must fight to the end. The safety of our homes and the freedom of mankind depend alike upon the conduct of each one of us at this critical moment."

Neuve Eglise became German on Saturday morning but was converted again to British allegiance by a counter-attack. It and the rest of the positions protecting Messines Ridge remained British through a Sunday in which German blood was poured out in ceaseless stream as attack followed attack. Sunday night found the Teuton balked at every point of the long line of battle from Ypres to the Oise.

ON April 8 a large German patrol attempted a surprise attack on the American outpost north-west of Toul. The concentrated fire of American outposts, with light and heavy machine-guns, quickly drove the Germans back to their own lines.

On April 11, after a 72-hour bombardment, a force of more than 800 storm-troops attempted an attack on the American position. The fighting came to close quarters, but the Germans retired beaten.

The brunt of this fighting was borne by two regiments of the Rainbow Division, the former 69th of New York, and the former Second Wisconsin Infantry. Gen. Pershing's reports for the two days carried a total of 234 casualties.

The Germans on Saturday and Sunday, April 13 and 14, tried desperately to reverse the defeat they suffered on Thursday at the hands of the Americans. Prisoners reported that they had been ordered to penetrate the American third line at all costs. They did not pass the first line, and when they were well started for home the Americans chased them past the second German line.

Early Sunday morning the Boche came back. Under a wicked barrage they entered the American front-line trenches, there to meet a warm reception with bayonets and hand grenades. In the American trenches the Germans left behind them 34 dead, 30 more lay in No Mans' Land. A conservative estimate placed at 200 the Germans killed in five days' fighting on this narrow sector.

By direct instructions from Secretary Baker, the War Department on April 9 and 10 resumed the practice of giving out the number and names of soldiers dead, wounded and missing in France. From April 1 until April 14 casualties reported by Gen. Pershing were: Killed in action 64, killed by accident or unknown causes 30, died of disease 99, died of wounds 27, gassed 3, wounded 954, and 37 missing.

Her Right to Alsace-Lorraine

THERE has been a great deal of discussion in the air regarding unofficial exchanges between Austria and various members of the Entente looking toward a separate peace for that polyglot kingdom. A great many rumors have failed of verification and statements have been made and denied, but there was just enough smoke to indicate fire somewhere. Recently, M. Clemenceau declared that Emperor Charles of Austria had recognized the claims of France to Alsace-Lorraine. This assertion was followed by a telegram from the Emperor to the Kaiser accusing M. Clemenceau of "piling up lies to escape the web of lies in which he is involved, making a false assertion that I in some manner recognized France's claims to Alsace-Lorraine as just." Following this assertion of innocence, M. Clemenceau promptly made public an autographed letter written by Emperor Charles in 1917 and placed in the hands of President Poincaré of France on March 31, 1917, by Prince Sixtus de Bourbon, Emperor Charles' brother-in-law. The letter was in part as follows:

My Dear Sixtus: The end of the third year of this war, which has brought so much mourning and grief into the world, approaches. All the peoples of my empire are more closely united than ever in the common determination to safeguard the integrity of the monarchy at the cost even of the heaviest sacrifices. . . . Nobody can question the military advantages secured by my troops, particularly in the Balkans. . . .

France, on her side, has shown force, resistance, and dashing courage which are magnificent. . . .

Therefore, it is a special pleasure to me to note that, although for the moment adversaries, no real divergence of views or aspirations separates many of my empire from France. . . .

With this in mind, and to show in a definite manner the reality of these feelings, I beg you to convey privately and unofficially to President Poincaré that I will support by every means, and by exerting all my personal influence with my allies, France's just claims regarding Alsace-Lorraine. . . .

Belgium should be entirely reestablished in her sovereignty, retaining entirely her African possessions. . . .

Serbia should be reestablished in her sovereignty. . . .

Having thus laid my ideas clearly before you, I would ask you in turn, after consulting with these two powers, to lay before me the opinion of France and England, with a view thus to preparing the ground for an understanding on the basis of which official preliminary negotiations could be taken up and reach a result satisfactory to all.

It would seem from this that there was some basis for the persistent rumors that Austria sought a separate peace. It would appear also that Kaiser Karl might need to do a little explaining to Kaiser Bill.

A Week in the World's News

TO MAKE THE IRISH FIGHT. On April 9 Premier Lloyd George, after reviewing the history of the present German offensive, laid before Parliament the proposal to draft every able-bodied man from 18 to 50, and in some cases to 55 years of age, the draft to be applied, for the first time, to Ireland. The Premier referred to the fact that the Germans are calling up 550,000 efficient young men of the 1920 class, aged 18½, and proposed a combing of the industries. All occupational exemptions are cancelled.

The Irish conscription proposal provoked an outburst from the Irish members. When Lloyd George referred to the draft of Irishmen in the United States, a member shouted, "But not by the English!" "It is a declaration of war on Ireland," said one. "You come across to take us!" cried another.

The Premier coupled with the proposal for conscription in Ireland the definite promise that the government would soon present a bill for Home Rule. He declared that the report of the Irish Convention which had just concluded its proceedings afforded the British Parliament an opportunity of approaching the vexed question of Home Rule with more hope of success. The House immediately voted the government leave to introduce the Man Power Bill and on April 10 the Man Power Bill passed its second reading in the House by a vote of 323 to 100.

Sir Horace Plunkett, Chairman of the Irish Constitutional Convention, transmitted to the Prime Minister of Great Britain a report of the proceedings in which he outlined the proposed govern-the army with airplanes. The charge was made of misleading the public by misrepresenting the progress of the aviation program and of having no broad plan looking to the future development of warplanes. The report urges expansion and ceaseless effort and recommends that an executive officer appointed by the President be placed in charge of the aviation program. Only 15 combat planes, the report says, have been completed, and only one has been shipped to France. The production of Liberty motors, the report holds, is "gravely disappointing."

The Liberty Bond Ball starting from Buffalo to New York City. Guided by two "Uncle Sams" it was pushed by buyers of bonds, a push for each bond ment as follows: The Lord Lieutenant is to hold office for six years. The parliament is practically a state legislature, except that it controls the Post Office. It can make no laws interfering with religion. It consists of a Senate and House of Commons. The Senate consists of one Lord Chancellor, four Catholic bishops, two Episcopal bishops, one representative of the General Assembly, three mayors, of Dublin, Belfast and Cork, five Irish peers, eleven nominees of the governor, fifteen representatives of commerce and industry, four of labor, eight of county councils, total sixty-four. The Commons consists of 160 representatives, six of whom represent the universities and twenty are nominees of the governor (to disappear after fifty years). A parliament lasts five years. Ireland is to have a separate exchequer.

THE AIRCRAFT SITUATION. Two reports came from the Senate Military Affairs Committee on April 10. The majority report criticized the government for its delay, vacillation, and neglect to avail itself of information from various sources, the delay being held to account for the failure to supply

The minority report holds that the Signal Corps has done a great work in the face of unparalleled obstacles. The minority report also takes issue with the majority regarding the Liberty motor.

SIX BOATS SUNK. In the week ending April 10, mines and submarines sunk four British vessels of more than 1,600 and two of less than that tonnage. France lost two ships of more than 1,600 tons. It was announced on April 9 that the United States had been able to put into transatlantic service to carry men and munitions to France, a total of 2,762,605 tons of shipping, 390 ships in all, of which 322, with a tonnage of 2,365,344, were of American registry. That total included only a small part of the more than 500,000 tons of Dutch ships recently requisitioned.

JAPANESE AND BRITISH LAND AT VLADIVOSTOK. On April 6 the message came from Vladivostok that, on the 5th, British and Japanese sailors had been landed from ships in the harbor. The action was stated to have been taken as the result of riots in which three Japanese lost their lives. The Japanese troops did not interfere with the life of the city, merely patrolling the streets and maintaining order. The British official information indicated that the landing was a purely local affair, and that only some 50 British sailors were landed as a guard for the British consulate, while two companies of Japanese sailors were also landed for the purpose of protection.

On April 8, dispatches from Moscow quoted Nikolai Lenine, Bolshevik premier, as declaring that Russia might have to declare war on Japan.

The Associated Press reported that American marines were landed at Vladivostok on April 5 with the British and Japanese forces.

YOU NEED NOT LISTEN TO TREASON. The Sedition Bill, passed by the Senate on April 10, prohibits disloyal words or acts, or obstruction of the draft or Liberty Loans. The bill affixes to such acts or words the penalty of imprisonment for 20 years, or $10,000 fine, or both. It was not passed without protracted debate, the opponents of the original bill holding that a chance remark or an honest criticism ought not to come within the proscribed acts. The amendments as carried consisted in the insertion of the word "wilful" in the provision against the use of "disloyal, profane, scurrilous, or abusive language" about the government, flag, army or navy of the United States, and the substitution of the word "intended" for "calculated," in reference to such words. A Senate amendment also provides for dismissal of Federal employees who may make disloyal remarks.

BESSARABIA JOINS RUMANIA. A telegram from Bucharest on April 14 announced that the Bessarabian Diet had voted for a union of that province with Rumania. According to an Associated Press dispatch from Petrograd, under date of April 10, the Commissioner of Commerce announced that the terms of peace cost Russia 301,000 square miles of territory occupied by 56,000,000, or 32 per cent. of the entire population of Imperial Russia. The provinces lost contained one-third of the total mileage of railways in Russia, produced 73 per cent. of the total iron, 89 per cent. of the total coal, contained 1,800 savings banks, 268 sugar refineries, 918 textile factories, 574 breweries, 133 tobacco factories, 1,685 distilleries, 244 chemical factories, 1,615 paper mills, 1,073 machine factories, and brought to the Imperial Government, annually, a revenue of $45,238 rubles.

THE PRESIDENT TAKES COAST FLEET. In order to relieve transportation congestion along the Atlantic coast and provide better transportation for coal, cotton and other commodities, and to secure certain vessels for overseas work, President Wilson, by proclamation on April 11, took over all the ships and properties of the Clyde Steamship Co., the Mallory Steamship Co., the Merchants and Miners Transportation Co., and the Southern Steamship Co., all operating ships between Atlantic coast ports.

SUBMARINES BLOCK SPAIN. Because of Spain's recent agreement with the Allies for the routing of her ships and for the exchange of her products for necessary cotton and other materials, Germany on April 11th without notice put into effect a submarine blockade of Spanish ports.

COLLIER MISSING. The United States naval collier Cyclops, in a voyage from South American ports to the United States with a cargo of manganese, was officially reported overdue on April 14th. The Cyclops left a West Indies port on March 4 with one engine out of commission. She carried 293 persons, 57 of them passengers. Since March 4 nothing had been heard of the ship.

The Women Also Help to Fight

NEXT week—there is always a next week, one issue is always on the heels of another and the editor has always two on his mind or his heart or where ever he keeps his responsibilities—next week we shall have a glimpse of woman's share in the vital things of the day. Mrs. Abby Gunn Baker came all the way from Washington to bring the editor a story of the army of girls that is being mobilized at the Capital to do Uncle Sam's detail work and some of his executive work, too.

Miss Helen Hoffman has brought from England a tale of the courage and energy and efficiency of England's women whose backs are bearing burdens while their hands blister and their lips still smile.

Miss Sangster also bears her testimony to the work of American women in war time.

But, not to forget the men after all, Dr. Jowett brings a ringing message, his last before his return to Europe, to the Soldiers of Christ, Dr. Gray once more opens the doors of prophecy, and Maynard Owen Williams traces the trail of vodka in Russia.

To Each One His Own Part

THE official motto of the United States—"E Pluribus Unum"—"Out of many, one"—adopted in the beginning, was never more truly applicable than now.

Each soldier in the battle-line, though he counts but one, holds a crucial place. The many units form the one front. The separate links make the chain. Defection at any single point may mean disaster.

Just so, each dollar in a Liberty Bond, though it be but one dollar among billions, does its indispensable service.

The soldier is but one man, yet the destiny of his nation depends upon his devotion—upon his filling his place. The force of an army of millions is no more than the multiple of the force of one man.

In the same way, the total financial resource of our nation at the supreme crisis is nothing more nor less than the sum of the dollar devotion of its individuals.

That the chain is no stronger than its weakest link is an old and true saying. It is alike true that the heart of our nation is no stronger than the hearts of our citizens; its will, its force, its victories, its triumphant achievements are not one whit greater than the sum total of our individual devotion.

What are you worth to America and civilization in this time of test? Is your service in manhood and money up to your share? Would the multiple of your contributions make the safety of the nation secure? If not, you are a skulker in the rear, not a soldier in place at the front, while the decisive battle is raging; your place in the fighting line is vacant, deserted, vulnerable to the enemy. Your own just part is an infinitesimal share of the whole; none can do it but yourself; if you fail, you betray a most sacred trust and must answer as a shirker to your neighbors, to your country, to your own conscience and to God. Each has his part to do, however small, and is man or not according as he does it.

Secretary Baker at the front in France picked up a spade out of the trampled mud and handed it to a soldier, remarking, "It might get lost." The trivial incident tells better of the great War Secretary's efficiency than can the many future volumes to be written as history. A little thing is a spade, trampled in the mud of a battle-front, but at a moment of need the ready spade may be magnified into a mighty implement.

The great battle victories, all great deeds and achievements, are made up of a series of little parts—little in themselves but important in their place and glorious in their share of the grand result.

Our nation, fighting not only for the life of our own liberty but for the preservation of liberty wherever it exists and for its extension throughout the world, is locked in a death struggle with the forces of autocracy and oppression. It is our own battle—the battle of manhood everywhere. Our brave boys are eagerly rushing to the front, each to do his manful part. On us at home the slighter but no less sacred duty falls to support and sustain them to the full extent of our resources and the limit of self-sacrifice.

The Third Liberty Loan depends largely for its success upon the small savings of the great multitude. It was so designed, in order that every man and woman and child may each do his own part.

Every true American worthy of the blessings of our free institutions will deem it a sacred duty, and yet not more a duty than a precious privilege, to do his full share toward sustaining our country's defense at the fighting front, and upholding the light of liberty before all the world.

The Making of a Minister

SOMETIMES we think it is very hard to define precisely the qualities that go to the making of a good minister. Gospel soundness and sincerity being assumed, what other qualities of character are most desirable? There are many people who put amiability first, holding that the most effective pastor is one who is a "good mixer" and everywhere welcomed. Then, again, it is frequently the case that a sermon on simple Gospel lines, delivered in language which uses few if any oratorical flourishes, comes nearer to satisfying the hearts of the hearers than a brilliant oratorical discourse, in which, while we may admire the speaker's ability, we find little nourishment.

President Wilson has been thinking along this line lately and has written his estimate of the qualities that make a good minister. This is his view of the matter: "You do not have to be anything in particular to be a lawyer. I have been a lawyer and I know. You do not have to be anything in particular, except a kind-hearted man, perhaps, to be a physician; you do not have to be anything, nor to undergo any strong spiritual change in order to be a merchant. The only profession which consists in being something is the ministry of our Lord and Saviour—and it does not consist of anything else. It is manifested in other things, but it does not consist of anything else. And that conception of the ministry which rubs all the marks of it off and mixes him in the crowd so that you cannot pick him out, is a process of eliminating the ministry itself."

Paul, who had a wide and varied ministerial experience, told the church in Corinth what little store he set by excellency of speech, or personal wisdom, in proclaiming the Gospel. He knew nothing "save Jesus Christ and him crucified." He modestly acknowledged that he had no trust in his own powers of persuasive words, but in the power of the Spirit to use him in setting forth the Gospel among men. Indeed, the whole of these four first chapters of First Corinthians might be studied to advantage by ministers and congregations. A great deal of wasted effort might be avoided, and that spiritual consecration and concentration realized which is the true road to success in the ministry.

The Coming Prophetic Conference

STUDENTS of prophecy and all who study the Scriptures will be deeply interested in the call for a Bible Conference on "the Return of Our Lord and Related Events," which is to meet in Philadelphia on May 28-30. The call is signed by nearly thirty pastors, representing different denominations. In the course of its deliberations, the Conference will take up for discussion the themes which, in these days of prophetic fulfillment, are uppermost in the minds of thoughtful Christians everywhere. The restoration of Israel to its own land is already apparently in process of fulfillment, and will, of course, be considered. Such an assembly should furnish a new impulse to missionary work at home and abroad, and should also give stimulus to prophetic study by the churches. Today, the Blessed Hope of the world centers on Jesus Christ.

We would ask that Christian people everywhere pray that the conference may be wisely guided; that extreme views and all tendencies toward fanatical interpretation might be avoided, and that one result of such a gathering might be realized in a new consecration, a firmer trust in God and his goodness, a more loyal obedience to his will, and patience, prayerfulness and preparation for the revealing of the divine purpose in the great trial through which the world is now passing.

The President's Clear Call

IT would be difficult to conceive of a more vivid and convincing statement of the American attitude in the war than that which is conveyed in the President's Baltimore address, on the anniversary of our acceptance of Germany's challenge "to fight for our right to live and be free and for the sacred rights of free men everywhere." Coming as it did at the opening of the new Liberty Loan, it has exerted a tremendous influence upon the popular mind. "The nation is awake," says the President. "There is no need to call to it. The war may cost our utmost sacrifice, the lives of our fittest men and, if need be, all that we possess." And the response of all classes has been shown by the spontaneous and universal approval of the Loan.

Americans understand now, better than ever before, the causes that have drawn us as a nation into the great war. They know what our boys at the front are fighting for, and what the hundreds of thousands who are being rushed across the sea to join them are going to the front to defend. This whole nation, military, naval, official and civil, stands squarely behind the President, and our people will sustain the government in its resolution, knowing that it is a war in which there can be no drawback nor hesitation, and the great stake of which is the liberty and freedom of the world, involving our own among the rest. Were the Teuton hordes successful, what has happened in Belgium, in Poland and in Russia would probably be the fate of both France and England. The widespread Teuton plottings and conspiracies, no less than the wanton destruction of American lives, are all a part of the plan to subdue and destroy free governments, to subjugate free peoples, and to shatter the ideals of human freedom.

It is to check, conclusively and forever, this evil spirit, which would win the mastery of the world by wrecking it, that America is in the war. The Huns have reverted to Odin worship, in which might is omnipotent everywhere, while right, justice, freedom, law, civilization, mercy, are discarded terms. Our task in the war is to restore these to the world, and to "redeem it and make it fit for free men like ourselves to live in," and this we mean to accomplish at whatever sacrifice.

This is the key to the enthusiasm which has greeted the new Loan, an enthusiasm which will meet with equal readiness any and all demands that may be made upon our people to carry the enterprise to a triumphant issue.

The Honor of Simple Service

THERE is no such thing as a passive faith. Our faith is either active or non-existent. Good works are various and their degrees and gradations infinite. To one person good works may be accomplished by an unfailing cheerfulness; to another they may be included in a tongue that knows only kindness, that spreads goodness, that credits good intentions, that strengthens good faith and cements good comradeship; to still another they mean an honest measure and a truthful count, while others will find them in manifold charities performed quietly, privately, and without ostentation. Again, there are those to whom good works may mean the open, vigorous championship of some urgent reform. To many they do mean that satisfaction is not to be found where less than all of the life is given in unselfish service, in order that men may know the Saviour.

We learned not long ago of a young woman who suffered, yet whose light of Christian faith shone so clearly that her sufferings were glorified in a life transformed. An accident had doomed her to lifelong invalidism. There were times when the useless limbs were torn by excruciating pain. Yet she smiled even when the pain brought tears to her eyes. Her thought was always for others; her fingers were constantly busy sewing on little garments for children who she knew would be insufficiently clad, or knitting wraps as a protection against the cold, or making something useful as a contribution to the funds of her missionary society. Always cheerful, always trusting and always sure of the Divine love, her life became a blessing to many, and there were not a few who took their first yielding steps of faith under her gentle guidance.

It is not always the great and glittering service that is most acceptable. Many whose incomes are small, and whose opportunities are few, have denied themselves many things without a murmur, that they might do what lay in their power in rendering simple service. There is more honor and heart satisfaction in self-denial than most people imagine, and once tried, it will surprise them to find that they would be glad to do it again and again. As the Spartans developed strength and agility from their simple method of living, and their abstinence from luxuries, so the humble Christian finds the spiritual side of character strengthened, developed and lifted up through the regimen of simplicity and self-denial.

Make the Loafers Make Good

THERE was once a king in Egypt, Amasis by name, who, according to early historians, had a law passed under which every able-bodied man within his realm was compelled to appear once a year before the governor of his province and, under pain of death, to give satisfactory evidence that he was earning an honest living. Long afterward, Solon, the Greek statesman, on learning of this statute, decided that it was "a sensible law," and it was forthwith adopted by the Athenians. We are not informed how the idea worked out, but unquestionably it was a spur to industry and must have set the loafers to work. We ourselves have a pretty considerable army of idlers, and they are by no means confined to the large cities. War conditions have impressed us with the need of universal occupation, and we are not surprised to learn that the legislatures of New Jersey, Maryland, West Virginia and several other states have set the example of passing laws making idleness a crime, and calling upon the local authorities to put idlers and loafers in jail. Such a law would be a benefit in every state. There is, however, a broad distinction between habitual idleness and incidental unemployment. For the unemployed who want to work, help is to be given by the authorities. There is little doubt that the modern revival of the old Egyptian anti-loafing law, properly enforced, would produce good results. Even in these busy days there are altogether too many who are idlers by choice. They are parasites, whether they be rich or poor. We have no room for sluggards, idlers and time-wasters. The sooner they are made to square their shoulders and set to work, the better.

Water Under Nevada's Desert

THE early settlers never dreamed that underneath the desert districts of Nevada were streams of water. And it is only recently that science has called practical attention to these natural reservoirs not far beneath the surface of the soil. In an investigation recently made by O. E. Meinzer, of the United States Geological Survey of the Department of the Interior, in the Big Smoky Valley and adjacent areas near Tonopah, Nevada, the character of the vegetation and other surface signs show that the ground water stands within ten feet of the surface over an area of 130,000 acres. The measurements made indicate that tens of thousands of acre feet of water are annually contributed by mountain streams and by rainfall to the great underground reservoir, and that about the same quantity of ground water is annually discharged into the atmosphere through the soil and the plants in the shallow water area. It was estimated that, in an area of 240,000 acres, the ground water lies within fifty feet of the surface, and that in an area of 335 acres it lies within a hundred feet of the surface. Detailed maps were made showing the location and extent of these areas. Nearly the whole of Nevada is included in the Great Basin, once occupied by an inland sea, and afterward by several great lakes, which have also disappeared. The state is practically rainless and sterile. Its rich deposits of silver discovered in 1859 pushed it into notice and into statehood later. The state is a desert and has to resort to irrigation. Perhaps eight per cent. of the soil by this process is brought under cultivation. The people of the state are much encouraged by the discovery of water in the Big Smoky Valley, and are already talking about plans for tapping it for agricultural purposes. The turning of the desert into a garden by the use of streams under the earth is thus used to illustrate the reclamation of the waste places of the heart by the river of life in the Gospel: "Then shall the lame man leap as a hart, and the tongue of the dumb sing; for in the wilderness shall waters break out, and streams in the desert." (Isa. 35 : 6.)

Honeymoon in Airplane

RECENTLY Lieutenant Laurence B. Sperry of the Naval Aviation Service, stationed at Governor's Island, brought his fiancée, Miss Winifred Allen, in his large airplane from her home in Massapequa, L. I., to the army post on Governor's Island, where they were married. At 7.30 o'clock the next morning the lieutenant took his bride in his airplane on their honeymoon. They went sailing away above the clouds, and in just fifteen minutes to the dot they landed at Copake, L. I., a naval aviation station just twenty-five miles away as the bird would fly. The groom introduced his bride to the young aviators, and then they took the air again and landed in the door-yard of her father's home at Massapequa, where a wedding breakfast awaited them. A New York City reporter phoned Mrs. Sperry for a report of the trip. Among other things she said: "We did not do much talking on the

and no trading in live or freshly killed hens. Traffic in cold-storage or frozen hens was allowed. This order was to increase the supply of eggs, already too low, and to keep them from going higher in price, and also to leave an abundant supply of eggs for hatching purposes. The Agricultural Department and Food be caught by the ax. The hen is a very ancient and valuable institution. She was furnishing eggs and chickens to the Chinese when Abraham was a boy, and supplied her product to Syria, Greece, Rome and all the other empires down to our own. She enriched the bill of fare of the Jew. Christ refers to her care for her young to illustrate his love, and to her product, to teach one of the greatest lessons of the Bible—God's eagerness to answer prayer—in these words: "If he shall ask an egg, will he offer him a scorpion?" (Luke 11 : 12.)

New Artificial Eye

A BRITISH surgeon claims to have found that an artificial eye made of cartilage is superior to that made of any other material, and is placing it in the sightless sockets of the wounded soldiers. He says there is no shrinking in the cavity, and that the muscles adjust themselves to it so that they regulate its movement. Whether the experiment of the surgeon proves successful or not, his eye of cartilage, like all other men-made eyes, are for appearance only. Not one ray of light passes through them. They are darkness itself. Those who have lost an eye are not so unfortunate as those who have lost their spiritual eye and replaced it with an artificial one. Christ in his Sermon on the Mount describes the conscience as the eye of the soul, and pictures the dismal condition of those whose spiritual vision has been destroyed in these words: "The light of the body is the eye. . . . But if thine eye be evil, thy whole body shall be full of darkness. If therefore the light that is in thee be darkness, how great is that darkness!" (Matt. 6 : 22, 23.)

Chimney Gas Poisons

ONE hundred and forty-three men and women working on the three top floors of a building in New York were made ill lately by mysterious fumes. The Department of Health sent a specialist to the building to investigate the cause of the trouble. Dr. Harris, head of the Bureau of Preventable Diseases, reported that the poisoning came from the carbon-monoxide gas from a chimney on the roof, which was wafted through an open door at the fire-escape landing. He said the Health Department had encountered the poisoning influence of carbon-monoxide gas before, but he had never known so many persons to be overcome in one building with it. Coal gas, as a servant, makes light and heat; as a master it becomes a deadly poison. There are subtle poison fumes that bring insensibility and death to the soul. They are to be found in idleness, in dangerous places of employment, or evil amusements. The call to come out of this stupor of sin that goes down into death is thus expressed: "Awake, thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light." (Eph. 5 : 14.)

Seattle Municipality Sells Salmon

SEATTLE sells fresh salmon right out of the streams for seven cents a pound. When a municipal fish market was opened in Seattle, Wash., and salmon placed on sale at the above quotation, police reserves had to be called out to maintain order. Thousands of people literally fought each other to gain a position at the counter. This continued for several days until the municipal authorities increased their supply to meet the public demand. On the opening day 2,000 pounds of salmon were sold in less than two hours. The same amount went in less than that time on the following day. A ton of salmon a day is now sold at the municipal market. The fish is sold to the city by the state and taken from the state hatcheries. By selling the salmon at seven cents a pound, the city is able to clear expenses on the operation. What a splendid undertaking this is, in the great, thrifty city of Seattle! Partly on account of prices caused by the war and partly on account of the greed of unscrupulous dealers, the people have been robbed on the right hand and on the left by extortionate prices. The story and picture of the fish-market in Seattle made the housekeepers wish their city would give them such an opportunity and relief. The tendency of the times is toward such social reforms as the municipal fish market suggests; not destructive, but constructive. Fish was a popular and wholesome article of food among the Jews. Fishermen had an important part in the foundation of the Christian Church. There is this incident in the life of our Saviour: "And they gave him a piece of a broiled fish." (Luke 24 : 42.)

flight. It was all too wonderful for words, with the tremendous folds of the clouds billowing below us! We were up 4,000 feet, but I was not cold; my husband bundled me up in leather wrappings. I was not afraid, for I had been up with the lieutenant before. Then I had such confidence in his wisdom and skill in the mastery of his airship." The Bible often refers to marriage as the type of the most sacred relation of God to man. There is this lesson drawn from a newly married couple: "As the bridegroom rejoiced over the bride, so shall thy God rejoice over thee." (Isa. 62 : 5.)

Government Forbids Killing

THE United States Food Administration announced the other day that there should be no killing of hens, Administration united in asking that the hens be spared; but so little attention was paid to the request, and the merciless slaughter was so continued, that the authorities made the peremptory order forbidding the killing of hens, old or young, or in dealing in them alive or freshly killed with the penalty of loss of license, a fine of $5,000, or imprisonment for two years, one or all three penalties. The war has pushed up prices on eggs and poultry and so has human greed pushed it up on all food products. It is wise in the government to do all in its power to keep down the price of foodstuffs and push up the scale of wages, so that a fair adjustment may be made between producer and consumer.

An order has just been issued by the Food Administration at Washington giving permission to kill hens again after the 20th of April, and their heads will

Christianity's New Sunrise

A SERMON BY REV. W. H. HOPKINS, D.D.*

TEXT—Matthew 20: 25-28 and Matthew 23: 8-10.

NEXT to the interest in the front line trenches of Europe, the interest of thoughtful men centers round about the thought of the world-reconstruction after the war. That we are on the eve of the most stupendous changes the world has ever seen all thinking men agree. It is not merely a new map of Europe that is coming; nations are dying and other nations are being born. What the final outcome for the nations of the earth will be no man can tell. Neither can any one tell what the changes will be in the political, the social and the industrial world. For the past four years everything has changed, from the way in which the woman keeps house to the way in which the man runs his business. Nothing is the same, and nothing will be the same in the days after the war.

It is a settled fact that the world never can go back to where it was. The Church is no exception. That it is to go on, there is no doubt. That it will be purified, given a larger vision, a greater responsibility and a greater work, there can be no doubt. What kind of a Church will it be? All that it is to be no one can tell. There are, however, some guide-posts along the way; some tendencies and some underlying facts which in a large measure will determine its future.

The Church of tomorrow will be a spiritual Church seeking to transform into everyday life the spiritual principles of Jesus. The age of materialism has ended in the most awful hell the world has ever seen; as a result men are turning to the spiritual verities. In the supreme hour of crisis men have ever cried out with Peter of old, "Lord, to whom shall we go?" As never before in history men are turning to Jesus Christ. All other teachers have failed, everything in the world has failed.

A few years ago, there were many who believed that education would meet the needs of humanity. The mere mention today of German Kultur ends all argument. The reader of history will remember that the Pharaoh of Exodus was the most brutal as well as the most educated of all the Pharaohs. They will also remember that the age of the Medici in Italy was the age of the renaissance of learning, as well as the age of cruelty and torture.

But a few years ago, we were told that the only hope of the world lay in science. Today, earth, air, sea, are at the mercy of the inventions of science. It has become a great destroyer instead of a great preserver of life. We are learning that science alone can concoct deadly poisons which kill people, and that it is inherently no saving power. Imperialism and power of organization, along with all other efforts to meet the world's needs, have failed. The cry of the hour is "Back to Jesus." Thinking men are seeing that there is no hope save only in the rebirth of the simple teachings and the powerful life of the Man of Galilee. Getting back to Jesus will be a getting back to the spiritual verities; it will necessitate the putting of the Kingdom first.

In the age which is dawning, we are going to say less about the idealism of Jesus. We are going to put forth more effort to make that idealism a part of the daily life. Men are going to hold a larger perspective—they are going to realize the end of life. The spiritual Church will be a guide in helping toward this new reconstruction.

II

IT will be a unified Church—a Church answering the Master's great prayer "that they may all be one." There are three influences which unfailingly draw Christians together. Whenever a company of people in prayer or elsewhere draw near the Christ, they always draw near to each other. In these days, when men are getting back to Christ, of necessity they are being brought nearer to each other. Whenever we meet a common enemy, there is a tendency toward union. Just now the Christian world is meeting a common enemy in a way it has never met in days gone by. The very fact that the Church has been paralyzed facing a great need is the reason for its being today unified. The needs of tomorrow will be greater than the needs of today.

In America, there must be the making of a Christian Nation, which will include the Christianizing of the social order and the reaching out to the unevangelized masses. Outside of America there will be the reaching out to the unevangelized masses in all parts of the world. In the face of a fact so stupendous, there can be nothing less than a unified Church.

Then again, when we are united in a common task, we are always drawn nearer to Christ. The Church in China or India is of necessity far more united than the Church of America. As we face the common task there must be a drawing together. The soldier boys in the trenches are finding out how little the divisions of Christendom mean. What they are after is the real Christian message, and they are not caring whether it is the Methodist, Baptist or Congregational message. It is the basic fact that they are seeking, and it is the basic fact that the world needs. The ecclesiastical leaders of the world may continue to oppose church union; it may have to come in spite of them. But as sure as God is in heaven, the coming days are to see the end of sectarianism and denominationalism. The four hundred years since Martin Luther have been years of division. The next quarter of a century is to be a time of getting together.

IT will be a Church emphasizing the Democracy of Jesus and his fisherman band of disciples. The whole world is today thinking, talking Democracy. The trenches of Europe present the most supreme illustration of Democracy that this world has ever known. When the boys come home we can be sure that they are going to demand Democracy. Yet it is worth while to remember that for the last quarter of a century "Democracy" has been a word to conjure with. We think of Democracy as one of the basic facts of American life; yet in how far has America realized the Democracy of Jesus?

Have we Democracy in the Church? So far as Church government goes, forty per cent. of the churches are democratic. In how far they are democratic in their life and their ideals, is an open question.

Have we Democracy in education? A recent educational report from Washington indicates that we have in America over five and a half million people past ten years of age who cannot read and write. We are told that one-twentieth of all the soldier boys cannot make good soldiers because they cannot read their war orders or their camp regulations. A large part of America is totally void of anything in the way of education. On the other hand, we have a few who go to colleges, universities and end in post-graduate courses. Have we Democracy in education?

Turning to the business and industrial world, we ask again the question, have we Democracy? Last year we were told that we had in this country 22,696 millionaires. Seventy of them report an annual income of over two millions each. One-tenth of our population holds nine-tenths of our possessions. Put over against this the fact of our poverty and our pauperism; the fact that, aside from the submerged tenth, there is another tenth on the verge of bankruptcy and want. We have a long way to go before we in America realize the Democracy of Jesus. The Church of tomorrow will need to be a democratic church in order that the great ideal of Democracy for the world may be fully realized.

THE Church of tomorrow will be an international Church. For a hundred years the world has been rapidly growing smaller. First there came Fulton's steamship, drawing the two continents together. Then came Stephenson's railway, connecting with bands of steel the distant parts of each country. A little bit later there was the Morse telegraph and the Atlantic cable. Now we have the Marconi wireless, the airship and the submarine. In a large measure the air above and the waters beneath the earth have been conquered by man. The world has become so much smaller that the neighborhood includes all races of mankind.

A new day has come. Man's provincialism must go. The new brotherhood will be a brotherhood bigger than national boundary lines. The Bolsheviks of Russia have thrown a new note into the world harmony. Whatever may be the chances of history, the note of internationalism will stay. The church of tomorrow will be an international church. It will face the greatest missionary opportunity of the Christian centuries. With this world outlook and this world brotherhood, it will seek to make Jesus known in every community throughout the inhabited world.

THE Church of tomorrow will be a humanitarian Church; a Church interested in the everyday welfare and the everyday needs of humanity. It will not forget man's eternal relationships. It will believe in the great spiritual realities of life. It will keep the end in view at the beginning. As a means towards reaching that end, it will be interested in everything which makes for the welfare of society. That old slogan, "The whole Gospel to the whole man and the whole community," will become the ideal of the Church. In the days that are just before, it must be the whole Gospel. Long enough the world has been satisfied with the mutilated Gospel. We must in this new age take the whole thought of Jesus—all the phases of his life. And it must be a Gospel reaching the whole man; not merely caring for his devotional life, but remembering his physical, his social needs.

The Y. M. C. A. has been pointing the way. Hereafter the Church open one day a week will be an impossibility. It must minister to all the needs of life. It must be interested in everything which makes for happy homes and for the welfare of young and old in the community life. It will be a Church with a larger program, facing greater opportunities and meeting greater needs than any church the world has ever seen. We are at the dawning of a great new age in the world's history.

Just before the Master left the little band out of which he formed his Church, he said to them: "He that believeth on me, the works that I do shall he do, and greater even than this shall he do." The Church of tomorrow, more than ever did the Church of the past, will realize the greater things; it will be a Church recognizing the one Master and seeking to make his life, his standards, his program, realized throughout all the world.

Babylon

BABYLON is falling as every city falls;

The vines that were her necklace are throttling her walls;
The waters of her channels are sinking in the sands;
And winds wear down her columns with a million patient hands.

Was it but a week ago? a century? a day?
When we went down to Babylon, and all the world was gay?
Houses hung with purple, and women on the roofs,
And rushes in the roadway beneath the horses' hoofs?

The king passed by in splendor, in flash of gold and pride,
And then the crowds strolled homeward to where the barges plied,
To toil in teeming warehouse and caravanserai,
Where every day and hour the camel trains filed by.

They tell me now that Babylon is choked with sand and vines,
A few old serfs still live in vaults, where our king stored his wines,
And keep a foot-path open to that last failing spring
Which was his courtyard fountain; and three old women sing
A low and endless story within the dancer's hall—
No other sound but sifting of sand grains through the wall.
The sand drifts at the corners and chokes the street-booth where
You bought your bordered tunic, the day that we were there.

The road is long to Babylon, and yet how gladly I'd Have ridden down to Babylon, once more, before I died!

The Dynamics of Expulsion

SUNDAY, April 28. Mark 9:29. "This kind goeth not forth but by prayer and fasting." The evil spirit was still enthroned. The disciples had been unable to cast it out. The victim remained in his awful servitude. In some way or other the divine liberating energies had been impeded and did not flow in emancipating strength. The disciples commanded, but there was no expulsion. Their word did not issue as a work. The words which they spake were not spirit, they were not life. There was something wrong. The ministers were not equal to their task. Their power was inadequate. The current was defective, and in these relationships a defective current always means there is something wanting in the wires. We are not straitened in God, we are straitened in ourselves. "Why could not we cast him out?"

In answer to their puzzled inquiry the Lord gives a twofold explanation of their defeat. First, he traces their lack of power to a deficiency of prayer, which always implies imperfect spiritual communion. And with this primary lack he names the neglect of fasting, which has resulted in the physical imprisonment and oppression of the spirit. The body had been allowed too much license, and the spirit was given too little freedom.

The obtrusiveness of the body always disinherits the soul. For when the body usurps dominion the freedom of the spirit is impaired. The soul is like an eagle which is confined to the barnyard when he was made to wing his flight through vast reaches of the upper air. The soul is imprisoned in the inch instead of journeying in the infinite. The spiritual powers, which were intended to explore the secrets of God, move on the surface of things. And so it comes to pass that, being straitened in ourselves, the grace of God is straitened. God has no large, open medium through which to pour his holy power. And because of lack of power we can not hurl iniquities from their thrones. We see the evil tyranny, but we cannot move it! We command it to go, but it laughs in our faces! "This kind goeth not out but by prayer and fasting."

The World's Sunrise

MONDAY, April 29. Mal. 4:2. "But unto you that fear my name shall the Sun of righteousness arise with healing in his wings." It is easy to account for the Renaissance in Europe. The conquest of Constantinople by the Mohammedans in 1453 and the consequent breaking up of the Byzantine Empire drove thousands of scholars out of the East into Italy and other parts of Europe. They brought with them their precious books, Greek and Latin classics, their passion for the beautiful and the sublime. A revival of learning inevitably followed. The long-neglected Greek New Testament began to be studied with a new devotion. Presently the revival of learning proceeded side by side with a revival of religion. Great spiritual forces were at work. Shakespeare came at the end of a new creative period.

When Jesus came into the world there had been no moral renaissance for more than five hundred years. It was all dark. Midnight was everywhere. The Gospel burst upon the world like a meteor across a starless sky. In Judea, about the year 30 A.D., there was a revival of religion which has had an influence in the world's history far more intense and widespread than that of the revival of learning at the beginning of the modern age. We look for the cause of it, and what do we see? A great religious Genius, original, underrived—the supreme religious Genius of the ages. There is nothing in his age or in any preceding age to explain him.

Hezekiah's Trials

TUESDAY, April 30. Isa. 38:17. "Behold, for peace I had great bitterness; but thou hast in love to my soul delivered it from the pit of corruption; for thou hast cast all my sins behind thy back." Hezekiah's bitterness was caused by his sins; for it ceased the moment he recalled how divine mercy had disposed of his sins. The consciousness of his guilt was the supreme cause of his unrest. There were other causes: his country had been invaded; his throne was in danger; his people were suffering; his religion was derided by pagans. All these calamities could be interpreted as signs of God's displeasure. Perhaps the Lord had cast him off; and if he had, was he not amply justified in doing so by Hezekiah's sins? When this fear seized Hezekiah, joy passed out of his life. His soul was brought to the pit of corruption. The glory of his kingship, the delights of his palace, the esteem of his countrymen, afforded him no pleasure. He turned from them with a feeling of bitterness: what could these earthly comforts avail in spiritual distress? Unless the favor of Jehovah were added to his joys, those joys could be no real joys.

Now it must be remembered that Hezekiah was a member of the Church that had been given the promise of the Redeemer, and that he was a believer in the Messiah. The spiritual unrest visited upon him was therefore for the purpose of endearing to him the remission of sins through the Redeemer. God permits his saints at times to become dispirited and disgusted with themselves, in order to lead them to a better appreciation of his mercy and goodness. He saddens hearts, in order to gladden them; he wounds like an expert surgeon, in order to restore to the patient perfect health. When gloomy thoughts settle on the soul, the God of grace is in that gloom, to dispel it, and to make the believer for whom he has accepted the ransom of the blood of his Son see that he holds no anger against him.

New Views on Old Truths

WEDNESDAY, May 1. Eccles. 7:10. "Say not thou . . . that former days were better than these." Whether the world is growing better is one of the great questions of the times. Will Christ's kingdom win the world to himself in the present dispensation or after his second coming? The progress of the past thousands of years incline us to the former view. During the past century, mighty reforms have been consummated, to say nothing of the wonderful discoveries in science, art and invention. It is well known that aged persons are inclined to depreciate the present in glorifying the past, whereas, should we not forget the things that are behind, pressing forward to the more glorious possibilities of coming time?

Should we not use the microscope for the past and the telescope for the future? True, the roots of the tree of life are in the past, but its branches and fruitage are ever growing greater and broader in the tomorrow. Christ's golden kingdom is coming as the result of divine power and human cooperation. We do not behold improvement in nature, because sunlight, air, earth and ocean are already in perfection. Music is as beautiful and melodious as when first emanating from the Divine One; love is an elementary essence of his being. But man, having fallen from his glorious estate, is rising upward and onward toward the country of his nativity. In this development we often have new views of old truths, the remodeling of some of the grand structures of righteousness, making them more ornamental and attractive.

Israel was unwilling to be remodeled by the Messiah, who came to fulfill the law and the prophets, not to destroy them. He presented the old in new dress. So the Episcopal Church of England regarded John Wesley as an innovator, and Methodism thought the same of William Booth and the Salvation Army. Entirely new teaching must be untrue, but every development of the old will appear grander to-morrow.

A Plea for Clean Living

THURSDAY, May 2. James 1:21. "Wherefore, lay apart all filthiness and superfluity of naughtiness, and receive with meekness the engrafted Word, which is able to save your souls." James Moffatt's New Translation of the New Testament gives us a striking paraphrase of these words: "So, clear away all the foul rank growth of malice, and make a soil of modesty for the Word, which roots itself inwardly with power to save your souls." Difficult as it may be to escape contamination in the present evil world, there is no doubt the world was vastly more corrupt when this epistle was written. That old pagan civilization was openly unclean. There are modern pagans who believe that was a better age than ours because of its very frankness and candor. It hardly seems so. Our times have this advantage over the ancient ages in one respect, as regards corrupt conduct: we do not practice unmentionable vices as a part of our religion, and that old world did. We all agree that religion—not alone the Christian religion, but any religion worthy of the name—demands pure hearts and clean minds. We believe that any other kind of religion is of the devil.

It was a great step in the progress of humanity when Judaism laid emphasis upon the necessity for personal holiness, for the Hebrews were surrounded by unclean peoples. Then came Jesus, with a new emphasis upon purity. He gave sanction to the Hebrew ideal of purity, vitalized, spiritualized and intensified it beyond measure. Jesus' words, "Blessed are the pure in heart," and James' words, "Lay apart all filthiness and overflowing wickedness," were spoken in the spirit of the father who lays his hand upon the shoulder of his son, as he leaves him to go out into the world or into the army, and says, "Come back home the same sweet, clean-living boy you go away."

The Measure of the Burden

FRIDAY, May 3. Ps. 6:3. "O Lord, how long?" This familiar cry of cross-bearers is not an inquiry regarding the duration of the trial through which they are passing, but a veiled complaint. Its real meaning is: "It is too much, O Lord, what I am made to suffer!" Many a fretting soul has thus spoken to God, and yet has carried its burden of grief for many years after. Chafing under the delay of the divine help which had been earnestly sought in prayer, the afflicted have taken the measure of their power of endurance, and have impatiently declared that the limit had been reached, only to learn that their calculations were altogether wrong.

The true measure is taken by Him who lays on the burden. He knows how to adjust accurately the trial of his children to their strength. Let us not lend our tongue to the peevish heart to utter its premature groans of despair. Let us not become offended at our Father in heaven, when he deals with us as he has dealt with some of his best friends; when he lets us cry for his aid a long time, and knock at his door with desperate zeal, without giving a sign that he has heard us. No answer to our prayers is nevertheless an answer. The answer reads: Be quiet and wait; suffer without pining; do not give up the race when you begin to pant; hope on and wrestle on! There is one Psalm (Ps. 13) which the same speaker has commenced with this bitter complaint: "How long wilt thou forget me, O Lord? how long wilt thou hide thy face from me?" Do you remember how he has ended this Psalm? This is what he says: "But I have trusted in thy mercy; my heart shall rejoice in thy salvation. I will sing unto the Lord, because he hath dealt bountifully with me." When the line is crossed beyond which our loving Father had placed our relief, and we look back, what a paltry thing our long griefs will seem compared to the joy and comfort that we found prepared for us!

His Nearness

SATURDAY, May 4. Ps. 139:7. "Whither shall I go from Thy spirit, or whither shall I flee from thy presence?" The ideal of Buddhism is an idol, sitting cross-legged, solemn, silent, negative, the image of dead desire. Hundreds of millions vainly seek rest and peace beside a feelingless figure of stone. The Christian's God is eternally alive, infinitely able to supply all human need. What a transition from a lifeless stone to the bosom of infinite compassion and affection! It is like the mighty change from a prison to a palace. What a boon to know that your God is of infinite power in holiness, goodness, perfection of love, peace and happiness; to know that he is omnipresent, everywhere waiting for your coming, preparing for your pleasure and usefulness, embellishing his worlds for your research, creating riches to make you munificent! How the sweet singer of Israel must have enjoyed his vision of the Infinite when he sang:

Whither shall I go from thy spirit?
If I ascend up into heaven, thou art there;
If I take the wings of the morning
And dwell in the uttermost part of the sea,
Even there shall thy hand lead me,
And the darkness hideth not from thee.

Only the infinite personality of the most high God meets all the requirements of an immortal spirit. Mysterious and vast in his greatness, yet "closer is he than breathing, nearer than hands and feet."

Representatives of the Methodist Episcopal Church and the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, meeting in joint session to perfect centenary plans

Brummitt, R. C. Diffendorfer, W. B. Beauchamp, Bishop James Atkins, John F. Goucher, Bishop Wilson S. Lewis, Miss Belle Bennett, Mrs. R. W. Mac-Donell, John T. Stone

METHODISM has ever had a habit of looking forward, so the delegates to the General Conference which met at Saratoga Springs in May, 1916, were not surprised when the Committee on Foreign Missions proposed that the culmination in 1919 of one hundred years of Methodist missions be appropriately celebrated. The General Conference approved the proposal, authorized the Centenary Celebration, and set apart the years 1918 and 1919 for this purpose. Acting upon this authorization and the instructions of the General Conference, the Boards of Home and Foreign Missions appointed commissions to make a careful survey of every mission opportunity and responsibility in the world, and named a World Program Committee to use this material in working out a constructive plan of celebration. The Centenary World Program was the result.

THE purpose of the Centenary is to provide a worthy celebration of the one-hundredth anniversary of Methodist missions, through:

Prayer, which shall revitalize and reconsecrate every individual member of the Church and bring to all peoples a deeper spiritual life and a more Christian nationalism.

Stewardship, which shall make giving an act of worship and bring to every Church member a keener realization that all that he is and has—all spiritual, mental, physical and material possessions—are but gifts to hold in trust and to share for the bringing about of God's Kingdom.

Education, which shall give every layman a more intimate acquaintance with his brothers in this and other lands, and make him a bigger, better, more active World Citizen.

Finance, which shall enlist loyal Methodists everywhere in underwriting the World Program during the Centenary years of 1918 and 1919, calling for $40,000,000 for home missions and $40,000,000 for foreign missions, covering a period of five years. The World Program Committee of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, which met in Memphis, March 19-21, fixed upon $35,000,000 as the goal for home and foreign missions of that body, with no limit placed upon the amount which might be raised.

With Christianity facing the severest test the world has yet known, with practically every country on the globe in the throes of transformation and reorganization—nothing less than a concerted effort of all Methodism could provide a worthy celebration of the missionary activities of the Church.

THE whole of the year 1918 is set apart as a period of education, during which the entire Church will be made acquainted with the mission needs in all lands and with the constructive program which has been planned to meet them. The actual time set apart for raising the $80,000,000 is not yet decided upon, but the financial drive will take place some time between January 1919 and the climax of the Centenary, the actual celebration of which is scheduled for the last week in June of that year. If war conditions permit of this celebration, it will take place at Columbus, Ohio.

The remainder of 1919 will be given up to sectional meetings in the North, South, East and West, for conserving the inspiration and enthusiasm aroused through the educational period and the Columbus celebration, and for crystallizing plans and preparing for the new century.

The World Challenge

How the Methodist Episcopal Church Is Meeting It

By HELEN A. BALLARD

One of the goals set for the Centenary is to give every Church in Methodism a missionary passion which will make it evangelizational at home and truly missionary in its outreaching to the ends of the earth—a Church in which each individual member recognizes it as his sacred obligation to promote the world-wide plans of Jesus Christ.

The actual World Program is a constructive program of education and evangelization which is to be promoted in the first five years of the new century. But the work scheduled for the first five-year period is only a preliminary part of the great hundred year's task. It is the beacon light whose rays shall stream down the years and light the way for increasingly great efforts to come.

THE Joint Centenary Committee, composed of four men from the Board of Foreign Missions and of four men from the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension, with Dr. D. D. Forsyth, who is the Corresponding Secretary of the Board of Home Missions, as Chairman and Dr. S. Earl Taylor, who is Corresponding Secretary of the Board of Foreign Missions as Executive Secretary, is the executive body for directing the details of carrying out this great Centenary World Program. From this National Committee, the Centenary organization will be carried down through the Church.

The officers of the Centenary Committee of the Methodist Episcopal Church South are: Bishop James Atkins, Chairman; W. W. Pinson, Executive Secretary; W. B. Beauchamp, Secretary, and W. G. Gram, Associate Secretary.

There is nothing haphazard about the organization methods for the promotion of this great program. Every plan has been worked out in detail, and the whole movement has been put on a strictly business efficiency basis headed by strong business men.

The Joint Centenary Committee has its offices at 111 Fifth Avenue. Clergymen from the different districts congregate there for conferences and enthusiastically get down to the definite proposition of how they can push the Centenary at home, for they believe that its success is not a question of promotion by a group of high-salaried men but of live, consecrated workers within the Church. There a group of trained workers, under the direction of Tyler Dennett, Executive of the Department of Publicity, produce forceful and picturesque literature for the use of the local Church, articles for the newspapers, the religious and secular press, publish "The Centenary Bulletin"—a weekly newspaper for workers, and act as a clearing house generally between the missionary on the field with his wealth of first-hand material, and the Methodist-reading public.

ANOTHER department of the Joint Centenary Committee is its Training School in Methods where speakers for the Centenary—men from the ends of the earth—meet with the secretaries, members of the executive staff and certain of the Bishops who administer the work in foreign lands, for discussions of the message, the method and the details for carrying out the Centenary Program, and relating it to world conditions of today, in order that they may start upon their field work well equipped with information and inspiration to impart to the Church constituency which they visit. Different groups of men are now making trans-continental speaking tours for the purpose of bringing the Centenary before the local Church. In numbers, enthusiasm and effect, the meetings are fulfilling the best expectations of the promoters.

Believing that the deepest missionary need of our time is spiritual, Dr. W. E. Doughty, who resigned his position as Secretary of the Interdenominational Laymen's Missionary Movement to become Chairman of the Department for the Development of Spiritual Resources of the Joint Centenary Committee, has organized a great prayer league known as The Fellowship of Intercession, to mobilize the spiritual forces of the Church through an army of Intercessors.

An organized campaign to secure a million tithers for Methodism is being promoted by Rev. Ralph S. Cushman, through the Stewardship Committee.

"Keep your eyes off the total," is the advice of Dr. W. B. Hollingshead, Executive of the Department of Allotments and Statistics, to the local Church which is asked to get in line for financing the Centenary World Program. Dr. Hollingshead does not believe in placing the burden entirely upon the wealthy members of the Church, but in democratic giving. Like the Government in the case of the Liberty Loan, Methodism will pride itself not on the large amount raised but on the number of givers.

Eighty millions a large sum of money? Yes, but Dr. S. Earl Taylor in presenting the estimates made from the figures of the survey of the needs of the various fields, said: "I have personally visited most of the work under direction of the Board. My own judgment, after having gone over the work, and especially looking into property and the matters of expenditures, is that the estimates are under, rather than over in almost every instance."

METHODISM is saying two things in this hour when the hearts of men are quaking," says Bishop Luther B. Wilson. "We dare to believe tremendously in God. We believe that he is still able to do and do abundantly above all we ask or think." We are saying also in the hour when the necessities of life at home are most pressing, 'we are lifting up our eyes, we are reaching out our hands to the ends of the earth. We do not believe that this is a moment for fine economies when the world is at stake. We believe sufficiently in God's power in the world to take up this task.'

Some results expected of the Centenary are that it will give every layman, from the eastern corporation magnate to the alert, hustling Middle West farmer a bigger world consciousness; that it will make of him a Christian not only in good standing but in good motion; that it will be a tremendous force for the promotion of a bigger, better, more active world citizenship. Already it is stimulating the individual church member to a more consecrated prayer life and to a more thoughtful and analytical reading of the best newspapers and magazines.

Wherever the Centenary World Program is being presented, it is making every man, woman and child in the Church realize that all that they are and all that they have—their spiritual, mental, physical and material resources—are but given them to hold in trust to be used for the happiness and help of others, for the promotion of world citizenship and of God's kingdom.

Ships, Ships, More Ships

Copyright, 1918, Frank G. Carpenter

COME with me to Hog Island, and see the biggest shipbuilding operation in Uncle Sam's mighty shipbuilding program. Fifteen per cent of all the steel merchant ships now contracted for by the Emergency Fleet Corporation will be constructed there. Many of the ways are rapidly approaching completion; the keels of the first vessels have been laid, and the parts of which they are to be fabricated have begun to flow here from the different factories all over the country.

A few months ago the place where the shipyards now are was covered with grass as high as your waist, and in places with bushes as high as your head. It was deserted and desolate. Six miles, as the crow flies, from the great bronze statue of William Penn, on the top of the city hall in Philadelphia, it was as lonesome as the valley of the Jordan near the Dead Sea—a dismal island of desolation in a great ocean of business activity. There were shipyards to the north of it, shipyards to the south of it, and ships were building on both sides of the Delaware for miles up and down stream. Not far away was the Philadelphia navy yard; and from there now and then flew the airplanes of the Aviation School across the way, frightening the birds which nested in the rushes.

Today Hog Island is one of the liveliest labor centers of our live war activities. That part of the island which skirts the Delaware River, not far from where the Schuylkill flows in, has been almost lifted out of the swamp. It is cut up by wide roads of thick planks, hundreds of two-story buildings have gone up, and from 15,000 to 25,000 men are employed there building ships. The shipyards cover hundreds of acres. The tract which the government has leased is equal to nine 100-acre farms, and this has been surrounded by a tight fence of pine boards about eight feet in height.

MORE than half of the vessels to be constructed at Hog Island are of just the same length and almost the same depth, although not so wide, as Noah's ark. Taking the cubit of the Bible as a foot and a half, the usual estimate, it was just 450 feet long, 75 feet wide and 45 feet deep. The order for ships from the Hog Island yards includes seventy steel steamers, each of which is to be 450 feet long, 58 feet wide and about 40 feet deep. In addition to this, fifty more steamers are to be made, each of which is fifty feet shorter. The big ships have just about half the tonnage that has usually been estimated for the leviathan of the flood, its greater capacity coming from its increased width and depth. Noah's ark was made of gopher wood and pitched without and within. Gopher wood has often been identified with our cypress, which is to be largely used in the ships of the Emergency Fleet program.

The Hog Island vessels are to be of steel throughout. Each vessel will have about 20,000 parts and these are to be made in 1,000 different factories throughout the United States and sent here to be assembled. Much of the work of making the parts will be done by the large bridge-making companies and structural steel plants. They will make the plates, manufacture the rivets and punch the holes. The whole order will require about 380,000 tons of steel thus worked into parts; and when the work is well under way it will take something like 500 cars daily to bring in the material. The daily train required for that purpose, if the cars were all joined together, would be four miles in length. Inside the yard itself there are now more than eighty miles of railroad tracks, and the rolling stock includes twenty-five locomotives, 500 freight cars and fifty passenger coaches. In all, more than 75,000,000 feet of lumber will be required for the construction and over 10,000,000 feet will be used in the shipways themselves. There are twenty acres of buildings now under roof.

THE ways, 50 in number, extend along the Delaware River for almost two miles. They slope gently up from the water and each consists of a long row of blocks, laid one upon another, where the keel of the ship is to rest. Most of the ways are now completed, and some have vessels rising upon them. Others are still in process of construction and we can see the enormous work required to build a plant of this kind. In the first place the shipways must have a solid foundation. The weight of each vessel is some thousands of tons, and it must rest as firmly as the house on the rock. The foundation is made by driving down piles or great trunks of trees, sixty or more feet into the earth.

In one place I saw them driving piles made of concrete. In this case a steel finger almost as large as the pile forces its skin of steel far down into the earth. It is then withdrawn, and the concrete mixture is poured into the skin and hardens to stone. Some piles of this kind are sunk to a depth of seventy-odd feet, and within a few hours after driving are as solid as the wooden tree trunks under the shipways adjoining.

The government already has between $20,000,000 and $30,000,000 invested in the Hog Island plant, and a bomb or a fire could do endless damage. It is for this reason that the big fence, with barbed wire guards, was built, and for the same reason no one is admitted to the yards without a pass, and every vehicle that goes in is carefully examined. There are acres of barracks for housing the men, great stables for hundreds of horses and mess halls where 2,000 and more can be fed at one time. Very near us is the Y. M. C. A., which, when in full swing, will be the largest industrial Y. M. C. A. of the world. A great deal of welfare work has already been started. The laborers who come in from everywhere are constantly changing, and already more than 100,000 men have had a hand in the work. On one day of last month 26,000 men were on the job.

Philadelphia has always been one of our chief shipbuilding centers, and they have been making ships here from the days of William Penn until now. If you could climb to the top of the city hall tower, and, standing by the statue of William Penn, look up and down the Delaware River you would see that it is dotted with shipyards for a length of perhaps fifty miles. Indeed it is often called the American Clyde, and within a few months it will be

Jones and those of the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation. All of these establishments are now owned or directed by the United States Government, and their army of employees is working overtime to supply the losses caused by the submarines of the Germans.

THE shipyards already cover something like thirty square miles. They begin about twenty-five miles north of Philadelphia at Bristol. There the Merchants' Shipbuilding Company has just established a fabricating plant to build vessels for the Emergency Fleet Corporation. It has a dozen ways already completed, and five keels have been laid. A little farther south on the same side of the river is the Trailer Shipbuilding Company, and then come the great yards of the Cramps, who have been noted as shipbuilders for generations. Still further south on the opposite side of the river in Camden is the J. H. Mathis Shipbuilding Company and below it on the same side of the river is the great New York Shipbuilding Company, which is now in the hands of the government and is turning out ships as fast or faster than any other plant in the country. It has nineteen cargo vessels in the different stages of construction, and a new battleship for the Navy, the Idaho, almost completed.

Below the New York Shipbuilding yards at Gloucester, N. J., is the Pennsylvania Shipbuilding yard, which launched more than 27,000 tons of shipping last year, and will greatly increase its output in 1918; and still further south is the New Jersey Shipbuilding Company.

On the western side of the river opposite these plants is the navy yard at the lower end of the city of Philadelphia, and south of that just below where the Schuylkill runs into the Delaware is Hog Island. South of Hog Island is the town of Chester, where are the Chester Shipbuilding Company and the Sun Shipbuilding Company, and still further south in Delaware at Wilmington are the yards of Pusey &

JANET GRAYSON and Harley Bruce had grown up as playmates in the village of Springdale until Harley left for college. When on his return he called at the Grayson house, he was accompanied by Lotta Lomond, whose appearance and manners were in marked contrast to the simplicity of the village girl. Next Sunday Janet was relieved to see Harley at his old place as teacher of his class of boys in the Sunday school. But on Sunday evening she received a visit from the aristocratic mother of Harley Bruce, who had come to explain to Janet how impossible it would be for her son to find anything in common with a simple country girl. Mary Granniss, daughter of an ex-governor, came to visit Mrs. Bruce, who was astounded to learn that her visitor had been a schoolmate of Janet Grayson, and that one reason for her visit was the desire to see her old friend. Mrs. Bruce was obliged to send a note to Janet announcing the visit, but Janet was spending a week at her Aunt Nan's, and Mrs. Grayson answered the note, inviting Mary Granniss to call.

MARY GRANNISS had come down to breakfast that morning with eagerness, looking forward to seeing her friend Janet very soon. She had decided to tell Janet that she simply must invite her away from this uncongenial atmosphere. She had secretly been wondering what on earth Janet could have found in the son of this woman to have liked, for if the son should prove anything like the mother he must be intolerable. But then very likely Janet and he had only been friends as children. She had been a fool to accept this invitation merely because she thought these Bruces, whom she had met casually at a house party in the mountains, were friends of her friend. She had already planned how she might cut short her visit here, and spend part of the time with Janet.

It was therefore most disappointing to hear Mrs. Bruce's smiling announcement at the breakfast table that Miss Grayson was away on a visit. Mary looked at her hostess blankly.

"But wasn't there any message?" she ventured to ask. "Isn't Janet's mother at home?"

"No other message, my dear! I'm sorry. We shall have to make it very gay indeed for you, to help you forget these friends of yours."

MRS. BRUCE had regained her high spirits and meant to make the most of her distinguished young guest. She had telephoned to her lawyer in New York to hunt up Harley and send him back at once, and she had persuaded herself that he would probably return on the morning express, or at the latest on the next train, which reached Springdale just after lunch. Meantime she exerted herself to get her guest away from Springdale for the morning. She felt that fortune was favoring her in sending that nuisance of a Janet Grayson away from home. She announced that they would motor to a country club some twenty miles across country and attend a tennis tournament, and she called up some friends of hers at a distance and arranged to have them meet her at the country club for lunch.

Mary was intending to insist upon going to the Grayson house to see Janet's mother. Mrs. Bruce saw it in her eyes, but left her no chance to suggest it, hurrying them all from the table into the waiting cars and off for the day. Mary was much disappointed, and bored to extinction by the whole party, but she had accepted Mrs. Bruce's hospitality, and in common decency she must be courteous. The morning dragged its weary length away, and half the afternoon. Mary was glad when they started back. She had not seen much of her hostess that morning, for to tell the truth Mrs. Bruce had spent most of her time in a telephone booth frantically telephoning here and there, to her friends, to clubs, to summer resorts, to hotels, anywhere where Harley might have taken refuge, hoping to locate him before returning home.

But when they finally reached Springdale again it was three o'clock and no news of Harley yet. His ambitious mother was fairly frantic trying to think how to hold and interest this most difficult guest until the whim should send her son back again. And it was so vexatious, now that she really had the kind of girl who would be likely to interest Harley, that he should stay away.

MARY meantime had gone up to her room, determined to find a way to slip quietly out of the house while the rest were taking naps and look up Mrs. Grayson. In her room she found Mrs. Grayson's note, much to her relief. Now she would slip out and have a nice quiet talk with her dear old friend, and together they would fix up some plan for her to get out of this uncongenial atmosphere. Either that or she must cut her visit short and go home at once, for she would not stand another day here.

She slipped on a little pale blue muslin, smoothed her hair, took a plain white parasol, went quietly out down the stairs, and was just about to make good her escape from the house, when Mrs. Bruce stepped out from the library.

"Why, my dear! Not sleeping? Where in the world can you be going? Haven't you had enough exercise yet today? You really are unquenchable, aren't you?"

Mary answered simply: "I've just had a note from Mrs. Grayson. I'm going to see her. It isn't far from here, is it? I'm sure I shall easily find the way. I was going to ask a servant."

"Oh, my dear! I couldn't think of letting you go there alone! It really is due that I should make a formal call since she is your friend. Couldn't you put off your visit till tomorrow, dear? You must be so tired after the morning's exertions. Mrs. Grayson surely would understand."

MRS. BRUCE was standing in the shadow of the portière and the consternation in her face was not visible to Mary, so she had no idea of the perturbation in the poor woman's mind. She saw, however, the firm set of the thin lips, and realized that she had a difficult force to deal with. For some reason Mrs. Bruce did not wish her to go to Mrs. Grayson's, that was plain. She could not possibly know, of course, what alarm Mrs. Bruce was experiencing at the thought of what might happen if the Governor's daughter should have an opportunity of a private conference with Janet's mother. Mrs. Bruce had resolved that no matter what else suffered she would not let that happen.

But Mary Granniss was fully as determined not to leave company on her intended visit.

"Oh, that is not the least necessary, my dear Mrs. Bruce," she protested eagerly. "Mrs. Grayson will not expect it from you when she knows you have your house full of guests. You see, I am very intimate with them, and I will just run in and see her a little while and learn all the news about Janet. You can easily make your call tomorrow if you wish. I will explain how busy you were."

But Mrs. Bruce's thin lips set close, and a dark flush of color rolled over her sharp, determined face.

"Oh, very well, if you insist," she said coldly. "I will have the car at the door in five minutes. I couldn't think of letting you go on foot." And she touched the bell and ordered the car at once. Of course Mary could do nothing else but sit down and wait. But when the car came around to the door Mrs. Bruce, who had excused herself for a moment, came rustling down the stairs in an elaborate hat and white gloves.

"I found I could go just as well as not," she explained affably, as she stepped into the limousine and opened her card case to seek out the requisite number of cards.

Mary was so vexed and disappointed that she could scarcely talk at all during the brief ride, but Mrs. Bruce was voluble in the extreme. She filled every minute with a minute description of Harley's trip and stay abroad.

NOTHING could have been more suave and gushing than Mrs. Bruce's manner when she reached the Grayson house. She smiled and said how delightful it was to renew this dear old acquaintance after all these years of separation, exactly as if she had been in the habit of visiting Mrs. Grayson as often as her son had done.

The maid had let them in and put them in the big cool living-room, with its simple luxury, which, even to one so fond of show as Mrs. Bruce, showed cultivated taste and no lack of funds wherewith to indulge it.

Mrs. Grayson came to them at once, graceful, sweet, dignified, and folded Mary in her arms with a tender kiss. But when it came to her gushing hostess, Mrs. Grayson drew herself up with sweet dignity and looked her visitor straight in the eye. There was nothing of belligerence in that look, nor even of rebuke; simply that clear, calm, keen gaze that searched the little soul of the other woman and showed her that she knew. She did not assert her position. She did not have to. One glance was enough to show the cultured gentlewoman; and she stood there in her sweet confidence, and with her look confused the woman of the world, and put her in her right place. Afterward Mrs. Bruce, in the retirement of her chamber thinking over the interview, could not remember one word that had been addressed distinctly to herself, one look but that first searching one that seemed to pierce through the veneer of her life and search down into the depths of herself.

They sat down in her charming living-room and conversed; Mrs. Grayson the gracious hostess, yet holding her irreproachable position as a woman of culture and undeniable social prestige. Names were mentioned familiarly which were the open sesame to the social world, and represented to Mrs. Bruce her highest social ambitions; yet between Mary Granniss and this quiet elderly woman whom they were calling, they seemed but household intimates. There was nothing boastful, nothing intentional, apparently, in their mention; they came but naturally as from habitual use.

MRS. BRUCE did her part bravely at participating in the conversation, but not a single one of her sentences carried and became a part of the general topic. They floated off about the air like painted bubbles and died unnoticed. And yet there was not one second when she could put her finger on a single word or action, not even a lifted eyelid, that she could say was rude. She knew that she was being absolutely ignored, as if she had fallen unseen into some kind of an invisible pit, yet she could find no way to call attention to herself in such a manner that they would either have openly to neglect her, or pull her up and into recognition. It is safe to say that Mrs. Bruce had not passed so uncomfortable a half-hour in years; and when she rose to go it was not even at her suggestion that the visit had come to an end. Mary Granniss was managing the whole affair.

"Now, dear, how long did you say you were to stay?" asked Mrs. Grayson innocently. "Janet would be broken-hearted not to see you. She is only over at her aunt's at Rosedale, and if you can spare the time she will be delighted to have you come to her. The trolley goes by the door and it is but a half-hour's ride!"

Mrs. Bruce looked aghast! She was just congratulating herself on having got almost out of a trying situation, and here it was flung full-fledged upon her once more; and in worse form than ever, for the sharp tongue of the daughter might give more than a look to reveal to the distinguished guest her abominable mistake.

"Oh!" she cried eagerly, fairly choking in her haste to get the words out. "Why, Rosedale is right at the door. I can take you there this afternoon if you wish!"

Mary Granniss turned with delighted surprise.

"Oh, are you sure it will not put you out?" she asked. "I should love to see Janet without delay, but I do not like to inconvenience you. Couldn't I put you down at the house and then go on myself? I would do quite well alone such a short drive."

But Mrs. Bruce was determined to go to Rosedale, and she made her adieus as elaborately as she had entered; while Mrs. Grayson stood calmly watching her with that same clear curious gaze. One lovely smile she gave Mary as she bade her good-by, and Mrs. Bruce got into her limousine with a feeling that she had been put outside the pale irrevocably by one woman whom she might just as well have had for her intimate if she had only known she was worth while.

Mrs. Grayson watched the car out of sight, and then went quietly to the telephone and called up her sister.

When the Bruce limousine stopped before Aunt Nan's door that lady was sitting calmly in a big willow porch chair half sheltered by vines and porch screens. She wore a pretty pale green voile and was knitting industriously at a great brown army sweater that filled her lap. There was a good breeze on the big wide porch drawing through the stone arches; and there were other willow chairs, deep and comfortable with eretonne cushions and pillows, and a luxurious hammock couch with more pillows; and big quaint foreign fans of curious weave; and on the round willow table was a tray with glasses and a tinkling pitcher of some cool translucent yellow drink that smelled of oranges; but nowhere was there any sign of Janet.

Aunt Nan got up to welcome her guests with a little smile of well feigned surprise on her face, and came forward, but gave no sign that she knew the handsome girl who came eagerly up the steps and asked for Janet. But Aunt Nan only smiled for answer and looking at the elder lady said:

"This is Mrs. Bruce, I believe, is it not? I think I remember seeing you several years ago."

OH, how Aunt Nan enjoyed saying that! She rolled it as a sweet morsel under her tongue, and her eyes were twinkling mischievously. She remembered the occasion so well when she had told Mrs. Bruce some plain truths about the way she was treating her son, as only an indignant young girl can wax eloquent in what she considers a righteous cause. But of course Mrs. Bruce didn't know Aunt Nan from Adam now, and Aunt Nan was calm in her consciousness of a becoming gown and an inviting home. Also she had an advantage over her guests of having been prepared for the interview. She turned then to Mary, holding out a gracious hand:

"And this is—?"

"Miss Granniss," said the girl; "a friend of Janet's. Her roommate from college."

"Not Mary Granniss?"

"Yes."

"Why, how delightful! You know your name is a household word! Janet will be wild with delight! Run right up stairs to her. She is in her kimono getting cooled off. She went on a long walk this morning with a friend. Go right up softly and surprise her. The first door to the right at the head of the stairs. How pleased she will be! And, Mrs. Bruce, shall we sit down here and have a glass of orangeade? Won't you sit in this other chair. I think you will find it more comfortable. Let me take that knitting out of your way. It does occupy so much room. I suppose you are up to your eyes in knitting too. Have you joined the Red Cross here yet? They are after everybody to help, and of course they'll want you. I belong to the Red Cross and the Emergency Aid both. I think I ought to do all I can when I have so much time on my hands. Isn't this war the most absorbing awful thing? It really changes one's whole outlook on life, doesn't it?"

Mrs. Bruce sank into the big chair uncertainly and with distraught face. She had been taken unawares and was dreadfully put out that Mary had been spirited away so suddenly for a private conference with Janet, where she could have no hand in the conversation; but there really seemed no way for her to get around this glib, impertinent person, who was so much at her ease. Who was she, anyway? Another member of an illustrious family with money who chose to pose as simple country people? She sank back in the chair reluctantly and wondered how she could contrive a way out of the situation.

"Oh, really," she said as she languidly accepted the frosty glass, "I haven't thought much about the war! It doesn't interest me in the least."

"Oh, but it will," said Aunt Nan emphatically, "when your son gets into it. I fancy all our young men will be there before this is over."

"Nonsense!" said Mrs. Bruce sharply. "It's all politics and sentiment! No, indeed! Harley knows better than to do any such foolish thing. He had the craze, of course, when it first began to be a fad to enlist, but I gave him very clearly to understand that I wouldn't have any such thing."

"But the draft, Mrs. Bruce. You forget that. Of course he has been registered."

"Oh, yes," shrugged the lady, "I believe he was registered, but his number is away up in the thousands somewhere. It will all be over before they get to him. But even if it wasn't, I fancy there'll be ways to get around that."

"I fancy not!" said Aunt Nan emphatically. "but even if there were, Harley never struck me as the kind of young man who would be willing to try to get away from a duty."

"You seem to know a great deal about my son," remarked Mrs. Bruce with a disagreeable laugh. "Perhaps you can tell me whether he has been around in this neighborhood today? I've been very anxious to get trace of him. He went away without leaving word where he would be." She looked at Aunt Nan suspiciously, as if she might have Harley hidden somewhere about the place. She was wondering if he might have been the "friend" with whom Janet went walking. But Aunt Nan shook her head.

"I was wishing he would run over," she said brightly, taking up her knitting again. "because I want some young man to try on my sweater and see if it is large enough. I've been making it a new stitch and I'm not just sure if it's right. Won't you have another glass of orangeade, Mrs. Bruce?"

AUNT Nan chatted on pleasantly, while Mrs. Bruce sat uneasily, trying to contrive a way to summon Mary to go home. There was a twinkle of mischief lurking in Aunt Nan's brown eyes. Her visitor wondered if Janet could have told her aunt about her. The afternoon seemed to grow warmer as it waned, and her face felt congested. She wished that she had not come! that she had let her queer guest go off by herself a-visiting! She almost wished that she had never heard of Mary Granniss!

Meantime upstairs in Aunt Nan's cool big guest-room the two girls were overjoyed at being together again.

"But how in the world do you happen to be visiting Mrs. Bruce, Mary dear?" asked Janet after the first greetings were over. "I had no idea you knew her, and I didn't know that she ever invited anybody as sensible and charming as you to her house parties."

"Well, Janet, it was the biggest blunder I ever made, and I guess she thinks so too. I am sure I don't know how she ever came to ask me. It's no compliment to me that she did, if I may judge by the rest of the mob she has there at present. But anyhow she asked me; and when I heard she lived in Springdale and found I had a few days before I was to meet mamma at the shore I accepted with alacrity, thinking what fun it would be to drop down here and surprise you. I thought of course the Bruces were your intimate friends because you used to talk about Harley Bruce, but I'm beginning to think you have very poor taste if they are your choice."

"No, Mary, we're not friends at all. I scarcely know Mrs. Bruce, and I can't say I admire her companions. It was her son Harley of whom I used to speak. We were inseparables when we were children. He is, or was, quite different from his mother," she said earnestly.

"I should hope so," said Mary significantly. "He hasn't been at home yet since I arrived yesterday afternoon. His mother has chattered of him almost continually, though, but I can't say I have been very desirous of seeing him."

"Oh! He has been away," said Janet with a look of sudden brightening. "I'm so glad! No, I mean I'm so sorry! for I would like you to meet him."

"Well, I'm not likely to unless he arrives tonight, for I simply will not endure another day with that insipid company! I'm going to tell Mrs. Bruce on the way back that I have decided to go down to the shore at once. I had a letter from mamma this afternoon, and she said if I found it convenient I might run down and see that everything is in order in the cottage. Why couldn't you and your mother go along?"

"Why, perhaps we could," said Janet thoughtfully. "I'll tell you what—I'll ask Aunt Nan to get nacle to motor us all down for a day or two, and then you could come back and visit us here at Aunt Nan's until your mother is ready to come."

"How perfectly fascinating! Do you suppose Aunt Nan would have me? You know, I haven't been really introduced to her yet."

"Have you? She'll be delighted! But you won't want to say anything to her before Mrs. Bruce, of course, and I'm not going down, dear, if you'll excuse me to her. Suppose you take the morning train—there's one at nine-thirty from Springdale—and get off here at Rosedale. I'll be down at the station probably with uncle and mother and the car, but if they can't go for any reason I'll get on the train with you. I'll call you up if there is any change to be made, but I dislike to phone there, as I have never had anything to do with Mrs. Bruce, and I had an experience a few days ago with those guests of hers that was not very pleasant."

"I can imagine! Well, I'll hang around the telephone as much as possible this evening. It seems a long and dreary waste to pass through before tomorrow morning. Positively, Jan, those people and I haven't an idea in common! But I'll get through it somehow, now that there's a prospect of better things tomorrow. I hope that paragon of a son doesn't arrive. I shall hate him, I know; and I do want to keep a good opinion of your judgment in friends."

"Oh, you won't hate him," said Janet earnestly. "I tell you he's very different from his mother. He—well, of course, he's been away a long time," she finished evasively.

Mary looked at her keenly.

"You dear child!" she said irrelevantly. "You're just as sweet and real as ever, aren't you? It hasn't spoiled you one mite to grow up. In fact, I suspect you of not being a day older than when you first came to college. Now I really must go down to that poor beset woman. She didn't want to come here at all, but she would in spite of all I could do, and she's well-nigh distracted about that precious son of hers because he doesn't turn up. She wants to be at home this very minute, but for some reason she wouldn't trust me to come alone. I'm like a young prisoner in that house. I haven't done a thing I wanted to since I landed except come here. I may be put in a padded cell if she suspects I'm going to leave soon. If I don't arrive on that train you better gather a battalion of soldiers and come and rescue me. Bye-bye, dearest! Till tomorrow!" and she stooped and kissed Janet softly on the cheek.

JANET, with flushed cheeks and eyes that were less shadowed than when her guest arrived, stole to the window to watch the car drive away. In her heart was a little tunc going over and over without words. It was founded on the thought that Harley had not stayed away from her all day because of his mother's influence. He did not know, of course, what had happened. Perhaps by the time he returned it would all be forgotten somehow, his mother gone away or something, and he need never know the humiliation of it all. She could not bear that the fair friendship of their childhood should be blighted in his mind this way. She was glad she knew he was away, glad that a way was opening for her to leave home and go to the shore for a few days. What a splendid schemer and protector Aunt Nan was? And what had been Mrs. Bruce's idea in daring to come there anyway?

But somehow after all she was not deeply troubled about Mrs. Bruce, and she went about dressing for dinner, humming snatches of a bright little song; while Aunt Nan, listening below, smiled to herself and pondered. Something had lifted the burden from the dear child's heart and brought the song again, and she was glad.

MEANTIME Mrs. Bruce was conveying her guest back home in no enviable frame of mind. She had no means of knowing what had gone on between Mary Granniss and Janet Grayson, and she was fairly frantic to get home and find out whether Harley had arrived. Mary thanked her for bringing her to see her old friends, and admired the landscape politely, and Mrs. Bruce did her best to keep her mind on the conversation. At last as they were nearing the house Mary said pleasantly:

"Mrs. Bruce, I'm afraid I shall have to cut short my visit with you. I had a letter from my mother this afternoon asking me to look after some matters down at the shore where our cottage is located, and I have decided that it would be best for me to start tomorrow morning. You know father has been quite ill, and mother wants everything to be comfortable there when she brings him down."

Mrs. Bruce was always quick as a flash to see an advantage.

"Oh, my dear! I'm so sorry your visit must be interrupted just when I am expecting my son home. I am almost sure he will be here this evening. But we will only say interrupted. Harley will be delighted to take you down in the car, and bring you back when you have completed your mission. What time did you want to start? I don't think you would need to leave before ten. It is only a two hours' trip down there. I'll try to arrange to go with you myself and chaperone you. If any of the others want to go too they can take the touring car. Then we can stay over night or as long as you need to, and bring you back with us. That will be quite a pleasant innovation."

"Oh, thank you Mrs. Bruce!" said Mary quickly. "That is very kind, but it will be impossible! I have already promised to go down with Janet and her mother. I must leave here on that nine-thirty train!"

Mrs. Bruce did her insistent best to move Mary from this decision, urging her to telephone and change her plans, or at least to ask Mrs. Grayson and her daughter to go with them then in the Bruce cars; but Mary was firm, and Mrs. Bruce saw that her prize guest was slipping gracefully through her fingers. If Harley did not come tonight and save the situation all would be lost. Harley must be found at once!

As soon as Mary had gone to her room to dress for dinner Mrs. Bruce sent for her chauffeur:

"Morton, I want you to go back to that house in Rosedale where we were calling just now and find out if Mr. Harley is there, or has been there. You will know how to drive observantly by several times and find out. If necessary wait until dusk when the lights are on and go near to the house. If you can't find out in that way, perhaps Miss Janet Grayson, who is visiting there, can throw some light on his whereabouts. Understand, Morton, Mr. Harley must be found and brought back tonight! It is ten dollars on your wages this month if you do it; fifteen if you bring him in time for dinner, at seven o'clock. Do you think you understand?"

"Yes, madam," said Morton, eyeing her with his keen, sly little eyes, and he bowed and left the room. In a moment more Mrs. Bruce heard the car speeding out into the road again.

The Overwhelming Answer

FOR years Protestant Christianity prayed to the Father to open the doors of heathen lands that the Gospel might be taken to those who struggle in the darkness of superstition and ignorance. One by one the Spirit tore from their hinges the doors of opposition, until today thousands of souls are ready to be garnered into the Kingdom. The missions are thronged with seekers whom the missionaries and their helpers are too few to handle. In the Missionary News of March 17 the following interesting compilation was given to enable those who desire the bringing in of the Kingdom of God to visualize the work for missions which might be done by money now spent thoughtlessly, or for necessities that might be done without. The list is as follows:

A streetcar fare, 5 cents. Will keep an orphan in one of our orphanages one day. A sundae, 10 cents, will maintain a student in a training school in India one day. A movie ticket, 25 cents, will provide for a patient in a Mission Hospital one day. A box of candy, 50 cents, will pay a missionary's travel in China one day. A theater ticket, $1.00, will enable a mass movement boy in India to attend school one year. A pair of gloves, $1.50, will keep an ordained preacher in India, Korea, or Africa one week. A box of cigars, $2.00, will lay two bricks of the College Chapel in the heart of Rome. A man's hat, $3.00, will pay for a thousand tracts in a native language. A pair of shoes, $5.00, will provide treatment for 200 cases of malaria in India. A new Easter hat, $7.50, will enable a Japanese boy to earn his way through three months in a Christian School. Material for a dress, $10.00, will furnish a hospital bed in Bidar, India, for a year. A hired car trip, $15.00, will provide support for an orphan in India or China for a year. A spring overcoat, $20.00, will furnish the lumber for a church in India which the native Christians will gladly build without pay. A suit of clothes, $25.00, will help a young boy in South America to a year of Christian education and save him from skepticism. A winter overcoat, $30.00, will support a Bible woman in China or India for a year. A set of furs, $40.00, will keep twenty boys in a day school in China one year. A vacation trip, $50.00, will buy a good stereopticon, with which the story of Christ can be made real to ignorant yet hungry souls in many lands. An evening dress, $60.00, will supply a busy missionary with a typewriter whereby he can multiply his efficiency. Repapering a house, $75.00, will give a year of theological school training—the equipment for a life of greatest service—to a native Japanese. A diamond ring, $100.00, will build a chapel in which the gospel can be preached for years in one of several fields. A victrola, $250.00, will build a good church whence the sweetest of music will rise to the throne of God. A piano, $300.00, will keep two ordained preachers in several fields for 365 days. A Ford car, $400.00, will, if sent plus freight, enable a missionary to do two men's work. A new garage, $500.00, will endow a scholarship in some lands which will turn out a trained educated native preacher once every three or four years. A motor boat, $1,000.00, will build a memorial church in one of many fields. A modern automobile, $2,000.00, will put a missionary family in the field and support them through their year of language study. A pearl necklace, $3,000.00, will buy land, put up buildings and finance for a year a circuit center in India whence fifty or even sixty villages can be reached by a native pastor. A high-priced car, $5,000.00, will put a new missionary family in the field and support them for three years.

THE MEN OF OUR NAVY FO

THE boys, our boys in khaki and olive drab, went safely over wintry seas to France and the fight. But the boys in blue of the Navy fought rain and sleet and storm to keep the lurking submarine away, until the fighting ships looked like icy phantoms. But back of that frozen turret and those ice-muzzled guns there was waiting always a hot and ready welcome for the enemy: behind the canvas wall of the bridge above, keen eyes were always facing the tempest and the frost; alert, watching every wave crest and hollow for the fugitive periscope; and if that bell had sounded the alarm, neither ice nor sleet nor wind could have saved the enemy

And 'way off there beyond that faint blue of the horizon is the danger zone. If the ice-crusted rail, the frozen winches, the frost-battered hatches should tempt the enemy to take a chance, he would be taking only one—his last

A Week of Bran

A prime spring cleanser is a bran food—Nature's laxative.

Try it for a week in Pettijohn's—a delicious morning cereal.

Watch its effects on spring languor. Mark how fit one feels. You will not forget the lesson, we believe.

Better Than Drugs

Indoor life and fine foods tend to clog the system. Nature calls for roughage.

The old remedy was drugs. But a better way is proper food. And the best is bran.

It's Delightful

Clear bran is uninviting. That's why millions so neglect it. But in Pettijohn's we hide the bran in flavory cereal flakes.

This dish is ever-welcome. No cereal food was ever more delightful. So the joys of bran come in a joyous way.

Try it now—each morning for a week. Then judge it by its taste and its effects.

Most folks who do that will ever after serve this dish frequently. And every doctor will advise it.

Order it at once.

Questions and Answers

ALMOST DISCOURAGED. The passage in Heb. 10 to which you refer deals with an aggravated form of backsliding—those who sin after receiving "full knowledge" of the truth, and who, after being enlightened and experiencing a certain measure of grace, apostatize either to some religion which is opposed to Christianity or to absolute infidelity. Such a case is not the result of ignorance or error, but of moral wickedness. In fact a deliberate sin against the Spirit and a presumptuous sin against Christ as our Redeemer, who is thereby crucified afresh. But while, humanly speaking, such cases are so difficult to deal with that they baffle our most earnest efforts, they are by no means impossible with God, who, through the operation of the Holy Spirit, can melt the heart of the presumptuous sinner and bring him, through boundless mercy, to see his sin and to seek divine forgiveness. Such a salvation is one of the miracles of grace and proves that God's mercy is indeed boundless. It is well when a sinner begins to realize the wickedness and ingratitude of his backsliding. It is well, too, that he should grieve over it, for remorse in such a case is wholesome discipline. And, further, the very fact that he is troubled about the "unpardonable sin" may be accepted as absolute evidence that he has not sinned beyond the reach of grace: for if he had, he would have neither remorse nor repentance, but would be wholly indifferent to the result of his acts. With respect to your other question, we would say that while many of the promises in the Old Testament were given to the Jews especially, they are (with certain specific exceptions), applied under the Gospel interpretation to believers generally.

J. R., Seattle, Wash. From the beginning of the war in 1914 to date, the U. S. beef exports to the Allies have totaled 616,000,000 pounds of fresh and 203,000,000 pounds canned beef; of wheat from July 1, 1914, to January 1, 1918, we have sent 389,000,000 bushels, and of wheat-flour 24,600,000 barrels. Wheat is their great need for the next harvest. Our pork exports to the Allies from July, 1914, to January, 1918, have aggregated 3,000,000,000 pounds.

Mrs. E. H., Okanogan, Wash. 1. New York is at present the largest city in the world, its population being 5,602,841, and that of London 4,522,964. The population of metropolitan New York is estimated at 7,500,000, while that of metropolitan London is 7,252,963. 2. The water flows through the Straits of Gibraltar from west to east, entering the Mediterranean Sea from the Atlantic. It has also been demonstrated that there exists a westward flowing counter current, which carries off the surplus waters of the Mediterranean.

Mr. H. K. S., Cleveland, Ohio. The invention of the gas engine is a much disputed matter. As far back as 1678, Albe d'Hauteville invented an engine for the employing of the explosive power of gunpowder. Two or three years later, Christian Huygens and Denis Papen put into practice d'Hauteville's theories. Since that time there have been many improvements on the gas engine. The first practical gas engine is said to have been invented by Lenoir, a Frenchman, in the year 1860.

Mrs. J. B. McC., Seavey, Kan., sends this striking message from the letter of a soldier boy: "As long as the churches are only half filled, the prayer meeting and Sunday school neglected, and our people go on in a gay, indifferent manner, just so long are present conditions going to remain and the war to continue. When God's people forsake their sin and return to him, his hand will stay the hand of slaughter." This is good, sound Christian logic, and it would be well for not only Churches but individuals to ponder it. Repentance and prayer are the secret of assurance and power, as through them we come into harmony with God and work in line with the divine purpose.

C. W. L., Kingman, Kan. The phrase, "Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty," was used by John Philipot Curran in his speech at Dublin in 1808.

R. H., Canada. The apostle tells us (Rom. 13: 1-4) to be subject to the higher powers, which means our governments, for there is no power but of God; the forces that be are ordained of God.

Uncle Sam Tells the Startling Truth About the Common Cold

HE says it is the most prevalent disease in the United States.

He says it is highly contagious—that every time you are afflicted with this widespread and dangerous malady you take it from someone else.

He says that every person who has a cold should be put to bed and placed under the care of a competent physician.

He says that pneumonia kills more people in the United States than any other disease excepting tuberculosis.

He says that aside from the fearful loss of life, colds cost America fabulous sums in the reduced efficiency of the millions of people who annually suffer from them.

The United States Public Health Service has prepared a short special paper on colds, telling what they are, and how to avoid them.

This paper tells the meaning of colds, their causes, the manner of their spread.

You should have a copy of this paper. It is worth a great deal to any man or woman to avoid the suffering and inconvenience caused by even the mildest cold.

Every parent should know how to guard himself and his children against colds. This knowledge may easily be the means of saving the life of some member of the family.

The Christian Herald Information Bureau will send you a copy of this valuable paper free. Send a two-cent stamp for return postage with your name and address to The Christian Herald Information Bureau, Frederic J. Haskin, Director, Washington, D. C., and a copy of the paper on "The Common Cold," will be sent you promptly.

Mr. W. F. B., Ann Arbor, Mich. With regard to the work in the great mission fields in 1914, the following number of converts was reported from the more important missions operative in the countries named:

Continental Europe.....	6,917	563,167

J. B. R., Rushford, Minn. The suffering of the soldiers in the Crimean War first directed the world's attention to the systematic care of the wounded. In 1859, when M. Henri Dunant was visiting Italy, he was caught in the dreadful carnage of the Battle of Solferino. He ministered to the wounded, and organized volunteers in the vicinity to help him in the work. Soon after, he formulated the first proposal for volunteer associations to care for the wounded. His appeal resulted in a conference held at Geneva in 1863 and an international conference in the same city in 1864. The Geneva Convention was the formal beginning of the Red Cross, the name being derived from the insignia adopted by the Conference, a Greek cross in red on white ground. The American association of the Red Cross was organized by Clara Barton in 1881. The flag of Switzerland with the colors counterchanged was adopted as the flag of the Red Cross Society. The religious significance of the Red Cross flag is connected with the Cross of Christ.

Mrs. A. A. M., Clear Spring, Md. We cannot understand why the price of the Christian Herald yearly subscription had to be advanced to $2 to meet additional expenses, while you propose to send it for two years for $3, or at the old rate of $1.50 a year. Please kindly explain in the Mail-Bag.

In order to secure the volume of advertising necessary to make possible the Christian Herald which you know, in order that you may have beautiful covers, abundant illustrations, intensely interesting fiction, and the full story of the secular and religious life of the world which comes to you each week in the Christian Herald, it is necessary to maintain a certain total of subscriptions. While a large percentage of the Christian Herald family renew regularly and loyally, there is in the Christian Herald circulation, as in that of every other periodical, a certain percentage of subscribers who must be sent circular after circular, notice after notice, before they renew; and, as with other publications, there are always some who do not renew. It is, therefore, necessary to keep constantly at work for new subscribers. Getting these subscriptions costs a certain amount and the work of entering new subscriptions and renewals is expensive. Each year we receive hundreds of thousands of subscriptions. It means a real saving to us, therefore, to enter your subscription for two years instead of one, as we avoid thus the exchange of correspondence and the expense of reentering the renewal again next year. The two-year subscription offer for $3 is most popular with our subscribers, and we appreciate the confidence implied to these long-term subscriptions.

Marion Harland's Corner

(In this opening article, the best known and most competent authority on Household Problems invites the cooperation of Christian Herald housewives. She will answer all letters on the subject of this Department.)

A SHREWD student of the times in which we live has asserted that "cook-books written even a dozen years ago will be found useless and misleading by the housewife of today. Materials, quantities and qualities have changed utterly. The most experienced cook must learn methods and ingredients over again, as if she were a novice in her profession."

Yet I dare begin this series of practical conferences with my fellow learners in the New School with a quotation from the Familiar Talk which formed the preface of the first cook-book written by myself forty-odd years ago.

I should not deserve to be your confidante if I did not know for myself how often you are heart-weary with discouragement; with much producing of ways and means; with a certain despondent looking forward to the monotonous grind of the household machine; to the certainty, proved by past experience, that, toilsome as has been this day, the morrow will prove yet more abundant in labors and in trials of strength and nerves and temper. How, try as you may to be systematic and diligent, something is always "turning up" in the treadmill to keep you on the strain.

How true the words were then has been abundantly proved by the grateful testimony of many thousands of readers who have talked with and written to me on this subject. If the counsel and sympathy embodied in the Talk were needed then, they are tenfold more timely now. While I affirm that the general principles of practical cookery—such as measuring, mixing, baking, boiling, etc.—laid down in the manuals of housewifery we studied with advantage fifty years ago, remain substantially the same, it would be a waste of time and space for me to explain the radical and perplexing changes that beset us today in the way of restrictions and the introduction of novel materials.

Each of us knows by actual and present experience the problems which confront us daily and hourly in well-ordered households that seemed to "run themselves" in what we sigh over as the "good old times before the War." Already "old"—although it was but four years ago that we sat in peace under our own vines and fig-trees, and paid equitable prices for the comforts of life.

THE awful shadow of the Great Tribulation oppresses the heart and spirits of every citizen of our whilom happy and prosperous country, from the President down to the street-cleaner. There are no exceptions in any class. The burden laid upon the average housemother is not a light one. Every article of food has trebled or quadrupled in price, and there is very little, if any, larger allowance of ready money in her hands for household expenses. In many homes the income has even diminished. As if these circumstances were not enough to make marketing and catering a grievous study, limitations are laid upon the purchase of what she has been accustomed all her life to regard as the necessities of decent livelihood. She will tell you plaintively that she is "willing to do without luxuries. She can understand that one must put up with plainer fare when there is so much suffering at home and abroad. But it is a difficult problem when she finds prescribed for her just how much meat and flour and sugar she may buy at one time. She wonders how she is to train her boys to fill the places left vacant in the ranks of soldiers now in the field, if growing lads are denied enough "hearty" foods to make bone and muscles."

Marion Harland

It is my earnest desire and hope, in opening this series of familiar and friendly talks with such sufferers, to help solve their problems—not to ignore or make light of them.

WE women of America are as certainly fighting the battle of Armageddon as if we were under arms in the trenches. The irksome self-denials we practice are none of them purposeless. When we abstain from red meats on certain days, or satisfy ourselves with half the quantity we used to eat, and submit meekly to the grocer's refusal to sell us a pound of flour unless we buy at the same time a cereal of some kind—we feed fighting men and starving, naked orphans overseas. We would reckon no privation as intolerable, if the soldier or orphan were brought to our door to plead for victuals and raiment. When we rack our brains to feed our own home brood with "food convenient" (that is, nourishing) for them, by the clever substitution of Indian meal for flour, and vegetables for flesh-food; when we produce as satisfactory results with half a pound of sugar as we were wont to do by the use of twice as much; when instead of buying butter at the iniquitous prices now demanded for it, we make diligent inquiry of judicious friends who have found one of the dozen "substitutes" now in the market every whit as palatable and nourishing as the real thing made from the milk of the cow—in each and every one of these actions you are serving your country and humanity.

NOW let us take counsel together as to what aid our Common Sense Corner can render to the great cause we have in hand. I know the hearts of American women too well to have any misgivings as to the cooperation I count upon from you. It is my purpose to lay before you, from week to week, matter that will put you into possession of interesting material supplied by the department of the government which has charge of the Administration of Foods. But you can render important aid to fellow housewives by writing freely to me of your several experiments, your successes and failures, and asking advice upon points that perplex you. Write briefly and frankly, addressing me in care of the Christian Herald. Should you desire a personal reply by mail, enclose a stamped and self-addressed envelope. I trust, however, that inquiries and information will be for the general good. Let the motto of our Corner be:

"To do good and to communicate forget not."

Life is too short and the times are too stringent to warrant anybody in keeping for her own use a bit that may ease a strap or buckle in another's ill-fitting harness. In the great scheme of God's universe there is nothing insignificant. Glorify everyday tasks into duties done in Christ's name. Rest assured of the sublime truth that

In just that very place of his
Where he hath made and keepeth you,
God hath no other work to do.

"Communicate" to us your helps and your hindrances under the new order that rules your housekeeping plans. We are one in the affliction—for in many instances it is nothing less. Almost a half-century of work done for and with you have made me sure of my "constituency."

MARION HARLAND.

Jesus Sets New Standards of Living

International Sunday School Lesson for May 5. Mark 10: 1-31

The Peril of Riches

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph.D.

THAT'S what Jesus does—he sets new standards of living, higher, more challenging in spiritual power, more alluring in their moral purity. He gives new inspiration to those who are sacrificially seeking the best, and of course he brings a corresponding sense of rebuke and moral failure to those who deliberately make the Great Refusal. The honest man who confronts the Master has come to a parting of the ways—henceforth he will be better or worse. For he will plainly see a standard that calls for all that he has and all that he is. If he reaches out toward it, he reaches higher ground than he knew before. If he rejects it his soul will not soon know happiness again.

The rich young ruler of our story is a most attractive personality—bold, frank and ingenuous. He was not one to be intimidated by the rising tide of hostility to Jesus, not even to the extent of coming to him by night like that other noble inquirer. He hastens to him openly, eagerly, on the highway, and did not hesitate to kneel in recognition of character that moved his soul within him. He had still the hero-worship of youth, and cared not who should know that he paid homage to this Man. And how naive he was with his quick reply, "All these I have kept from my youth up!" Why, certainly he had left the Ten Commandments far behind, and was pressing on!

We have many such straightforward, clean, manly youths in our America, in the schools, in offices and factories, in the army and navy. As I go about among the class I speak of, I feel we need not be so mawkishly concerned about this group as some people seem to be. Yet, like Jesus our Lord, we can and do care most tremendously that these choice young men should both seek and find the best.

Therefore we must have the searching message of the Christ brought to bear somehow upon these eager and impressionable souls. Thank God, there are many men serving in the Christian Associations who know how to do it, and hundreds of ministers who, if given any sort of chance, will bring them face to face with Jesus in the way. Our boys are looking for the "great adventure," and nothing is too high or too hard for them. Rightly presented Christ's challenge to a life given for God and humanity will seem to them the very thing for which they were longing, as they sought for light concerning their destiny.

The Quest of Righteousness

The quest of happiness is not more universal than that of righteousness. It is strange that the drama and literature so often fail to realize this. That is why religion has a more inclusive appeal than either. Man's spiritual nature always and everywhere in normal and healthy minds hungers and thirsts for righteousness. Not only among ancient Jews, whether as fine as Abraham or as faulty as Jacob, and not only in the mystic East with its cults and customs, but among the moderns, like Luther trying vainly every precept of the fathers, and America with her scores of sects, we find man still the seeker after the Eternal Goodness. Not the youth of Judea only, but the young manhood of all the earth asks, "What is the way that is the way of life?" and "What shall I do that I may inherit eternal life?"

Almighty God cares about this. When Jesus saw this young man's unsatisfied soul he was profoundly moved, even as he was later when Philip transmitted the request of the Greeks, "Sir, we would see Jesus."

It is in response to this heart hunger for righteousness that God has revealed the moral principles of life. They have their most classic form in the great prophets of Israel, but the sages and prophets of all lands have pointed out the same fundamentals of right and wrong in human desires and relationships. The best brief epitome is found in the Ten Commandments of Moses. Jesus used them freely, as in the present case, where he left out several and added "Do not defraud." He summarized them in a fashion that shall never be forgotten as being based on love to God and love to one's neighbor as himself.

The way of the commandments is the way of obedience and scrupulousness and morality. It is a way in which the feet of little children may be set, and their pathway rightly directed for life. It is a hard way, too, since the temptations of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life assert themselves in the body and mind of youth. It is a high way, and the man who can say, as did this young Jew, "All these I have kept from my youth," is a reliable employee and a comfortable neighbor to have. It is an elevating way, because those who have been most successful therein have nearly always been, like this man, and Paul as well, most conscious of lacking "something more."

It is not the highest way. Jesus showed him a more excellent way. It phrases itself inevitably in terms of renunciation, and yet it is more thoroughly positive than the way of Moses. "This do, and thou shalt live." The way of the commandments is far more largely, "These things do not, and thou shalt live." And yet Jesus' way speaks of giving all, of denying one's self, of taking up the cross. Jesus' way presumes the foundation of Moses and the prophets. They exhort a man not to harm his neighbor, Jesus urges doing him all possible good, in this case giving away all one has. They teach gratitude toward neighbors, he love to enemies. They inculcate just dealing, he sacrificial service and generous devotion. They suggest setting apart the tenth, Jesus says there are occasions that call for giving up all. And his spirit calls for complete dedication and self-surrender.

Not often does he call for parting with one's goods immediately as here. That was due to special circumstance, but he insists on the spirit and readiness so to do. His religion is not to be found in the realm of metaphysics and theology merely, but in the realm of social life, of business and family life and citizenship. He does not always bring the challenge just as he brought it to this man of great possessions, but ere long he brings it to each seeker as practically and as critically as here.

More often than abstract theorists realize, the field of money and goods is the storm center where lives are spiritually made or wrecked beyond repair. How frequent are Christ's references to the problem of wealth and of labor! Is there any single topic upon which he has more to say? He speaks more frequently of the use and the abuse of money than of regeneration, or any other doctrine in the abstract.

But although he says so much on this theme, it is false exegesis to claim him for any particular school of economics. Not economics but man's spiritual welfare was his point of departure. As he looked on that choice young man, he realized the danger of his becoming a Dives, consumed with selfishness and caring nothing for Lazarus lying in misery at his very door. The snares of life for this man lay in ease and selfishness and spiritual pride. Nothing would serve his highest nature better than to forsake his riches, and to fellowship with the humble Teacher who had not where to lay his head. So Jesus, the great Physician, diagnosed this case, and the event proved his insight. The young man loved his money more than he loved Christ. He deliberately rejected the unspeakable privilege which we now know would have followed his renunciation. Does not the application come home to our hearts that communion and privilege always wait upon renunciation?

Form-a-Truck

Made for All Cars

Consider Your Present Delivery System —Then Think of these Facts:

In Boston, New York, Chicago, Kansas City, Denver and San Francisco alone there are more than 10,000 "traded-in" cars lying idle in garages and warehouses.

The market value of each of these used cars was determined by their age. Their value depreciated 40% the first year, and 20% each succeeding year.

These cars average 30 horse power each, or a total of 300,000 horse power—all utterly wasted—an economic loss to the nation as a whole. And this in these six cities alone. What can be the amount of wasted horse power for the entire country?

Smith Form-a-Truck would make sturdy dependable motor trucks of all these cars. This is proven by the fact that there are more than 35,000 satisfied SMITH users.

Adventures in Neighboring

A Department for the Exchange of Experiences Between All Who Have High Community Ideals and Are Putting Them into Practice

Conducted by VERA L. CONNOLLY

TODAY'S meeting, fellow Adventurers, will be rather an earnest one. For I should like to bring to your attention a bit of news vitally important to all of us who live in farm communities.

The matter is this: a temporary solution of the labor-shortage problem has been hit upon, tested and perfected; and it is now being carried out under the auspices of "The Woman's Land Army of America": a new patriotic organization with headquarters at 32 Fifth Avenue, New York, and branches in every state and county.

This organization is now enrolling (in each state and county) all woman and girl applicants for farm labor, seeing that they measure up to requirements, forming them into "units" with a chaperone-housekeeper to each unit, and sending a unit of the desired size (4 to 70 workers) to every farm community from which a request comes in.

Each unit thus sent houses, equips and maintains itself. Frequently it camps.

The farmers may employ these workers by the hour, day, or piece work: the unit assuming losses due to rainy weather.

"But," you may protest, "it is unbelievable that untrained women and girls, many of them from city life, could possibly make good at farm labor!"

I went through that phase of doubt, myself. And so I investigated. Here are the facts:

NOW in England there are 258,000 farmerettes on the land. While right here in the United States, last summer, units of young American women, composed chiefly of city-bred college students—although in addition, there were dressmakers, clerks, teachers, artists and so on—worked on farms at Newburgh, Poughkeepsie and Mount Kisco, New York, and at Mahwah, New Jersey, doing every sort of farmwork, including ploughing, harrowing, planting and transplanting, cultivating, thinning, weeding, hoeing, potato planting, fruit picking and assorting and packing for market, mowing, both with scythe and mowing machine, hay raking and pitching, reaping, shocking grain, fence-making, milking; the stronger women doing the heavier work, the others being given work requiring deftness and speed.

Not one girl of all these failed to make good!

So much for the farmers' side of the question. What about the workers' side?

In reply to that, let me describe for you an interview I had with one of these plucky young pioneers, a Miss G., the niece of a prominent New York clergyman, who obligingly called at the Christian Herald offices.

My first impression, as Miss G. came walking into the office, tall, straight as a young tree, with glowing skin and clear, steady brown eyes, was that here was the most gloriously healthy creature I had ever seen. There was an air of quiet power about her, too; of dignity and good breeding.

It seemed incredible that this correctly-garbed young city woman had ever worn overalls and worked eight hours a day for a whole summer at back-breaking farm-labor.

"Did we like it?" she echoed, as I questioned her. "We loved it! I'm going out again this summer."

"Wasn't it pretty hard?"

"Yes, at first. The day seemed long; and we had backaches and blisters. But—we soon got hardened. And then we began to enjoy it. We'd come home from a day's work dead tired; take a plunge, have a good dinner, and be ready for fun all evening."

"Then you advise other girls to try farmeretting?"

"I do!" she urged earnestly. "It's not only interesting, and good for you, but you know you're helping to win the war. And that's what counts!"

With a smile—just a friendly flash of white teeth in a sun-tanned young face—she rose and hurried away. And it seemed to me the very breath of outdoors went with her.

Dear Adventurers, do help me spread the news of the existence of this army, so that the young women of your community may enlist when vacation days come; and so that the farmers of your region may be encouraged to plant extensively, knowing that at any time by writing to the Woman's Land Army, they will be able to procure the farm labor they require. There is a very noble "neighboring job" for you!

NOW, fellow Adventurers, turning away from serious matters for a moment, let us go a-neighboring on the prairies with this plucky, happy-go-lucky young homesteader.

A Stovepipe Adventure

Some of the neighbors who watched my cabin being built on the lonely quarter-section which I proposed to make good on all by myself, were jealous because I had two chimneys and one of them was of brick. The one that was not of brick was in the eight-by-eight kitchen—a pipe pointing thinly to the sky and securely wired to the roof.

The extravagance of these chimney arrangements lay in the fact that I could not cook on my little heater and I could not heat with my kitchen cooker.

As time passed, winds and rain did their work on the slim little kitchen pipe, and it began to have a threatening slant which should have warned me that some day, when the weather was wild, away would go the pipe and then—no more cooking until help arrived!

My nearest neighbor was almost a mile away: a mother with two little children and a husband who was far from well. They were having a terrible struggle on the homestead, and should have been forgiven for any seeming slight to neighbors' troubles.

One Sunday morning, however, I lighted my kitchen fire, and—wished I had not, for the smoke filled the place and I had to take the wood out of the stove. I ran out to look, and sure enough, my smokestack was gone across the plains!

About an hour after this discovery, glancing out of my window, I saw a little procession coming along the gumbo: my friend's husband with a baby on his shoulder and one end of a ladder supported by his free hand; at the other end of the ladder, my friend, and trotting by her side the little son, carrying a bundle that appeared to be about all his baby strength could manage. In my friend's free hand was a length of pipe!

"We have looked at your smokestack every morning," she said, "to see if it was all right, and this morning it was gone. The horses are so tired and so thin, we did not want to break their day of rest, so we came this way to fix up the pipe."

The little lad of six was lugging along hammer, pliers, staples and wire: all fastened together.

I should have laughed, but my laughter was wet with tears! Such sweet neighboring was an adventure that would melt selfishness and indifference out of the receiver's heart, no matter how hardened it might be. When I tried to thank them, they stared at me.

"What else would you have us do?" they exclaimed. "Ain't you our neighbor?"

And never shall I wear a sweeter name than that!

MRS. ADA MELVILLE SHAW.

Doesn't that little true story, dear neighbors, tug at your heartstrings and fill you with love for your fellow-beings! Ah, I am sure it does!

AND now we must hurry on to our next adventure: again a Western one, but this time an instance of neighboring on the part of a whole valley:

Adopting a Family

In this letter I shall try to tell you how our club of rural women, assisted by the whole community, performed an act of neighborly service.

Our club consists of about forty members, and our dues are a dollar a year: so we have between thirty and forty dollars in our treasury each year.

Two winters ago, the mother of one of our less fortunate families needed the care of a specialist. We found a place where she could have medical attention and board, free of cost: the only expenses being her carfare and medicines. We sent her off, and then adopted the family: a father and three young children, for the winter. In order to buy the children

The sense of security — Yale

The house that confronts the world with the trade-mark "Yale" on its locks and hardware, is the house that gives to its occupants the real sense of security. They know they are protected and guarded better.

Yale locks and builders' hardware have a definite duty in the world. And Yale locks and builders' hardware have been living up to that duty for half a century—to safe-guard and secure.

And the trade-mark "Yale" on them is a visible outward evidence that the product bearing it represents the inside superior quality that comes from material fineness, designing skill, real artisanship, years long experience and highest manufacturing practice.

See that trade-mark "Yale" if you want Yale security. You can't get it unless you do see it on Night Latches, Padlocks, Door Closers, Cabinet Locks, Builders' Hardware and Chain Blocks.

shoes and overshoes, a tax of twenty-five cents was levied on each club member. In addition, donations of new or made-over garments were solicited; and the whole valley gave freely, with the result that the children were clothed better than ever before in their lives.

Then we gave a benefit entertainment at our town hall, clearing sixty-five dollars. Aided by donations of food from different families, this sixty-five dollars paid the mother's expenses and the family's grocery bill during the winter.

Mrs. THOS. E. BELL.

That adventure is one of the finest that has ever come to my desk. All honor to that dear neighbor and her valley!

HERE is a homey, practical little adventure of another type. I think many of us will want to try this one out.

A Rural Exchange

Living in a strictly rural section, where time is money and but few are educated to do anything except the ordinary work at home, still we women folks found a need of "pin money" without a way of earning it.

So we started the plan of exchanging (selling), between ourselves, our services or our home-made products.

For instance, one lady who has an evaporator does evaporating for herself and her neighbors, handling corn, peaches and apples. Another cans strained honey for sale. Another grows cucumbers for pickle. Another makes a good "sweet clover" ointment and a "sticking salve." Still another cuts out patterns of children's garments, and another writes booklets of choice recipes. On every product thus prepared for sale, is a label containing the maker's name and the price of the article.

On a certain day in the fall all these neighbors come together and sell or exchange their products. This "Exchange," as it is called, takes place in a school building, and one of the neighbors nearby cares for all the small children, so as to give the mothers a "free day." The mothers enjoy this Exchange more than a fair or circus! Each one goes home cheered, encouraged, and financially better off.

Besides the few things I mentioned, many others are exchanged: lop pillows, to give to invalids as Christmas gifts; pine pillows made from pine needles gathered by the children and articles too numerous to mention. Now what better kind of neighborly could there be than that!

Mrs. HATTIE J. HALL.

Which brings us, dear neighbors, to a beautiful, spiritual adventure in neighborly sent in by a brother neighbor of ours who is now in his ninety-sixth year.

THERE is a wonderful lesson in this noble little letter. And there is inspiration, too. Read it, and see if you don't feel better—manlier or womanlier—for having peeped into this dear old minister's heart!

Taking Comfort to the Neighbors

I am an itinerant Methodist preacher on the reserve list. When I retired we settled in a suburban village near a city. Everything was new. There was no church organization there. The people were scattered. There were a few of each denomination. I was at a loss to know how to help. I instituted a preaching service at the schoolhouse and brought preachers from the city. Only a few people would attend.

But finally, our neighbors began to pass away by death. That opened a way to help. The first to die was the son of a Catholic family. I wrote to the father and mother and received a very cordial reply, with thanks for my sympathy and counsel. Some time after, the father died, and I wrote again to them. Again it was deeply appreciated.

When the wife of a prominent citizen suddenly passed away, I wrote to him, and received sincere thanks from the son and his wife. Last spring the only daughter of another neighbor died. I called, the day before the funeral, to show my sympathy. I felt their loss deeply and proposed to the mother that I pray with her. "Not today," she said; "but to-morrow at the funeral." So I made the opening prayer, at the pastor's request, and was most earnestly thanked.

The result of my neighborly? More love, confidence and real neighborly feeling than could otherwise have been, between us all.

Rev. H. C. NORRIS.

Until a fortnight hence, fellow members of The American Community Club, I give you greetings! And I wish you a May Day fragrant with the breath of spring flowers and merry with the ring of children's laughter.

Shame on the man who says, "The woman tempted me." Chances are that his backbone is out of plumb.

How to heat a church

A new system, cheaper to begin with and costs less to operate

A CHURCH is the most extravagant, wasteful building in town to heat.

One room in use; others silent, and unused. Wasteful low fire, wasteful forced draft, wasteful banked fire! Simply operating the furnace the worst way possible nearly all the week!

The trouble is that no furnace is built to heat different parts of a building intermittently.

When the trustees are hard-headed business men, they see that a furnace, expressly planned to supply heat constantly and evenly, day and night, cannot be operated intermittently and jerkily, without fearful waste. Therefore they demand a radically different type for heating their church.

The Grinnell Ready-Heat System uses gas in self-regulating and self-ventilating radiators.

Grinnell Ready-Heat turns itself on only in the room or rooms to be used. By thermostatic control it heats the room quickly to any desired temperature and holds it there, without any further attention.

MARK THIS: Grinnell Ready-Heat is not like any other form of gas-heating. As a matter of fact, it is most hygienic of any form of heating, because all the products of combustion are drawn into a central flue and carried away. The pastor's residence, church-house, etc., at a distance, can be connected to the same duct.

Its ease of operation, its cleanliness, the fact it releases basements for other uses than the storage of coal and ashes, makes it an ideal system for many business-buildings and residences.

A net saving

1. Grinnell Ready-Heat is cheaper to install because expensive boilers and furnaces are not required.

2. Cheaper to operate since even an unskilled person can run the system; no ashes to dispose of.

3. Gas bills are generally less than coal bills.

Let our experts submit you a heating-plan. Write for booklet and give us kind and size of your present heating system, size of building, with full information as to number of hours per week the different rooms are used.

Young People's Topics for May 5

Progressive Christians

Epworth League Topic. Heb. 5:12, 6:1; 11 Peter 1:1-11

A GREAT many people live the rest of their Christian lives in the moment of conversion. They know the exact minute, hour and day on which the Lord spoke peace to their souls. Some of them even remember all the attending circumstances and will be found twenty years later telling what great things the Lord did for them on that one day so long ago. That is all very well. It is proper that we should have a real experience of religion, but a Christian life that means anything will not stop with the glory of conversion. It will add, day by day, those powers which growth in grace brings to the loyal heart. If our lives are to be multiplied in the lives of others we must be strong in the Lord and able to communicate to others the faith of our own hearts. Peter, in the references for this lesson, outlines a complete course in Christian growth.

If to our faith we can make the progressive additions outlined by the apostle, we will not only be too busy in well-doing to mar our Christian influence with pettiness, or gossip, or unkind acts, but we will find ourselves achieving a power for Christ such as we have envied in others in the early days of our Christian life.

Christian Duty and Privilege. V. Conduct in the Home and School

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topic. Eph. 6:1-9; Mark 5:5-19

MANY a person who has a reputation for good nature abroad fails to carry that reputation across the threshold of his own home. Many a home, nominally Christian, is full of contention, parents nagging their children, the children yielding ungraciously to the requests of those whose wish should be their pleasure, the servants, if any, coming under the same spell and leaving at more or less regular intervals, and even the dogs and cats meeting newcomers with an air of suspicion. It is hard for such a home to send into the world those who shall convince sinners that they need Christ. But there are other homes, the very entrance into which is a benediction, where soft-voiced parents have but to request and younger feet and hands are swift to reply; where servants stay on and on and household pets partake of the general good nature. From such homes have gone forth strong men and women who have led the world upward, who have made the spirit of Christ visible to the lives about them. It is the duty of all who name the name of Christ, to meet others with consideration, need with helpfulness, sharp words with kindness, and contention with patience. It is the privilege of Christians at home and in school to exemplify in their own lives that spirit of love and service which made Jesus of Nazareth, the Great Teacher, loved of thousands in his ministry, and which was especially characteristic of His mission as the Saviour of mankind.

Willard Threaded Rubber Insulation

Bone-Dry!

Our Service Sta-

Another Exclusive Advantage of Threaded Rubber Insulation

Thus for the first time has been realized what has been the dream of engineers since the infancy of electric starting and lighting.

When you buy a Still Better Willard with Threaded Rubber Insulation—you know it's brand new because it is made and shipped to the Service Station BONE-DRY.

Not a drop of acid touches it till it is ready for immediate service. The battery solution is put into it, and the battery fully charged, just before it goes on the car.

The reason that this is the only type of storage battery which can be and is shipped bone-dry is because it has Willard Threaded Rubber Insulation between the plates.

In addition it is the one automobile starting and lighting battery with the advantages of complete protection to the life of the plates through a hard rubber insulation that neither lessens voltage nor increases the size and weight of the battery. It is a brand new battery when you get it and a better battery as long as you have it.

When in service on your car, however, it must be filled with distilled water at regular intervals, like any other battery.

You owe it to yourself to learn all about this remarkable Willard improvement in battery quality. It costs a little more, but the slightly higher price is far offset by the assurance of dependable starting and lighting.

Go to the Willard Service Station and let them tell you all about it. Meantime, write Willard Storage Battery Company, Cleveland, for an interesting free book, "The Story of 196,000 Little Threads."

Low Cost Cooking
Thorough rapid cooking and baking at much lower cost than with either gas, coal or wood, make Detroit Vapor Stoves a perfect answer to the national demand for economy in food and fuel.

Wickless Burners
They are like gas stoves in construction. No wicks or wick substitutes are used. Durable iron burners vaporize the oil so that they burn a gas instead of a liquid fuel, giving an intensely hot blue flame that can be regulated to any requirement.
The kettles go on as soon as the match is struck. Double walled ovens distribute the heat and use it twice.

The National Food Administration considers the use of oil cookstoves a very important help in the necessary conservation of coal for war purposes.

Over the Bargain Counter

Webster defines a bargain as "an advantageous purchase." Under that definition anything you buy through the advertising columns of CHRISTIAN HERALD is a bargain, and CHRISTIAN HERALD itself may be likened to a bargain counter, piled high with all kinds of worthy merchandise.

Any of these articles are an advantageous purchase for you because they are wholly reliable, sure to satisfy.

Value counter would be an apter designation for CHRISTIAN HERALD because whatever merchandise changes hands here is a good value—worth its price. No other kind is ever displayed on this counter or permitted to be placed here.

The simple fact that a thing appears here is sufficient recommendation of its worth—instantly stamps it "an advantageous purchase."

CHRISTIAN HERALD

Following Others

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

MY manuscript basket today held a tiny article by Susie A. Mathis of Memphis, Tennessee. Mrs. Mathis drives an automobile, and she has used it as an example to teach a lesson and to point a moral. I am going to quote her article in full:

"The storage battery on my car needed recharging and my lights were well-nigh out. So dim were they that in the glare of the hundreds I was meeting, I could hardly detect the roadside and almost ran, several times, into the wood that grew close to the road. Suddenly a car going my way crashed by at a dangerous rate of speed, but the temptation to keep up and follow its rear light overcame me, and I opened my throttle and pursued. On we went at this mad gait, bouncing over rocks, car tracks and tiny gullies—treacherous enough perhaps to break an axle—for any or all of which I would have slowed down carefully or avoided them altogether, had I been choosing my own way.

"About a half a mile of such experience brought me to my senses, and I resumed my usual speed, trusting that by going slowly I would get safely home.

"How prone we are to follow others! Especially if they move rapidly!

"They have bright lights, they are attractive and move with such velocity that we find neither the time nor the place to ask, 'Where are you going?' It is usually the bumps that bring us to our senses.

"Keep your moral storage batteries charged and follow your own light!"

MARIAN ELLIS went to school with me. She was a sweet little girl with big, trusting blue eyes and a mass of fluffy hair—the type of girl that one feels like protecting from the great world and its disillusionments. Her voice was never raised in contradiction, her pleasant little smile was never dimmed by a shadow of wilfulness. She was always ready to resign her amusements in favor of ours—she was always ready to play her games in our way, even when her way was the better one!

Naturally she was rather popular with our childishly domineering set, for what child doesn't like to have his own way? I remember confiding one day to my Favorite Teacher that I liked Marian better than any of the other girls.

"Just what, I wonder," questioned my Favorite Teacher musingly, "is her chief charm?"

"She's so—sweet!" I answered, rather limply.

"Just what do you mean," continued my Favorite Teacher, "by 'sweet'?"

"I mean," I tried to explain, "that we all like her 'cause she always does things our way. 'Cause she never fusses when we cross her. 'Cause she never has any special thing she likes best. She always seems glad to do what we want her to, even when it's something that gets her into a scrape, or tears her frock. That's what I mean!"

"Well,"—my Favorite Teacher leaned her firm chin on her capable hand—"that's all very nice, now, for Marian's friends: but—" And suddenly my Favorite Teacher seemed to have forgotten my presence—seemed to have forgotten that she wasn't talking to herself—"but it's going to be mighty hard for Marian herself, when she's older!"

I LOOKED at my Favorite Teacher wonderingly, and I felt, as I looked, the shattering of an ideal—for it seemed to me that my Favorite Teacher was lacking in judgment and good common sense. Marian was a comfort to all of us; why should the very characteristics that made her so pleasant react, later, to her disadvantage?

And yet, later, I found that my Favorite Teacher had been right. For Marian's lack of decision made everything very hard for her. When she grew out of short skirts and hanging-down hair, she did not grow out of her habit of depending on other people—and following where they led. Our town, while she was still very young, marked her with the stamp of its disapproval because she followed the most showy crowd—the flashy, dominating powers that half-compelled her to go in their way. She did many indiscreet things because she was not strong enough to follow her own weaker lights. A few of us who had always known her realized that it was not recklessness on Marian's part; that it was only lack of decision—the same lack of decision that had helped to make her such a charming child. But we could not make others realize what we understood.

Everybody knows a certain one of Aesop's fables about a man and a boy and a donkey. They know how people coming past and giving advice influenced the man and the boy, so that they first lost their personal comfort and then they lost their donkey into the bargain. And nobody, reading the fable, feels in the least sorry for them; because the reader understands that if they had had the strength of their convictions, they would not have come to grief.

WHEN your lights are dim, it's necessary to drive slowly if you want to get safely home. There will always be other lights flashing by at a reckless speed, which you may wish to follow; but if your own lights are too low to see by, it's rarely safe to follow another's lights. For another's lights, no matter how brightly they gleam through the darkness, may be a will-o-the-wisp that will eventually lure you away from the road into some wood, or swamp, or morass. And if you follow too fast in order to keep those other lights in sight, you may come to grief on the rough stretches of road that you would have avoided had you been following your own way. "It is usually the bumps," writes Mrs. Mathis, "that bring us to our senses!"

There will be bumps in every road of life—no matter through what pleasant places that road may lie. For no road can be absolutely smooth. But if you are careful, the bumps need have no unpleasant after-effects; they can be taken easily and made to serve as a lesson and a warning against other bumps to come. If you follow your own lights—lights of truth, and faith in yourself and others, and good common sense—you'll have small cause to worry. But if you follow other lights, striving pitifully the while to keep up with them, nearly anything may happen!

It's easy enough to follow a crowd—
Sheep do!
But I fancy a sheep would never care
Whether it got—well, anywhere;
I don't want to be a sheep myself—
Do you?

It's easy enough to follow a crowd.
But I
Would rather go in a worth-while way,
Making my path from day to day. . . .
It's easy 'as following others if You try!

How quickly could you stop?

Don't wait for an emergency to test your brakes

WHEN the unexpected happens can you count absolutely on your brakes? At the moment they are most needed will they act quickly, surely and safely?

They are out of sight and for that reason are frequently not given the attention which they demand. Yet on their efficiency depends your enjoyment and safety.

With so much depending on good brakes is it wise for you to neglect them?

A simple inspection by your garage man will tell you definitely if they are safe. Perhaps only a slight adjustment is necessary to make them dependable instead of doubtful.

If they do need relining you most certainly want to know it.

Endorsed by automobile manufacturers

The engineers of fifty-one leading manufacturers, ten axle makers, and countless jobbers and dealers have selected Thermoid Brake Lining because they know its dependability.

1. More material, greater service—There is over 40% more material and 60% more labor used in the manufacture of Thermoid Brake Lining than in any woven brake lining. This abundance of material and labor must mean longer wear.

2. Grapnalized—an exclusive process which creates resistance to moisture, oil and gasoline. Under ordinary conditions of service, Thermoid is impervious to any kind of moisture.

3. Hydraulic compressed, uniform throughout—Every square inch of Thermoid is hydraulic compressed at a pressure of 2,000 pounds.

Because of this Thermoid is uniform all the way through. It cannot compress in service. There are no soft spots to wear out. It must give uniform service until worn cardboard-thin.

The measure of Thermoid value

These three exclusive features form the measure of Thermoid value to the motorist—his assurance of longest, safest service at the lowest possible price.

Have your dealer inspect your brakes today. He will show you Thermoid Brake Lining that you may see why it is so different, so efficient and long wearing. If he hasn't Thermoid we will gladly send a sample.

Be sure to accept no substitute, our guarantee protects you. Thermoid will make good—or WE WILL. It is positively guaranteed to outwear and give more satisfactory service than any other brake lining.

Brake Inspection Movement

Prominent officials, leading clubs and organizations and motorists everywhere have endorsed this big national movement to reduce automobile accidents, by having all brakes inspected before the touring season begins, and regularly thereafter. Give it your support.

Will your car do this?

Automobile engineers have proved that when brake mechanism is right and road conditions average, any car should stop at distances and speeds given by the chart. V^2 means the square of the velocity or speed of your car; 10.8 is the proved factor of retardation under average road conditions. This factor decreases on smooth, slippery roads to 6.7 and increases as high as 17.1 on rough, worn roads. The chart represents the average condition, and other conditions can readily be figured by changing the factor within the given limits. Remember that your brake mechanism is not "right" unless its brake lining has the ideal coefficient of friction. The better the brake lining the quicker your stop.

"Surely Sober Second Thought Will Prevent Any Such Blunder"

—Woodrow Wilson.

THE Christian Herald believes that the new zone system of second class postage regulations will be harmful not only to American publishers but to all American business, including the supreme business of making war in the most vigorous and the shortest manner. It is a dangerous experiment to increase the mailing costs of American publications at the very time when the production of American publications should be encouraged and not discouraged.

Every dollar that the Post Office Department can save by decreasing the postal facilities of the American periodicals will be faithfully reflected in the loss of hundreds of dollars to the Government in other ways.

Every decrease in the circulation and the influence of the national periodicals will be faithfully reflected in a decrease in the business activities, the business productivity, the taxable capacity and the solidarity of thought, ideal and purpose of the entire nation.

It is simply impossible to overestimate the greatness of the aid which the American press has given to the Government in the huge task of mobilizing the resources of the country, both military and economic. It is absolutely correct to say that without the help freely and enthusiastically given by the American press the Government could not have succeeded in floating the Liberty Loans, in selling the millions of War Savings Stamps or in putting in operation the machinery of food and fuel conservation.

WHEN the oppressor in 1774 desired to curb the growing spirit of independence and union among our colonial forefathers, he raised the postal rates on their newspapers and periodicals of that day to a prohibitive cost in order that they might not be able to come to a common understanding and purpose. This is the same kind of law—the most disastrous and destructive law ever passed in the history of postal legislation. Huge postage increases will destroy opportunities for periodical reading today just as certainly as it did in 1774, when the old royal and despotic authority deliberately raised postage rates for the purpose of destroying reading matter and its accessibility. Now, one hundred and forty-two years later, a Congress of the United States raises postage rates on newspapers and periodicals by increases of from 50 to 900 per cent. The logic of high cost is inevitable—reading will be decreased. The economic law that increased cost means decreased consumption is bound to work whether it is put in action by autocratic royalty or by the hasty thoughtlessness of our republic.

THE periodicals of national circulation are the great mediums for the exchange of public opinion on this great continent, for the creation of a national spirit, for the welding together of the thought and feeling of a widely diversified population scattered from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Only by the instrumentality of such publications is the creation and the crystallization of a national sentiment, a national ideal and a national aspiration possible.

The national periodicals have obliterated sectional differences of opinion and purpose. In the pages of the periodicals the peoples of the East and the West, the North and the South, find a complete exposition of the issues, of the events, of the vast and multiform life of the country as a whole.

In an interview given on the occasion of the former effort to increase radically the postal rate on the advertising sections of magazines, Woodrow Wilson, then Governor of New Jersey, was quoted as follows:

He Said:

"It must be that those who are proposing this change of rates [magazine postal rate increase] do not comprehend the effect it would have. A tax upon the business of the more widely circulated magazines and periodicals would be a tax upon their means of living and performing their functions.

"They obtain their circulation by their direct appeal to the popular thought. Their circulation attracts advertisers. Their advertisements enable them to pay their writers and to enlarge their enterprise and influence.

"This proposed new postal rate would be a direct tax, and a very serious one, upon the formation and expression of opinion—its more deliberate formation and expression just at a time when opinion is concerning itself actively and effectively with the deepest problems of our politics and our social life.

"To make such a change now, whatever its intentions in the minds of those who propose it, would be to attack and embarrass the free processes of opinion.

"Surely sober second thought will prevent any such mischievous blunder."

A Letter from 'You Will Help a Lot.

IF you believe it is unfair to lay a penalty upon people because they live at a distance from New York, why not assert that belief where it will do good?

If you believe in the right of every citizen to have his mail delivered at the same rate, why not say so in a way that will be effective?

If you believe that no sections [should] be discriminated against in the cost of their reading matter, why not use your influence?

Write to your Congressman and one or both Senators.

Do this now for your own sake and for the sake of keeping the national periodicals really national and keeping the nation solidified.

Your Postmaster will give you the names of your Congressmen and Senators. Simply write to them that you believe the zone system of second-class postage is wrong in principle and will be unjust in practice, and that Congress ought to reconsider the matter.

WE URGE YOU TO DO IT WITHOUT DELAY.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Now is to be crippled or destroyed this agency, this homogeneity, by making it impossible, through prohibitive zone rates, for the Eastern periodical to reach the West and for the Western periodical to reach the East.

We face the establishment of distinct zones of publication, distinct zones of thought, feeling, ideals and purposes.

We face the destruction of that great force which the periodicals have been creating—the forces of a united public opinion and crystallized national and moral sentiment.

IN our neighbor country, Canada, the Government has adopted an exactly opposite policy. That Government has fully realized the vital importance of the assistance given by the Canadian press, and by way of grateful acknowledgment has reduced the postage rate upon Canadian publications fifty per cent, during the period of the war.

Canadian second-class mail rates were formerly one-half cent per pound, while ours were one cent per pound, and this former rate of one-half cent per pound has been reduced by the Canadian Government to one-quarter cent per pound.

Nor are these rates limited to the boundaries of Canada. They apply to publications sent from Canada to any part of the British possessions. The Canadian publisher can mail his publication to England, to South Africa, to Australia or to India at the rate of one-quarter cent per pound.

In France the Government has so deeply realized the powerful assistance of the French press, and the necessity of maintaining this assistance, that it has actually gone abroad to purchase print paper with public money, and to transport this paper to France in order to help the French press to maintain its circulation.

The striking contrast between the policy of Canada and France, after three years in the war, and that of our own Government calls for careful consideration.

THE postal function is a service to the American citizen, and cost is not the basis of a postal rate, but the value of the service is. The postal function is sympathetic with and identical in principle with all other great Government functions, the Department of Agriculture, the Department of Commerce, of education in local functioning of school departments; for in none of these is the cost of service to any individual citizen made the basis of a rate to him. It is a national social service to be paid for as a whole, as a social necessity, and not individually. There is no more reason to expect a profit in the Post Office Department than in the Agricultural Department, although the Post Office Department did make an excess of $9,000,000 last year.

THE words of Woodrow Wilson are noteworthy. They might have been written yesterday, so apt is the description and so pointed and stinging is his indictment of the dull folly and destructiveness of this postal legislation.

"Surely sober second thought will prevent any such mischievous blunder."

Will you help to repeal this unjust and disastrous law?

Bring these facts to the attention of your church, your society or the organization to which you belong; adopt resolutions demanding the repeal of this destructive law.

TROCO

The Successor to Butter Made From the White Meat of Tropic Cocoanuts

WHILE European countries have long used butter made from cocoanuts, America has perfected the de luxe product. The flavor of Troco is only rivaled by the finest dairy product. The more critical you are the better you will appreciate the quality of Troco.

Your enjoyment of this new delicacy is increased by the thought of its appetizing ingredients. The fat from the same dainty white coconut meat you use shredded on cake and pure pasteurized milk is an appealing combination.

The fastidious care used in every process of making is another recommendation. The makers of Troco specialize in this one product.

High Nutritive Value

Troco, like butter, is invaluable energy food of the highest nutritive value. It is equally digestible and easily assimilated.

It is not a substitute for butter, but really butter's successor, solving the butter problem for millions.

Keeps its crisp, firm, sweetness perfectly during Summer weather. Just give it the same care you do butter.

Old laws, made before this great discovery, compel us to label it as an oleomargarine, but Troco contains no animal oils—and no preservatives—it is made only from vegetable fats and milk—wholesome, natural ingredients. A capsule of the same vegetable coloring used by butter makers supplied with every carton by your grocer.

Judge It for Quality Alone

Troco wins users on quality alone. You should judge it from this standpoint only. Compare it to the finest creamery butter you have ever used. Serve it without explanation. The unanimous verdict will be "Please pass the Troco."

What You Buy When You Buy Food

First, you buy calories—the unit of nutrition.

In Quaker Oats you get 1810 calories per pound. In meats, eggs, fish and chicken—averaged—you get 750 calories per pound. So Quaker Oats excels there by 141 per cent.

You buy body-building elements and minerals.

As a flesh builder Quaker Oats is almost the same as lean beef. In lime, phosphorus and iron it is vastly superior to beef.

You buy palate-pleasing qualities.

No other grain food which Nature gives us can match Quaker Oats in flavor.

And you consider—or should—the cost.

In Quaker Oats you get 1000 calories for five cents. In meats, eggs, fish and chicken—averaged—those 1000 calories cost 48 cents. That is almost ten times as much.

Those are the overwhelming reasons for using more Quaker Oats. Make it your basic food. Make it the entire breakfast. Mix it with your flour foods to add flavor and save wheat.

Quaker Oats

The Doubly-Delicious Flakes

Quaker Oats won its world-wide supremacy by its exquisite flavor. It is flaked from queen grains only—just the big, rich, luscious oats.

We get but ten pounds from a bushel.

That flavor makes oat foods doubly delightful. And it costs you no extra price. Get it.

Quaker Oats Bread

1½ cups Quaker Oats (uncooked)
2 teaspoons salt
2 cups boiling water
1 cake yeast
¼ cup lukewarm water
5 cups flour

Mix together Quaker Oats, salt and sugar. Pour over two cups of boiling water, let stand until lukewarm. Then add yeast which has been dissolved in ¼ cup lukewarm water, then add 5 cups of flour.

Knead slightly, set in a warm place, let rise until light (about 2 hours). Knead thoroughly, form into two loaves and put in pans. Let rise again and bake about 50 minutes. If dry yeast is used, a sponge should be made at night with the liquid, the yeast, and a part of the white flour.

This recipe makes two loaves.

Quaker Oats Sweetbits

1 cup sugar, 2 eggs, 2 teaspoons baking powder, 1 tablespoon butter, 1 teaspoon vanilla, 2½ cups uncooked Quaker Oats.

Cream butter and sugar. Add yolks of eggs. Add Quaker Oats to which baking powder has been added, and add vanilla. Beat whites of eggs stiff and add last. Drop on buttered tins with a teaspoon, but very few on each tin, as they spread. Bake in slow oven. Makes about 65 cookies.

Quaker Oats Muffins

¾ cup Quaker Oats, 1½ cups flour, 1 cup scalded milk, 1 egg, 4 level teaspoons baking powder, 2 tablespoons melted butter, ½ teaspoon salt, 3 tablespoons sugar.

Turn scalded milk on Quaker Oats, let stand five minutes; add sugar, salt and melted butter; sift in flour and baking powder, mix thoroughly and add egg well beaten. Bake in buttered gem pans.

THEY are building the wooden fleet along the Atlantic all the way from Sandy Point, Me., to Jacksonville, Fla., and along the Gulf of Mexico from Tampa to Port Aransas, in Texas, within a few miles of Mexico. They are building ships at forty different yards on the Pacific, beginning at Salmon bay, north of Seattle, and extending south to Wilmington, Cal., not far from Los Angeles. They are building them on the great lakes and on a half dozen rivers not far from the sea. In all there are more than one hundred shipyards making these vessels, and there is an army of more than 100,000 men who have been more or less trained in wooden shipbuilding engaged upon them. A considerable number of vessels have already been constructed, and by the 1st of next July I am told that 200 of the new wooden ships will have been put in the water, and a little later seventy will be carrying cargo abroad. By fall we should be launching one wooden vessel a day.

THE work of getting out the timber for the wooden ships has been largely handled by the big lumber and sawmill associations of the country. In the south the work has been done by the Southern Pine Emergency Bureau and other bureaus, and in the west by the West Coast Lumber Emergency Bureau, all organizations of which most of the mill owners are members. Mr. Lynde Palmer, the manager of the West Coast Lumber Emergency Bureau, tells me that something like 5,000,000,000 feet of fir will be cut in the states of Washington and Oregon this year, and that 10 or 15 per cent of this will be suitable for shipbuilding purposes. The orders of the eastern yards include 65,000,000 feet of large timbers, and among them about 7,000 pieces of spars and masts. Some of the masts are ninety feet long and about two feet in diameter. They are all hewn to an octagon shape in the woods before they are shipped. The West Coast Bureau had exported in the neighborhood of 50,000,000 feet by the first of April.

Four hundred and thirty-four ships have been contracted for. The aggregate tonnage of the wooden fleet will equal more shipping than was made by Great Britain in the year before she entered the war, or about four times as much as the United States was annually building prior to that time.

Submit Your Answers to the National Bible Picture Study, by May 31, 1918

PARTICIPANTS in the National Bible Picture Study may now submit their sets of verses, and all sets must be submitted by May 31, 1918. Sets mailed as late as that final date—May 31—will be accepted, even though we receive them much later; the postmark will show that they were mailed on time.

The following excerpt from the Rules gives the directions for submitting sets. Everyone must follow these directions:

"Participants may submit sets of answers after April 22, 1918, but not later than May 31, 1918—which is the last day for submitting answers. Sets of answers sent by mail must be mailed not later than May 31, 1918. Sets of answers sent by express must be delivered at the express office on or before May 31, 1918. Participants who present sets of answers at the Christian Herald office personally or by personal messenger must do so before 5 P.M. May 31, 1918."

Tell your postal clerk, when he weighs your set of answers, that it must go as first class mail, upon which the postage rate is now three cents for each ounce or fraction. One Answer Book, in a thin envelope or light wrapper, will require nine cents in stamps. If wrapper or envelope is at all heavy, the postage will be twelve cents or more.

Be sure your set of answers carries sufficient postage! And do not fold or roll your set of answers; wrap it up flat.

WHEN lace curtains come from the tub without needing first aid from needle and thread, it is almost certain that they have been washed with Ivory Soap.

The thick, lasting Ivory suds loosen the dirt so effectively that the curtains do not have to be rubbed on the board.

Ivory Soap itself is so pure and so free from uncombined alkali and all other harsh ingredients that it does not weaken a single thread.

Lace curtains can be washed repeatedly with Ivory Soap without showing any sign of wear from the washing. Its use makes for beauty and longer life in all delicate fabrics.

To Wash Lace Curtains

SHAKE and brush to remove the dust and soak in Ivory Soap suds over night. Work the curtains gently up and down in the suds and squeeze them between the hands to get the dirt out. Put them into clean warm suds and keep changing the water until the curtains are clean. Never wring curtains by hand; lay them on a strip of cloth and put carefully through the wringer. Rinse well in several waters, and put through hot, moderately thick starch. If the curtains are white, the starch should be blueed; if cream color, strong coffee should be added to it. Pin each point carefully to the drying frame and set in the air to dry. Two or three curtains may be dried at the same time on one frame. If you have no frame, lay clean sheets over the floor of an unused room, stretch the curtains into shape, square and true, and pin each point so that it will not slip. If points are out of shape when dry, they may be dampened with a cloth and ironed.

IT is now nearly a week since the "pilgrim ship" left its dock to carry the Palestine Commission of the Red Cross to the land of the halt, the maimed and the blind. It is plowing steadily onward through the sea, and as each day goes by one gets a very definite idea of the great purposes and the high ideals of those on board. Here are nearly sixty young men and women, bound in spirit like the Crusaders of old, to rescue the Holy Land from the terrible incubus that hangs upon it. And what an incubus it is, unhappiness, want, sickness, starvation, death, the whole gamut of human misery.

But these Crusaders, unlike those of old, are carrying not only the methods of civilization into this unfortunate country, but the power, the spirit, the knowledge and the enthusiasm to rejuvenate the country, not only in a spiritual but in a material aspect as well. There are missionaries returning to work from furloughs interrupted by the war. There are missionaries who have never been to the Holy Land before, but full of enthusiasm for the work. There are doctors full of the knowledge of modern medical discovery and eager to put it into practice among the disease-ridden people. There are nurses galore, ready to assist the medical men in helping the people back to health. There are men and women social workers who will go about the cities and the villages studying conditions, helping the people to immediate relief, and endeavoring to plan the best ways to bring about a betterment among the inhabitants and make it permanent. There are sanitary engineers who will plan necessary reforms in the sanitary condition of Palestine.

And down under us, in the hold, is an advance shipment of supplies to enable these earnest pilgrims in a great cause of health and prosperity to bring about the objects

On the Way to the Holy Land

The Red Cross Expedition and Its Purpose. The Pilgrim Ship and Its Passengers

By THEODORE WATERS

(The American Red Cross recently appointed a Commission to visit Jerusalem, and it is now "Somewhere on the Atlantic." A representative of the Christian Herald, Mr. Theodore Waters, is one of the active members of the Commission, and in the letter below he tells of the journey and the problems to be encountered. Christian Herald readers have always taken a deep interest in the Holy Land, which has been lately so wonderfully redeemed from Moslem rule, and toward which the eyes of Christians and Jews throughout the whole world are now turned with earnest expectation. During the coming months every successive step in connection with the Commission's work in Palestine will be described in Mr. Waters' correspondence, which will appear in these pages.)

of their desire. For instance, there is a rock-crusher, 4 concrete mixers, cement, metal piping and other equipment, to teach better methods of drainage. The 4 gas engines, 4 lighting plants, a hoisting engine, an ice-making machine, and 5 touring cars to enable the members of the Commission to move about the country rapidly. Down in the hold are 100 sewing machines which the women at the Holy Land will be taught to run. In the matter of money value the chief part of the cargo is the big supply of medicine. Other shipments will follow; for Palestine is no small place, and it will take a deal of work to make it whole again.

BUT on shipboard, the magnitude of the task in nowise disheartens those about to undertake it; not that they do not appreciate its extent, but their enthusiasm is unbounded and their faith is of the kind that moves mountains. But it is not all enthusiasm and faith on our stanch ship. Every hour of the day is full of work necessary in preparation for the greater work to come. It is a steady but interesting routine.

AT six in the morning, the picturesque, white costumed East Indian awakens us and bids us prepare for the first morning tea. Then the bath, followed by the morning drill for the men and women, and general calisthenics. It is somewhat strenuous, particularly for those unaccustomed to it; but it should make us hard as nails by the time we reach Palestine. At eight we breakfast, the meal being followed by morning service. At nine we take an hour's lesson in Arabic, the language of the Holy Land. At ten there is generally a lecture on Palestine. At twelve, dinner, the principal meal of the day, during which we talk to one another in such Arabic as we have acquired. At two-thirty there are lectures in French, followed perhaps by lectures on various phases of the work ahead. At five or five-thirty there is more drilling. At six, the evening meal followed by an evening of song or story. When the moon is up and the weather fine, the travelers love to gather on deck and tell their experiences, their aspirations and their hopes. It is then that we are able to see more clearly each other's characters, plumbing depths of earnestness that perhaps had been unsuspected. It is then that we obtain a truer insight into the ideals of these earnest workers in the uplift of the world. Some of the experiences of the missionaries who have worked in the Holy Land recall the terrible need of the poor people there for just such help as we can give them. Here is one which shows the awful depths of misery to which a people can sink.

"I remember," said the Rev. E. O. Jago, of the Christian and Missionary Alliance, seven years a missionary in Palestine, "when we were building the American Church in Jerusalem, Rev. Paul Joiner thought it would be a good idea to give a weekly meal to the lame, the halt, and the blind of the city. The church had been built to the second floor and it was decided to feed the people up there. Announcement was made, food was procured, and we awaited the day of the feast. At the hour fixed I was attracted by the noise of a gathering throng. I looked out of the door and I was appalled at the sight. Literally hundreds of miserable creatures were coming from all directions. Some of them were tapping their way along the street; some, who were blind, were feeling their way from post to post, or along the walls; some were down on the ground literally dragging their emaciated bodies along through the crowd. And such sounds, the cries of the famished!

"Upstairs was a big pot filled to the brim with boiling rice, presided over by some native workers. The mob squeezed and pushed its way upstairs, the more active first, the weaker next, the actually decrepit last, fighting, pushing, crying, cursing—Christians, Mohammedans, Jews. They surrounded the pot, crowding each other closer and closer to the steaming hot mess, till I thought they would thrust their hands into its smoking middle. The food was dealt out, they snatched at it, thrust it into their mouths, smeared their faces with it and licked their lips voraciously. It was all too little to satisfy their hunger. They ate it to the last morsel and went away grumbling and calling for more, some even hanging around until dark in hope more might be forthcoming. That was just before the war, in normal, prosperous times, as it were. What can it be now?"

MISS MARY BUTTERFIELD, of the same mission, spoke feelingly of the sufferings of children: "The little children are the ones who suffer most. I have heard them in front of our church, sobbing and wailing all day long for food. I have seen them picking dirty orange peels out of the muddy streets, while their elders passed by uttering the cry of the starving, 'Ya Rubbie Zhua' ni' (Oh God, I'm hungry). I have seen whole families down by the Jaffa Gate with hands extended begging for food. Mother, carrying infants but with empty breasts, crying and wailing were constantly to be seen. You could not go on the streets without having some one clutch at your sleeve and beg for something to eat. That was last year, and the condition was getting worse instead of better. As you say, what can it be today?"

"The conditions where I am stationed are quite as bad," said Rev. S. Edgar of the Reformed Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, "particularly among the Ainsaireh people, commonly called fellahen; and this is especially true concerning the women. The religion of this tribe is pagan and is a secret religion, and there is no place anywhere in it for the woman; that is, she is left entirely without any religion. This comes from their teaching, which says that woman is not a creation of God at all, but of the devil; therefore why educate her? why should she be given any education or care or help? In this theology of theirs, woman is nothing but a chattel, and they live this out in its fullness every day. The child life among this people is very little better than that of the women, especially for little girls. The great ideal seems to be among them to raise the girls and hasten the day when they can sell them to be wives, and this is the really crowning event in the life of any woman among the fellahen. Mortality among the children is very great. Children's diseases, such as measles and smallpox, sweep villages of the child-life. Having no doctors where the missionaries are not found, they are left to their own heathenish course of treatment, which means practically death.

"During the days of the mobilization of the Turkish army in the present war, the Turkish government commandeered all the grain belonging to these people, and their animals also, leaving them in starvation, no provision being made in any way to remunerate them. The famine has continued since the beginning of the war. No reports have been given out as to the real suffering among these people. In one of the large coast cities an American consul and missionary were told of seeing a woman carrying a baby in her arms in one of the villages of Palestine. The child's eyes were covered with flies, they hung from its eyes in two black masses. The missionary was horrified. "My God," he cried in the vernacular, "don't you see that those flies are eating the child's eyes out of its head?" The woman remained undisturbed. "Well," she said, "if God wills it, so be it."

No wonder trachoma is the plague of Palestine. And yet they say it is even worse in Egypt. It has been said that any two Arabs seldom have more than three eyes between them.

"Nevertheless," remarked Colonel E. St. John Ward, the leader of the expedition, "it is not fair to blame the condition on the people of Palestine. It is the result of centuries of misrule and oppression. Ever since the time of Alexander the Great, Europe has taken toll of the East; each nation has organized its expeditions, not for what it would give the East but for what it could get out of it. Palestine and Syria, lying in the road of all the invaders, have paid tribute not only to the passing armies but to the conquerors of whom they became subjects. Since the Middle Ages Turkey has been the dominating power in Palestine, and Turkey has never been obsessed with the idea of liberalism or modern development. She is of the East, Eastern; her tendency has been to retrograde, not to advance. Her idea of government has been autocracy, to squeeze from the people of the subject race every last penny that taxation could exact. The result as it exists in Palestine is not unnatural.

"But times have changed, and while 'East is East and West is West,' nevertheless, in the spirit of cooperation at least, the twain are slowly meeting. The old idea of merely exploiting the East is surely breaking down. How this may be exemplified by the occupation of India and Egypt by the English. I think no one will deny that these countries have been bettered by the occupation, and so the time has come for the West to impose its influence on the East, and in the end to help it work out its own uplift. America's part in this movement is particularly opportune and happy, and this Red Cross expedition is an expression of what may be done. Faith, hope and charity can surely enter in here. An appreciation of the ancient spirit of the people, together with the more material help we can give them—better food, better sanitation, newer and better ways of earning a livelihood as exemplified by American enterprise—these can bring about an awakening that will be of lasting benefit."

"The sad part of it all," remarked Professor A. Edward Kelsey, "is that all the sickness, the dirt and the squalor of Palestine is preventable. There need not be any more illness there than there need be in any warm country where modern methods have been introduced. Severe poverty could be reduced to the veriest minimum. The waters of Mount Hermon could be utilized not only for drinking purposes, but to provide power for operating all sorts of factories, trolley systems and electric lighting plants, to say nothing of irrigating systems, all of which with proper regulation would presently banish pestilence, provide work for thousands of people, promote agriculture, enable the country perhaps to recover its forests—in short, make the desert to blossom like the rose.

"It could be done, I say, but only with the cooperation of the American people. It will take great organization and large amounts of money; but if every person who has the uplift of the Holy Land at heart will contribute his little bit, the great end to be desired will surely be accomplished."

The Red Cross Expedition to Palestine

FROM Red Cross headquarters in Washington the announcement was made on April 16 of the sending of the Commission to Palestine. Dr. John H. Finley, Commissioner of Education of New York, is to be at the head of the Commission, which has about sixty members. Its work includes comprehensive plans for the relief of the people of the Holy Land, who have suffered greatly by the war. Famine and disease, especially typhus and cholera, are epidemic, and the condition of a large portion of the population is deplorable. Dr. E. St. John Ward, professor of surgery in the American University at Beirut, submitted the plan of relief which has been adopted by the Red Cross, and for which the War accused by the Turkish government of being friendly to the fellahen and were taken away from their stations and interned somewhere in the Turkish empire. This is but an index of the attitude of the Turkish government toward any one who would attempt at any time to alleviate the awful condition of the population.

"During the days of mobilization, a party of Turkish soldiers were commanded to visit one of the fellahen villages, conscript all fighting men within the village, and those who failed to report were to be shot dead on the spot, even without a single question being asked. On arriving in the village, they read the list of men required and then demanded their provisions from the sheikh. The sheikh replied: "Last week your officers came, took all our fighting men, took all our grain, wheat and barley, took our copper vessels, and not a cent by way of remuneration. Now you ask for our fighting men. You cannot have one." The soldiers remained all night, and each soldier took one of the women of the village and kept her all night. In the morning there was a council of war among the chiefs of the surrounding villages. After the council of war they came and took two of the soldiers, tied a rope around their heels, hung them to a fig tree with their heads down, while the women carried armsful of straw and set this on fire, not that it might burn hastily, but that it might smoke the suspended soldiers. In this condition they were held for three hours by way of compensation for their night attack on the women. Three of the other soldiers returned to the city and reported to the commander. A whole company of soldiers were sent to wipe out the villages, but the commander, on hearing of the dastardly acts of the soldiers, made peace with the villagers, so the thing was settled.

"This is just another of the many instances of the treatment of the people at the hands of the Turk. It is no wonder that it is impossible to find patriotism in Syria."

THERE were other tales of the miseries and even the sordidness of the people. Some of them were too terrible for details, stories of the villages where the people, bound down by their poverty and the fatalism of their kind, seem unable or unwilling to lift a hand for their own betterment. The Age and Its Apostasy

THE Christian Herald thinks, and thinks rightly, that there are certain strategic words in the study of prophecy which, if made clear to the people, would do much to solve many of its difficulties. For this reason it is proposed in this and one or two following articles to attempt a glossary of such words.

Take the word "age," for example. How often it is used! "This age" is spoken of; "the god of this age," "the end of the age," "the millennial age," etc. What does it mean? The word occurs some forty times in the New Testament though it is commonly translated "world" (Greek "aion"). Here are some instances: "The harvest is the end of the world" ("age"); "what shall be the sign of thy coming and of the end of the world" ("age"); "he not conformed to this world" ("age"); "the powers of the world" ("age") to come." (See Matt. 13:39; 24:3; Rom. 12:2; Heb. 6:5). It represents various periods of time, but of that we need not now speak.

A more interesting question is the object or reason of the "ages." Chapell's "Theology" suggests that it may be the opposing forces of Satan and his hosts in the heavenly places that causes them; for he regards them as so many stages in the divine warfare, so many epochs in the execution of the plan of redemption. There are concealments of God's purpose in the ages which may be necessary in order to obtain victory (Matt. 24:43); or, as he remarks further, even the cycles of the heavenly bodies may have something to do with them, for "there is a wonderful harmony between the material and immaterial worlds."

However, for our present purpose it is more practical to observe that "age" is commonly used as synonymous with "dispensation" (Eph. 1:10), which means "a period of time during which man is tested in respect of obedience to some specific revelation of the will of God." The Scofield Reference Bible speaks of seven dispensations:

(1) That of Innocency, when man was subjected to a very simple test, and warned of the consequences of disobedience (Gen. 2:17).

(2) That of Conscience, when man was responsible to do all known good, and abstain from all known evil, and to approach God through sacrifice (Gen. 3:23-7:24).

(3) That of Human Government, when man became responsible to govern the world for God (Gen. 8:1-11:9, especially 9:5,6).

(4) That of Promise, which was exclusively Israelitish, when the descendants of Abraham came under a covenant, wholly gracious and unconditional, and which lasted until, at Sinai, Israel accepted the law (Gen. 12:1-Exod. 19:8).

(5) That of Law, extending from Sinai to Calvary (Exod. 19:9-John 19:30).

(6) That of Grace, which begins with the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ and extends to his coming again (John 1:17; II Cor. 6:2).

(7) That of the Kingdom, or the Millennial Age, which continued from Christ's Second Coming onward for a thousand years (Rev. 20:1-4).

Some find an eighth dispensation revealed, that of the "Fulness of the Times" (Eph. 1:10), and identified by them with the age when Christ shall have delivered up the Kingdom to God, even the Father, (I Cor. 15:24-28), a subject so large as to demand a separate article to define it.

It will be recalled that all of these "ages" passed into one another without any change of a catastrophic character except the Flood. There were changes revolutionary in principle, but they were not felt immediately and universally over the earth or over the race.

In some cases they were slow of accomplishment or in reaching a consummation. The age of Innocency ended in the expulsion of man from Eden. The change to the dispensation of Promise effected little at first, outside of the family of Abraham; while that from Law to Grace, although in some particulars the most revolutionary of all, came to pass without the knowledge of the world beyond Jerusalem. And how much of the crucifixion was known or understood even within its walls, and how little were its general inhabitants affected by it!

Such may be the case when the present age passes into that of the Millennium. The descent of Christ into the air and the translation of his body, the church, to meet him there, may not seriously, nor for very long, disturb the rest of mankind. A seven days' wonder, it may soon be forgotten. And the judgments to follow on the ungodly nations may seem at first only a repetition of the present "frightfulness" and its accompanying tribulations. Indeed, the effects of the passing of this age into the next will be continuous doubtless for a thousand years. (See the earlier article, "The Day of the Lord—When It Comes and What It Means.")

"APOSTASY" is another word worth dwelling on because of its large place in the study of prophecy, and because of the serious relation it bears to the current history of the church or world. The word is not in the Bible, but that for which it stands is frequently named in the New Testament.

What does it mean? But first, what does it not mean? An apostate is not an ordinary unbeliever in Christianity, a pagau for example, who has never heard of Christ and his gospel. Neither is he a back-slidden Christian—one who, through sin, has lost his fellowship with God, and for whom forgiveness and cleansing wait on his penitent return (I John 1:9). An apostate is not one who simply errs as to some specific truth of revelation, of which he may be as yet ignorant (Acts 19:1-6). Nor is he a heretic merely, for, as another says, heresy may be accounted for by the snare of Satan, and at the same time be consistent with the holding of a measure of the true faith (II Tim. 2:25, 26). An apostate is different from any of these, in that he is one who once knew, or professed to know and to hold the truth of Christianity, but who has altogether and definitely renounced it. That is not to say that he has renounced the whole of it, or the outward appearance and the profession of it; but that he has renounced the vital part of it, the Godhead of Christ and redemption through his sacrificial death; that which really makes one's life a part of the life of God, through the reconciliation of the cross (Phil. 3:18; II Pet. 2:11).

The "apostasy," therefore, is a condition in the professing Church that expresses a definite and permanent falling away on the part of many from "the faith which was once for all delivered to the saints" (Jude 3). The parables of our Lord in the 13th of Matthew all predict this, but very especially that of the wheat and the tares, where, to quote another, "the supineness of the servants affords opportunity to the enemy to sow tares where good seed had been already sown." The evil once introduced would be removed only by judgment at the end of the age.

The Church had not been formed when these parables were spoken; but hardly had it come into existence before they began to be fulfilled. Listen to Paul in his address to the elders at Ephesus: "I know that after my departing shall grievous wolves enter in among you, not sparing the flock. Also of your own selves shall men arise, speaking perverse things, to draw away disciples after them" (Acts 20:29, 30).

Compare also his words to the Church at Rome (Rom. 16:17, 18), to that at Corinth (II Cor. 12:20, 21), Galatia (Gal. 4:8-10), Philippi (Phil. 3:18, 19), Colosse (Col. 2:4-23), and the well-known predictions in II Thess. 2, I Tim. 4, and II Tim. 3.

TO dwell on that in II Thess. 2. In his first epistle to this church, Paul had enlarged upon that aspect of the second coming of Christ, associated with the translation of the Church to meet him in the air (4:13-16). But in this second epistle he does the same for that later aspect of the same event, when Christ shall descend from heaven with his holy angels in flaming fire to judge the wicked and disobedient (1:6-9). It would seem that some in that Church supposed that this had already come, that their tribulations at the hands of persecutors were nothing less than part of the general sorrow to be experienced in the "Day of the Lord."

But Paul disabuses their minds of this. "Let no man deceive you by any means," he says: "for that day shall not come except there come a falling away (apostasy) first, and that man of sin be revealed," whom he describes.

He then adds, "the mystery of iniquity doth already work," i. e., the apostasy had already begun, "only there is one that restraineth now, until he be taken out of the way." The meaning of this seems to be that there was some power exercised in the earth and over Christendom preventing the full expression of this iniquity, hindering the apostasy from coming to a head. Whatever this power may have been, it seems still to be working and exercising its restraining influence. Perhaps it is the semblance of Christianity, as represented in the nations of Christendom; perhaps it is the presence of the true Church not yet translated; in any event, it is the Holy Spirit himself acting in or through these or other agencies.

When he, i. e., this restraining power, shall be removed, "then shall that wicked (or lawless one, the Antichrist) be revealed, whom the Lord shall consume with the spirit of his mouth and shall destroy with the brightness of his coming." In other words, the apostasy will be brought to an end with the destruction of the chief apostate.

IV

THE modern development of the apostasy dates back to the close of the eighteenth century and the beginning of the nineteenth, in the rise of the destructive criticism of the Holy Scriptures. When man's faith in the inspiration and authority of the Bible is undermined, the whole structure built upon it must eventually crumble; which explains what we hear now on every hand in the scouting of the deity of Christ, the lost condition of the race, the need of redemption through a sacrificial atonement, eternal retribution of the wicked, and practically all the fundamentals of revealed truth.

And there is a close relation between this and the judgments on the nations synchronizing with the end of the age. Sooner or later, ecclesiastical corruption paves the way for the open revolt of the kingdoms and nations of the earth "against the Lord and against his Anointed." A writer in the New York Evening Post remarks, that "the Bolsheviks are doing more damage to the Central Powers today with their ideas than they were ever able to do with their bayonets"—a principle that has a wide application. The United States and the Allies will be able to overcome the artillery and the submarines of Germany, we confidently believe; but the poison gas of her universities, pouring through the theological seminaries of our land, is a more lasting menace.

SOME years ago, on returning from a Sunday school tour in the Lake Superior region, we were storm-bound two days in a fishing hamlet on an unfrequented part of the inhospitable shore. Accommodations were typical of such a place. In the public-house, dignified as "hotel," the most popular place was the bar, just off one corner of the sitting-room.

Conversation was unedifying, and the opportunity for its change by a stranger was not yet; so I wandered upstairs to get the bearings of the room assigned me for the night. I seemed to be a favored guest, for in the room I found an apology for a piano.

Now, my strong point, if I have one, is not instrumental music. Much as I thrill with real music, I show my good will by avoiding torture of my fellow creatures by my own crude performance. Believing everybody at a safe distance, however, I sat down and began thrumming over on the keys with one hand a familiar tune which was singing itself into my soul. Soon I heard a shambling step on the stair, and a silent figure stole behind me.

The Tune That Mother Sang

Despite my unwelcome audience, I struggled through the verse, when my friend apologized for intruding. There was a choke in his voice as he spoke, for in the matter of temperance it was quite clear that he was less than neutral.

"Excuse me, mister, for trespassing," said he, "but I couldn't help it; when I heard that tune I had to come."

"Is it a tune?" I asked.

"Why, sure it is," he replied. "Play it over again, will you?"

I responded to this my first encore, while my friend tried to sing the words that seemed to have clung to him like some cherished memory. His singing was about as near Caruso's standard as my playing was to that of Paganini, but at the end of the stanza he was quite overcome.

"Where did you learn that hymn?" I asked.

"My mother used to sing it every night before we went to bed," he answered huskily. "She's been gone fifteen years now. My tears don't often leak before strangers, mister; but that old tune, and the words it brought back, got me! I can hear her now, as she would say, 'Jim, don't forget to try your knees before your back.' And I don't mind telling you, stranger, that I never climb into bed until I've first knelt down. Understand, I don't pretend to pray, lest the Almighty should smite me; but I dassn't miss lest I should die before morning."

Here was a bit of flotsam from a mother's heart that had been stilled for years and which had somehow drifted to this bleak shore within my opportunity.

He was my guest until my departure, and I may add that he was held from temptation until thoroughly sobered; then, behind the closed door, we had heart-to-heart talks about his mother's God and his mother's Gospel. Finally we said good-by, not without strong hope on both sides that his newly awakened life might find permanent anchorage and might furnish one more striking instance of the far-reaching Gospel power of a mother's love and a mother's prayers.

ALFRED DAY.

Secretary Baker Home to Push War

SECRETARY BAKER reached an American port, on April 16, on one of the former German liners now in Uncle Sam's service, and reached his desk in Washington late the same day. It was announced that he had returned from his trip abroad prepared to concentrate every energy on expediting the movement of American fighting men to France. Mr. Baker saw all that there was to be seen of the war; from the port of embarkation to the battle-front, going over every element of the fighting machine, link by link. Mr. Baker found hundreds of miles of American made railways, new docks and bridges, so increasing port facilities that transports now make the round trip in sixteen days against sixty early in the winter, and warehouses full of war materials, which, if put end to end would make one continuous warehouse from Washington to New York. Before leaving France Secretary Baker gave to Gen. Pershing the following message to be given to the officers and men of the American expeditionary forces: "After a thorough inspection of the American Expeditionary Forces I am returning to the United States with fresh enthusiasm to speed up the transportation of the remainder of the great army of which you are the vanguard. What I have seen here gives comfortable assurance that plans for the effectiveness of our fighting forces and for the comfort and welfare of our men have been broadly made and vigorously executed. Our schools and system of instruction are adding to the general soldier training the specialized knowledge which developed among our French and British associates during the four years of heroic action which they have displayed from the beginning of the war. Fortunately the relations between our soldiers and those of the British and French are uniformly cordial and happy, and the welcome of the civil population of France has been met by our soldiers with chivalrous appreciation in return. We are building a great army to vindicate a great cause, and the spirit which you are showing, the courage, the resourcefulness and zeal for the performance of duty, both as soldiers and as men, are not only promising of military success, but are worthy of the traditions of America and of the allied armies with which we are associated."

The Secretary reported to the President, on the 17th, and expressed surprise that anybody should be depressed over the situation on the western front. He expressed enthusiastic admiration for the indomitable spirit prevailing among the people of our co-belligerents. The determination to win he reported everywhere apparent among the officials, soldiers and private citizens of the Allied nations.

The Secretary told the newspaper correspondents at Washington that any man who went to France would have an increasing sense of admiration for the magnitude, thoroughness and speed with which the American Army had done its work. "They know no hours and no limitation on labor. The question is to get the most done possible and the amount done is an amazing story." The Secretary said also, "the condition of our soldiers in France is a thing I am very happy to have the opportunity to tell. Our boys are well physically—big, strong, robust and healthy—and they are well in every other way. Their spirits are high, their behavior is most admirable, their relations with the French people and the French soldiers and the British soldiers are cordial and sympathetic and wholesome. The enthusiasm expressed by all those who have been on the battle-line is that they want more. The American soldier has made good in France." The Secretary closed his interview thus:—"The big thing for America to do is to support the war—support it financially, support it in sentiment, belief, confidence, and courage. The right arm of America is in France, and it is bared ready for action and striking hard. The rest of the body is over here, and we must support and invigorate that arm. That means subscriptions to the Liberty Loan, and it means the adoption of the sort of confidence in our army in France which its own activities justify and deserve."

Correspondents reported that there was a notable speeding up of all manner of war work on the advent of the returned Secretary.

A Week in the World's News

OUR BOYS IN ACTION. Following the costly repulse of her picked troops on the French and American trenches northwest of Toul, as related last week, Berlin issued a report telling of the taking by storm of American trenches eastward and southeastward of Maizey, north of St. Mihiel.

The week from April 14 to 21 passed without any reports of major action on advancing enemy. During the morning the Germans entered the village of Seicheprey within the American lines. They were almost immediately driven out by a counter-attack and before evening the Americans had reclaimed all but a few outpost positions. These positions were cleared up during the night and the 21st saw the original line restored in both the French and American sectors. The Germans lost heavily. Press dispatches reported three Germans captured and no Americans missing. Berlin claimed a penetration of a mile and a quarter into the American lines and the capture of 183 prisoners and 25 machine guns. The Germans were also repulsed on April 20 on the sector held by American and French troops north of St. Mihiel.

TO BUILD SHIPS. Following a conference covering several days between to be worth while unless we win this war, and every one must do the task to which he is called. What I know is that I am going to build ships, and I know it can be done."

It was announced, on April 19, that Mr. Schwab would make his headquarters in Philadelphia. Nearly 50 per cent of the steel ship yards are within easy access from Philadelphia. It was also announced that the contracts in process of execution called for a total of 4,364,202 tons. Of 730 ways in use throughout the country 398 are for steel ships, 165 of which are in the Philadelphia district.

Vice-Admiral Von Capelle, addressing the main committee of the Reichstag, on April 18, declared that the new U-boat construction exceeded the losses and that the effectiveness of the submarines had increased. He claimed that the U-boat was still sinking six times as much tonnage as the British were launching, and declared that construction in America and Japan could not be considered as favoring the situation in England since it was needed for the requirements of the two countries themselves.

Shipping Board officials in view of Von Capelle's picture of submarine success said, on April 19, that since the war began in 1914 no more than 40 American ships had been lost from all causes and that only three or four vessels had been lost since America entered the war and armed her ships.

German submarines in the week ending April 17 sank 11 British ships of 1600 tons or more—4 under that tonnage, and one fishing vessel. The French lost no ships of more than 1600 tons and but one under that tonnage. The Italians lost one steamer of more than 1500 tons and two sailing vessels. The American steamship Lake Moor, manned by a naval crew, was torpedoed in the war zone April 11. On April 20, five officers and thirty-nine men of the crew were missing, five officers and twelve men had been rescued. . . . The American steamship, Florence H, was destroyed in a French port, on April 17, by an internal explosion; thirty-four of her crew of seventy-five were rescued.

CZERNIN RESIGNS. Following the publication of Emperor Charles's letter to the President of France, the following telegram was sent by the Emperor of Austria to the Emperor of Germany: "Clemenceau's accusations against me are so low that I have no intention to discuss longer this affair with France. My cannon in the west is our last reply."

"In faithful friendship, CHARLES."

Count Czernin, Austria's Foreign Minister, who had known nothing of the letter, promptly handed in his resignation, which was accepted, but the Austrian Foreign Office issued a statement declaring that the letter delivered to the French was a forged letter substituted for a letter which was to have been delivered. It was announced from Paris, on April 17, that the first letter had caused the Allies to demand an explanation, and that a second letter came through Prince Sixtus, which the Allies decided did not permit them to continue the conversation. Baron Burian, who has formerly held the portfolio, succeeded Count Czernin as Austro-Hungarian Foreign Minister.

MAN POWER BILL PASSED. The man power bill including the provision for conscription in Ireland passed the British House of Commons on April 16 by a vote of 301 to 103. In the discussion on the bill Premier Lloyd George declared: "It is desirable in the interest of the war that we should settle the Irish question and produce something like contentment in Ireland and good will in America." Mr. John Dillon, Chairman of the Irish Nationalists made a hard fight for the omission of the Irish clause. The bill was immediately taken up in the House of Lords where it passed its second reading on April 17. Upon the passage of the

The casualties for the week totaled, killed in action 42, died of wounds 19, died of disease 32, killed by accident or unknown cause 4, wounded 211, prisoners or missing 6. General Pershing suggested that some of missing would be found later in other units.

After a bombardment, declared by ambulance men who worked at Verdun to be more intense than any which marked that battle, the Germans at sunrise on April 20, launched the most determined assault so far delivered against the Americans, northwest of Toul. The adjoining French trenches were also attacked. Against the American front the Germans sent forward, behind an intense barrage, 1,200 picked troops, in three waves. The American battery positions were heavily bombarded with gas shells. Our gunners, however, working in gas masks, put down an effective counter barrage which greatly weakened the force of the attack. The enemy was able to press back our boys somewhat from their front positions, although they gave way slowly fighting every inch of the way and pouring a murderous fire from machine guns, rifles and automatics into the

One of the principal duties of Mr. Schwab will be to keep in the closest possible personal touch with the yards. He was quoted as saying, on April 18, that the work done by Mr. Hurley and Mr. Piez had been prodigious, splendid and magnificent, that a good foundation had been laid, that we were getting good results, and that he, himself, was filled with enthusiasm and confidence. Mr. Schwab said: "I do not want to have any man in the shipyards working for me, I want them all working with me. Nothing is going

THE army of girls in Washington marked time this week while Mr. Water's story of the Palestine expedition, just released by the Red Cross, took first position in the paper. Next week the girls will be right up in front where they belong.

Next week also Miss Sangster and Robert Riggs will lead you back into "The Woods of Yesterday."

Frank Carpenter hasn't heard the voice of the guns, but he has listened to the noise of the Next week also Miss Connolly goes neighboring with a British tank, on recruiting duty. Then she unfurls the Red Cross.

And next week you will hear an evangelistic message from Dr. Biederwolf, you will read a new story from the camps, you will see more pictures in Rotogravure, and you will look into the navy's charge against Philadelphia.

Anniversary of Lexington Sees Germans Stopped

ANOTHER week of tense anxiety has passed. For another seven days the maddened Boche has stormed against the bayonet barbed line of British men, stormed and fallen and stormed again in ever-increasing numbers until the human rampart across his path was battered and pressed back. Each backward step of the battling British cost the Huns a fearful price, but they paid it and offered, for the victory so necessary to their state, still more of the currency of German blood. But it was vain. When Bailleul fell and Wytschaete and the heights of Passchendaele were given up, the Allied commanders were through with retirements. The British fell back not only to take up new positions but to meet the French reserves which General Foch had started early in the week to meet the German threat of overwhelming numbers. On April 18th the French were in action beside the battle-weary battalions of their Allies and April 19, Lexington Day, saw the embattled sons of liberty once more turn back the minions of tyranny. The line held and assault after assault was tried only to meet defeat. The Hun was halted! Not only were the French in line, but the Italians were coming, and German sources were quoted to show that 220,000 Americans were in the front line, in Lorraine near Verdun and in Champagne. Some Frenchmen could be in Flanders because Americans were in Lorraine. Lexington Day was well celebrated.

The Story of the Fighting

STRIKING northward from Merville to Neuve Eglise with three picked and fresh divisions, the Germans on April 15 and 16 pressed back the doggedly fighting British to the heights north and west of Bailleul and Neuve Eglise, west of Wulverghem and of Wytschaete. At Merville seven desperate assaults were beaten back, while to the southward, east of Robeeq the British improved their positions in the face of German attacks and concentrated artillery fire. Attacking at first with eleven divisions, the German force in action in Flanders on April 15 had grown to twenty-three divisions, which were kept storming forward under a terrific artillery fire against the rifles, machine-guns and artillery of the British. Five German divisions had been put out of action on April 16. Gains were made thus by sheer weight of numbers but at reckless cost. At the end of the day of April 16 the Germans were at last on the high ground at the southern end of the Messines Ridge, having penetrated west of Bailleul to Meteren, and west of Wytschaete to St. Eloi. British counter-attacks put Wytschaete and Meteren again in Allied hands, but continued German attacks compelled the British to retire again to positions to the westward. On this new line, running from the Nieppe Woods to Wytschaete, a twelve-mile inferno of terrific battle, the British on April 17 again brought the Teutons to a halt.

Meanwhile, since the old Ypres salient, the result of last summer's success-said that since the first attack on March 21 the Germans had used 126 divisions (about 1,700,000 men), of which 28 had appeared in the battle of Armentieres. Of the 126 the British alone had met 79, the French alone 24, and the British and French together 23. The British had fought 28 German divisions twice and one three times, and the French had fought four divisions twice.

According to the latest available

ble, and did not oppose the Germans man for man until it was necessary to bring the German progress to a halt. Before Amiens the Germans met superior forces both of men and guns. On April 17 it appeared that they were soon to meet the same sort of stone wall in Flanders, but there was increasing evidence that Allied superiority was not yet sufficient to warrant the risk of a great stroke, the failure of which would mean disaster. Meantime the German man mass attacks with their consequent wastage and American transports with their constant deliveries of troops in France were gradually giving the Allies the superiority of man power necessary to a victorious offensive.

Their backs to the wall, bare to the waist, wreathed in the dust and smoke of battle, these British gunners keep their big howitzer hot with messages of death to the oncoming Huns ful fighting, was becoming seriously outflanked, the British on Monday and Tuesday, April 15 and 16, withdrew their forces from the whole of the Passchendaele Ridge, the northward extension of the Messines Ridge. The Germans reported on April 17 the reoccupation of Poelcapelle, Langemark, Passchendaele, Becelaer, and Gheluvelt. The military situation indicated that further progress by the attacking forces might force the giving up of the whole Ypres salient, including the town.

As April 18 opened, General Foch, in supreme command, was keeping the whole enemy line from Ypres to Rheims under an intense fire, was moving French troops and British reserves to the support of the British, who, tired from a week's fighting against an army continually replaced with fresh troops, were again holding up the enemy's masses which still pressed forward over ground heaped with his dead, and was apparently making his preparations for the counter-measures which should write failure across the record of another German drive. It had been reported that Hindenburg or Ludendorff had declared that 1,000,000 men were not too many to pay for victory. The British machine-guns were collecting the payment on these terrible days about Bailleul, Merville and Wytschaete, and to the northward. One crew had fought their guns until they had replaced their gun-barrels forty times.

Major General Maurice, just returned to London from the front, on April 17 evidence the Germans have along the whole western front about 200 divisions, or 2,600,000 fighting men. There is no way to determine the exact strength of the Germans behind the lines, in the engineer corps and non-combatant troops. The French have approximately 3,000,000 men in all kinds of service, but this could not mean more than 1,500,000 available for mobile fighting. The British have nearly 5,000,000 men in uniform. Of these about 1,000,000 are in training at home; about another 1,000,000 are divided between Mesopotamia, Palestine, Macedonia and the garrison stations throughout the Empire. This would leave about 3,000,000 men for service in France, of whom probably half are in the firing-line or in support and reserve, while the other half guard communications, operate transport service, and carry on the multiplied duties of the quartermaster's, ordnance and commissary departments. Apparently, then, the Germans have thrown upwards of 1,000,000 men against the British 1,500,000. But the fighting line is never held by more than one-third of the whole force available, and the Germans have concentrated masses against narrow fronts. While the British have been moving reserves to the support of the line attacked, the enemy has therefore had the advantage temporarily of a strength of from 2 to 1 to 5 to 1. For tactical reasons both on the Somme and at Armentieres, the Allies fought a delaying action, using as few men as possipeated assaults were broken up and driven back while prisoners were taken. At nightfall the battle was still raging before Givenchy. North of Merville along the line west of Merris and Bailleul, north of Neuve Eglise and west of Messines and Wytschaete the enemy, on the afternoon of the 18th, after heavy shelling sent his waves of storm troops against Mount Kemmel, the dominating height of the Messines-Wytschaete Ridge. He was sanguinarily repulsed. Northeast of Ypres along a four-mile front from Langemark to Kippe four German divisions were hurled against the Belgian troops. The first impact gave them a footing in the advanced positions which an immediate counter-attack took from them along with some 600 prisoners. Thus for another twenty-four hours the German hosts were forced to pay a high price for no advantage. From several correspondents also came word that the 18th saw French troops in action at threatened places in the line, while the roads leading to the battle positions were blue with the advancing Allies of the men in khaki.

At the point of the German salient reaching toward Amiens, the French, on April 18, attacked on both sides of the Avre, over a front of 2½ miles from Thennes to Mailly-Raineval. The French reached the outskirts of Castel and the western slopes of the heights dominating the Avre, taking several RECENT political development in Russia and the Caucasus have placed in jeopardy the lives of many thousands of Armenians, and the only reliable agency to which the distressed people can turn in this crisis is the American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief.

Binding the Wounds of Armenia

Whether any such body can cope with a problem which is rapidly assuming tremendous proportions is a question. A government commission, with power to requisition supplies, advance credit and regulate transportation, may be a necessity if stricken Armenia is to be saved. For the condition is growing alarmingly worse than it has ever been.

Tiflis is far more attractive than Van, and carries off its part as the capital of the new Transcaucasian Republic with a prouder spirit of bravado. But what the theaters and well-dressed crowds that throng the Golovinski do for Tiflis, refugee boys, spinning tops among the ruins, and brave-faced women, spinning wool in the sunshine before the blackened doors of thrice-sacked Van, do for this city of the gallant defense and the pitiful retreats.

I passed down one of the Van streets in the early morning. Some refugee boys, scantily clad, were sliding down a miniature hill in a blackened kerosene can and shouting with delight. As I returned, I met a motley crew of ragged urchins, running along gleefully, each with a battered tin, on their way to a food distribution. In front of the mud house which is the gubernatorial mansion, I saw a girl of six with her single cotton garment open to her waist. She was barefoot in the snow, but on her face there was a cheery smile. She seemed as happy as the most coddled scion of wealth along Riverside Drive. When women whose husbands have been massacred refuse to take life sadly, how can one help admiring their spirit? When orphan children, who haven't a friend on earth, run around barefoot in the snow and smile like cherubs, how can one be sad?

Yet a man might drive through every street of Van and not see one dwelling that looks really habitable. What the Turks could not do to this city after they entered had already been done by the Armenians, to prevent their riches from aiding the Turks and inspiring them to further advances.

Van was once a city of lovely homes. Agha Beg, whose home on Van's Broadway is now a toothless hag with yawning openings, says that in all of Turkey he never saw finer rugs and furniture. Yet the round table which the governor now uses as a desk is a broken thing which refuses to come together into a unified whole, and the benches which flank it are spavined and weak in the knees. The other furniture of this room of the executive mansion consists of a rude board table whose parents were a packing case and the legs of an incubator. Van sacrificed all before the approach of the Turk, as Moscow did before the advance of Napoleon. But Van, the ruin, is a place of stout hearts and homely cheer.

Captain Gracey, traveling in Turkey after the massacres of 1908, found a village which the Turks had burned. The roofs had fallen in, as have most of the roofs of Van, but the walls were still standing, and inside one of these walls, growing out of the wood ashes which once were roof timbers, were tomatoes, corn and eggplant, sown by an Armenian. Out of the ashes of a ruined and desolate land the Armenian people are planning to build a new freedom. What can you do with such people?

OUT there to the south, beyond the indefinite line between the trenches which the Russians have left and the other indefinite line, miles farther on, where the Kurds are holding the so-called Turkish position, there have been, ever since the spring of 1915, Armenian men, women and children, living and going about their occupations in the broad "No Man's Land" at the Turkish front. They are fighting off small raiding expeditions, and when a real Turkish advance comes these intrepid minute-men will bear the first onslaught. The determination and virility of the Armenians is startling!

The American Mission premises, where there was once a flourishing work in all branches of missionary activity, are now utterly ruined. But rising above the stark walls that once formed homes and orphanage and hospital and school is the steeple of the mission church, with its cross untouched! Higher than any other landmark towers this symbol of a living force, ready to take its place in a rejuvenated community. There is a future for Christian missionary work in Van. Two of the loved workers have given up their lives for the people among whom they labored, but others stand ready to take up the Christian standard and make it stand for love and sympathy among a needy but independent people. Christ comforted many in the great retreat, but he is back in the city of lovely gardens and ghastly ruins, ready to give purpose to the future of Van.

Van's condition was not as bad as that of many of the villages farther west, where the Armenians formed a smaller proportion of the population and where they had no chance to resist their cruel rulers. There has been no massacre at Van. That took place when the long caravan of refugees had reached the narrow pass at Bergri and were fired on by the Kurds. Many of Van's men are living in the Caucasus, eagerly waiting the call to return to their old fields or to take up arms against the hated Turk. But if every one of them comes, it will be a perilous defense, and with every one that comes, the food question becomes more alarming. A tiny band of these minute-men has occupied each position that the Russians have left and sooner or later help is bound to come. Nations whose success depends in a measure on the valiant defense of Armenia will not leave her unassisted.

There is awful suffering in some parts of Erivan province, and starvation and deaths from exposure are reported. There are two reasons why this is not true in the city of Erivan. One is the local committee, composed of Dr. Reynolds, Mr. Yarrow, Mr. Maynard and Mr. Gracey, and assisted by Dr. Kennedy and Mr. Welch. The other reason is the generosity of thousands of loving souls in a distant continent, who have answered the appeals for aid and have made it possible for me to tell the glad news that the suffering here has been reduced to a minimum.

But the local committee cannot cope with the situation, much longer, even in the restricted area which they now serve. The Speeding Up the Liberty Loan!

The Nation Responding to the Call to Buy Liberty Bonds and Win the War

IN the last week of the Liberty Loan, the whole nation is working with increased energy to assure success before May 4, the closing day. President Wilson has personally taken a hand in speeding up subscriptions. He issued a proclamation, calling for subscriptions to the Loan, setting aside Friday, April 26, as Liberty Day, and asking the people of the United States to "assemble in their respective communities and liberally pledge anew their financial support to sustain the nation's cause." It is confidently expected that his proclamation will arouse the enthusiasm that is necessary to greatly stimulate the work of the campaign and bring the desired result.

The billion mark of the Loan was well passed before the end of the second week of the drive. When two-fifths of the selling days of the campaign had elapsed only 36 per cent. of the minimum amount of $3,000,000,000 had been obtained.

Subscriptions by districts up to April 19 follows: New York, $318,249,850; Chicago, $180,040,800; Cleveland, $95,950,000; St. Louis, $92,800,950; Boston, $91,770,700; Philadelphia, $82,874,000; San Francisco, $70,844,350; Kansas City, $49,131,000; Minneapolis, $40,000,000; Dallas, $33,959,800; Richmond, $27,048,600; Atlanta, $7,064,850.

Over-confidence caused the Liberty Loan to lag behind its schedule. Following the superb start, every one was so sure the Loan would be oversubscribed that, toward the middle of April, subscriptions all over the country fell short of the anticipation. It was evident that nothing short of a tremendous increase of activity everywhere would carry the Loan "over the top" with the oversubscription that had been confidently looked for.

THE Treasury Department authorized this statement: "Sales since the first days of the campaign, when they started with a rush, frankly are not up to expectations. There is a feeling of disappointment, particularly in the large cities. The country districts are doing better than they did during the

The pace must pick up. Big efforts to drive home to Americans of only moderate circumstances their duty to subscribe to the limit are being made everywhere. Bank literature, speakers at scores of meetings daily, house-to-house canvassers, all hammer away on this point. And virtually every bank is doing its part to make payment easy by putting out bonds on a partial payment plan, calling for either weekly or monthly payments.

The President Proclaims a Liberty Day

A Proclamation by the President of the United States of America:

AN enemy who has grossly abused the power of organized government and who seeks to dominate the world by the might of the sword challenges the rights of America and the liberty and life of all the free nations of the earth. Our brave sons are facing the fire of battle in defense of the honor and rights of America and the liberty of nations. To sustain them and to assist our gallant associates in the war, a generous and patriotic people have been called upon to subscribe to the Third Liberty Loan.

NOW, THEREFORE, I, Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States of America, do appoint Friday, the 26th day of April, 1918, as Liberty Day. On the afternoon of that day I request the people of the United States to assemble in their respective communities and liberally pledge anew their financial support to sustain the nation's cause. Patriotic demonstrations should be held in every city, town, and hamlet throughout the land, under the general direction of the Secretary of the Treasury and the immediate direction of the Liberty Loan Committees organized by the Federal Reserve Banks. Let the nation's response to the Third Liberty Loan express in unmistakable terms the determination of America to fight for peace, the permanent peace of justice.

For the purpose of participating in Liberty Day celebrations, all employees of the Federal Government throughout the country whose services can be spared may be excused at 12 o'clock noon, Friday, the 26th of April.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

previous campaigns; but the gains that they are making are not of sufficient size to offset the lack of sales in the larger communities. The need for constant, steady driving by sales committees, every day throughout the remainder of the campaign, is plain. Only persistent daily and hourly effort will restore the campaign to the rate of speed which it had acquired a week ago, possibly under the impetus of the start of the honor-flag race."

were as follows: Boston, 36; New York, 35; Philadelphia, 33; San Francisco, 33; Cleveland, 31; Richmond, 20; Atlanta, 7 per cent. In the New York district, to fill its $900,000,000 quota, daily contributions averaging about $36,000,000 for the remaining working days of the drive were essential to the success of the Loan.

greatest need of the moment is for men, and this need is increasing. And the present measure of support must be vastly increased at once if the refugee population is to be carried through the winter. For a tremendous burden which has hitherto been carried by Russian and Armenian charitable societies is now being shifted to American shoulders.

IF the American relief work here is stopped for a single week, deplorable conditions will prevail. But the more important fact is that Russian charity, which has been the greatest factor in staying off death through hunger and cold, is now stopped because of the chaotic political condition of Russia itself. The majority of relief work in Armenia has not been done by the American Committee, but by numerous Russian and Armenian philanthropic societies, and these societies are rapidly becoming bankrupt. The American Committee has conducted some very interesting experiments in relief. It is now called to meet the awful situation alone. It cannot possibly do this without more workers and money.

Now that the Bolsheviks control the banks, the food supplies and the railways, organized Russian charity for the Armenians is an impossibility. Although the Transcaucasian peoples have set up their own government, they are without funds or credit. Armenians in Russia, who would give generously to Armenian relief, find their own funds jeopardized. The paper rouble is rejected by the farmers, who say that a peck of wheat in hiding is better than a sheaf of valueless bank-notes, and there is no authority to requisition grain. A month ago the American Committee was promised three carloads of grain a day, but the new political crisis has prevented the delivery of a single pound.

The majority of the Armenian refugees are in Armenian villages. Relief workers are unable to understand how they escape starvation. They know that work cannot be had, that not one refugee family in ten has enough food or money saved up to provide for a single week, and that food and clothing are almost unobtainable; and yet the 130,000 refugees have managed to live. The only explanation is the charity of the Armenian villagers, who have had little enough for themselves, but who, when pressed, are willing to divide their last crust with others less fortunate. With the rouble decreasing in value, with food becoming increasingly scarce, and with even cotton cloth almost unobtainable, these good Samaritans will be forced to cut off this small but by no means insignificant stream of petty charity. The burden on the American Committee is bound to become more grave.

SOME ask, "Why don't the refugees do something to support themselves?" To no family is the American Committee giving full support. Its only complete support is of one hundred picked boys in the Erivan Orphanage, which is under the supervision of Dr. Reynolds, whose direction of the Orphanage at Van was marked with unusual success. The rest of the support is partial.

More than eleven thousand fatherless children are being aided in four hundred and fifty villages. Each child has been given ten roubles a month, which is about one-fourth what it costs to support the child, but which has made a tremendous difference in conditions in these many villages. Suits of rough but warm material are being hastened to these children as fast as refugee men can wash the wool, refugee women can spin it, refugee weavers can weave the cloth, refugee tailors can make it up into suits, and refugee agents distribute it. But the main support of these fatherless children is falling upon their mothers or other relatives, or on such tender-hearted souls as took charge of them after the great retreat from Van.

The weavers and the shoemakers, who are fashioning rawhide sandals from untanned skins, are working at full speed. Lives depend on their industry. But lack of capital and looms prevents the wool spinners from receiving all the work for which they appeal. The wool is spun on such small hand-spindles as the Beduin and Chinese women use. The wool is held in one hand and the small spindle is whirled between the fingers. When a length of wool has been spun, the spindle is held against the dress to prevent it from unwinding, and the yarn is wound onto the spindle until it is full. Eleven hundred women are spinning wool by this primitive method, but the number of looms is still so small that these women cannot be given work enough to occupy all their time. Each woman is allowed to spin only a pound of wool a week, and for this she receives as many roubles as at present cost American givers fifty cents. Each of these women could double her output, but without more looms the yarn cannot be utilized. Hundreds of women are knitting sturdy homespun socks, but even this provision against winter cold and snow cannot keep pace with the spinning. Lack of looms is the greatest difficulty. There are enough refugee carpenters to build these looms, but hitherto the metal shuttles and combs could not be had nearer than Moscow. Arrangements have just been made to have a local Armenian manufacturer produce these necessities, although he says he will lose money on the deal.

Everything has been done to eliminate the machine and to provide work for as

Your Part in This War

ALL true Americans have a part to play in the great war that is now convulsing the world. A war of might against right, of ruthless terrorism against justice and mercy, it has already swept over a large area of the old world, desolating cities, desecrating shrines, and enslaving populations.

All of Europe and a part of Asia are passing through a Gethsemane of trial. Human freedom is in deadly danger. Even our own highest ideals and greatest interests are threatened, unless we come quickly and overwhelmingly to the rescue and turn the tide to victory.

Are you doing your share in this war—you who serve at home and who have not been called to face the shells and bullets at the front? Are you making your money fight by buying Liberty Bonds?

Liberty Loan month is nearing a close, and it has been a wonderful experience. Perhaps no other nation has ever witnessed such a spectacle as has been going on in these past four weeks. Big corporations and capitalists converting their millions into the purchase of Liberty Bonds, knowing that in so doing they are making the best investment the world has to offer. Little rural boroughs jostling each other in hearty rivalry to double and treble their quotas. Rich and poor, capitalist and laborer, being good-naturedly cheered as they push their money to the front to win the war.

And it is well worth winning! Indeed, if we did not put our shoulders together in columns as close as those of our brave boys at the front, we would be lacking in all the qualities of patriotic citizenship. For the man or woman who in a world crisis turns a deaf ear to the country's call to service, we have little respect. Duty to God and country are linked in the Liberty Loan. It is to be a strong defense to you, and to your children after you, against the same tyranny that has enslaved Belgium, Russia and Finland, and which is striving to destroy France and England and to grasp world dominion.

Buy Liberty Bonds if you do not want to go into bondage to the Kaiser. Buy them now, if you do not want to pay indemnities hereafter. Buy them to save yourself from bitter regrets and to shield your good name from ignominy, that will be the deserved lot of every one who evades a clear duty in this hour of stress and danger. You, who have thus far been shielded from the horrors of war, buy them to help to bring the victory that will restore peace to the world. America looks to you to justify her pride in her sons and daughters, and to help her in crushing tyranny, and making this old world of ours "a fit place for free men to live in." Do this, and the great Loan will close in triumphant success. It every loyal American does his and her full duty now—does it to the limit—the Liberty Loan will clear the way to victory.

The Children of Palestine

THERE is a world of sympathy in this letter which we have just received from two devoted American missionaries who are conducting a notable work at Cardenas, Cuba. It strikes a chord which should awaken the interest of all who love little children, and who feel especially drawn toward the children of the Holy Land, the sadness of whose lot in these war times may be partly imagined but cannot be described.

"Since sending you our letter, day before yesterday, our Christian Herald of March 27 has come, and we have read the editorial 'The Palestinian Problem,' with special interest in the reference to the proposed work for children in Jerusalem. We think it ought not to be called 'orphanage' work. Jesus said to his disciples, 'I will not leave you orphans,' as it is translated in the margin of our English Bible, and in the Bible text of some other languages. Jesus would have the little children in homes, rather than in orphanages. He says to them, in substance, 'I will not leave you orphans. I will come to you—come to you in homes, and in the persons of men and women who will be fathers and mothers to you.' He wants every child to have a home. He wants every child to have a father and a mother, or at least a mother. Here is an opportunity of centuries—the opportunity to help Jesus to not leave these children orphans.

"The homes should be made self-supporting as soon and as fully as possible. The 'fathers' and the 'mothers' should be men and women who will go forth to this work, trusting in God to supply all their needs and all the needs of the children under their care; and they should be men and women who know how to make one dollar do what two dollars have done before. Each community would need its teachers and its pastor, and, at first, probably its doctor and its nurse. But as time passes, the doctor and the nurse would find much time for other things than doctoring and nursing.

"Think of what your Children's Home at Mont-Lawn means to the children who can be in that Home for a few days in the year, and then try to think of what the Children's Homes in Palestine would mean to the children who could be in those homes for 365 days in the year."

MR. AND MRS. ELMER E. HUBBARD.
Industrial Home, Cardenas, Cuba.

These missionary friends have sent $100 (the profits of their dairy) to be the foundation stone of the first Home for Homeless Children in Bible Lands. A number of years ago, our readers helped by their contributions to establish the missionary work at Cardenas; now the "bread cast upon the waters" comes back as a gracious gift for this farther enterprise which is full of promise. We know of no work that would give richer returns in all that is worth striving for. Clearly, such is the conviction of our Cardenas friends, as we believe it will be of all who take counsel with their own hearts about what they may be able to do for the little ones of the Christ-Land.

"Every Spud a Bullet"

LET us make 'every spud a bullet,'—said John Mitchell, chairman of the Federal Food Board for New York State, in making his statement that the New York State Food Commission and the Federal Food Board are waging a campaign to urge all of our people to eat more and more potatoes. This campaign is to be waged for three weeks.

Potatoes are coming into the market plentifully, and during this week farmers will release the large quantities that have been held up because of the hard winter and other reasons which made it almost impossible to get the winter's supply to the city markets.

"Experts of our board," said Mr. Mitchell, "have made an agreement with the dealers in potatoes, whereby the full price will prevail until the winter supply is entirely consumed. The consumer will pay a dollar and forty-five cents a bushel, delivered to the home. This is a slight reduction in the price constituted in our official market reports until now. The farmer will receive 90 cents a bushel. The remainder will be divided among the shippers, receivers and retailers."

In order to prevent an enormous waste of this edible vegetable, it is most urgently requested that every family and the hotels and restaurants do the best they can to help consume the winter's supply. Very shortly the new crop will begin rolling into our markets and it is our duty, that is, the duty of all of us, to get into this campaign with all the enthusiasm and vigor of Americans who want to win the war.

By eating plenty of potatoes Americans can materially reduce their consumption of wheat products, and this complies with the request of the Food Administration to cut the national consumption of wheat products to 50 per cent.

Like many of the problems we have had to meet, it is useless for any of us now to worry about the reasons for this enormous supply of potatoes or why they were not sooner brought to our markets. What all of us should do is to jump in and eat the potatoes as freely as is humanly possible.

May Queens Then and Now

IT is not so very long ago since the coming of May was celebrated, here and in lands across the sea, by merrymaking and song. Every village had its May Queen, some happy, clear-eyed girl, radiant with the lure of youth and springtime.

We hear little about May Queens, this year. The girls who sang and danced and made flower baskets and talked of "love beneath the silver moon," have other things to do. They are rolling bandages now instead of filling May baskets. And the carefree merrymaking of other May times—well, there is not much time for it!

The girlhood of France and England and America has work to do, just as a certain girl of olden France had work to do. They have seen a vision and have answered a call, just as surely and bravely as she saw a vision and answered a call.

So there is not much time to spend, this year, in the fashioning of flower baskets. There are so many munition factories to be tended, so many fields to be plowed, so many suffering soldiers to be nursed back again to health and usefulness. But the modern girl, with the fire of youth lighting up the clear eyes of her, is glad to give up her play time, glad to do the work of a world that is struggling to throw off the burden of war!

Maytime with its merrymaking and songs used to be fun—a few years ago. Doubtless, a few years from now, Maytime will again mean parties and dances and music. But this year the May Queens have laid aside their flower garlands and their gilt paper crowns to put on the helmet of compassion, and the shield of faith and to take up the weaponry of work—the armor of the modern Joan of Arc.

The Tax on Reading Matter

PERIODICAL publishers pay every tax levied on manufacturers, every income tax and every other tax to which any business class is subject. But, in addition, periodical publishers alone have had the rate for transporting their manufactured product raised from 50 to 900 per cent.

An increase of 15 per cent. in freight rates to manufacturers generally was deemed all that they could possibly bear. Many believed even this would be ruinous. Yet periodical publishers are forced to stand an increase of 50 to 900 per cent.

Periodicals should be distributed as freely as possible. The Post Office Department is for public service, not for profit. Yet the mailing rate fixed for periodicals under the postal zone law is the highest of all freight rates—higher even than express rates.

A comparison of quotations of rates under the "zone" system will readily convince anyone of the injustice to periodicals and their readers:

Low Express Rate per pound on Perishable Foods		High U. S. Gov't Rate per pound on Clean, Neat Periodicals
	OHIO TO NEW YORK CITY
2 3/4 c.	Butter or Chickens.....	5c.
	INDIANA TO NEW YORK CITY
3 1/2 c.	Eggs or Chickens.....	6c.
	WISCONSIN TO NEW YORK CITY
3 9/10 c.	Honey per section (approx. 1 section per lb.)...	6c.
	ARKANSAS TO NEW YORK CITY
4 6/10 c.	Nuts.....	7c.
	TEXAS TO NEW YORK CITY
6 3/10 c.	Nuts.....	9c.
	SEATTLE, WASH., TO NEW YORK CITY
7c.	Fresh Fish (packed in ice gross weight 15 lbs)...	10c.

This means strangling the periodicals, for the increased cost is prohibitive to multitudes of readers. It means ruin for many periodicals.

It means restricted circulation for all others. It attacks the whole mechanism of merchandising through advertising, and penalizes the reading public.

Write to your Congressman and Senators about it. A booklet giving full information about this law will be sent to anyone requesting it of the Christian Herald.

Patriotism That Sacrifices

THAT "blood is thicker than water" is a good old saying which generally holds true. But in the spirit of these times and upon the issue now at stake, the alien enemy among us who is not wholeheartedly with us is the most detestable and dangerous of all enemies. Against all who by reason of their enemy birth, connections or sympathies are naturally under suspicion of disloyalty to the United States, the espionage laws cannot be any too strictly and relentlessly enforced.

But at the same time, it is no more than just that the high quality of loyalty to liberty which breaks the old bonds of blood and asserts and proves its true American patriotism and devotion, should be recognized with full appreciation.

America is a melting pot in which many peoples of many nations and races have become blended. Not lineage, but loyalty, is the true test.

The Trinity Evangelical Lutheran Church of St. Louis, founded seventy years ago, and said to be the oldest church of that denomination in the United States, voted last week to discontinue the use of the German language. The Holy Cross Lutheran School also decided to discontinue the use of German, making the twenty-second and last Lutheran school in the city to take this action.

This worthy action, involving sacrifice prompted by patriotism, is not to be overlooked. Most of us, who have nothing of established custom to give up in order to express our loyalty, are apt too lightly to estimate the patriotism that rises to voluntary sacrifice of customs formerly held harmless and sacred.

Venetia Enslaved by the Teutons

An Appalling Record of the Crimes That Followed the Conquest of Italy's Beautiful Province

By REV. ALEXANDER ROBERTSON, D.D., Venice

VENETIA, a large part of which is now unhappily in the hands of the Austrians and Germans, I happen to know very well, and not the country only, but the people who dwelt there. And it is truly heartrending to see what has befallen them and their properties. Perhaps, the words of the prophet Joel, combined with those found inscribed on an Assyrian tablet, best convey a general idea of it: "A fire devoureth before them, and behind them a flame burneth. The land is as the garden of Eden before them, and behind them a desolate wilderness. Before their face the people shall be much pained; all faces shall gather blackness." "I strawed the earth with their bodies, as if they had been beasts of the field. I took their cities in possession. I led them away captive. I carried away all their goods and their treasures. I burned their cities with fire. I made of them heaps and a desolation. I laid upon them the grievous yoke of my dominion."

What the locusts did the Germans have done. They have turned a "Garden of Eden" into a "desolate wilderness." What the Assyrians did they have done. They have taken the cities of Venetia into their possession. They have led many people away captive, and upon those that remain they have laid the grievous yoke of their dominion, and they have carried away all their goods and treasures.

LET me speak shortly of these two things: first of what has befallen the people, and secondly of what has befallen their goods. The Germans have divided the portion of Venetia they occupy into five districts. In the center of each is a well-known town, after which the district is named. These are Udine, Cividale, Gemona, Tolmezzo and Pordenone. To these there falls to be added the great Dolomite region of Cadore, so well known to American travelers. Each of these districts has its staff of officials, and over all is the commander-in-chief, who has his headquarters in Udine, and who issues the rules and laws to be enforced upon the people. Some of these laws are: (1) All men, women and children above fifteen years of age are obliged to work in the fields every day, including Sunday, from 4 A.M. till 8 P.M., but to be given half an hour's rest in the morning, one hour and a half at midday, and half an hour in the afternoon. (2) Men who are lazy at their work will be superintended by a German official, and when the agricultural work is over will be imprisoned for six months and every third day be fed on bread and water. (3) Women who are lazy will be taken out of Italy and forced to work. When the work is over they will be imprisoned for six months. (4) Children who are lazy will be beaten with a stick. (5) The commander reserves to himself the right to punish all lazy workmen by giving them twenty strokes with a stick.

The groups of officials in each of the five districts and in Cadore are rigidly enforcing these rules. "Agricultural work" does not mean necessarily working in the fields. It consists in digging trenches, throwing up embankments, making fortifications, and doing other military labor. From time to time one or two Italians who were installed by the Germans as motor-car drivers and officers' servants, manage to escape across the Piave and so to Venice. From them we learn the miserable condition of these once happy and prosperous farmers and peasants. They are simply slaves, and badly treated as such, for their masters have little interest in preserving them in health, or even in life.

Signor Guidica, a Venetian merchant, assures us that at Zenson, on the Piave, where the Germans attempted to cross the river, they forced women and children to go in front of them. Their hope was that the Italians would refrain from firing and allow them to cross. This they could not do, and so not a few of these poor helpless creatures were killed. Two men, one a soldier and one a civilian, who escaped across the Piave on the night of February 10, not only confirm all I have said, but have given us many more sad instances of Austro-German cruelty. Not only have the people to slave all day, but even their nights are by no means secure. They tell us how of an evening a group of Austrian or German soldiers will come to a house, and entering (for the doors are not barred) call out, "We have come to have some pleasure." The family may be in bed. That does not matter. They have to get up, light a fire and candles, clear a room or the kitchen, and entertain these soldiers. They have to sing, or play, and if there are young girls the soldiers seize them and force them to dance with them and not unfrequently to spend the night with them. All of the people, young and old, are not only forced to work as slaves, but they are badly clothed and badly fed. They actually suffer from hunger and from cold.

SO far as I have been able to judge, from long and almost yearly sojourns among them, the tone of morality among them is very high. Summer after summer my wife took with her a large supply of portions of Scripture, the Gospels, Epistles, and a little book containing our Lord's discourses and the Gospel in shops, in stores and barns. Nothing was to be retained. Then there was officially instituted a search for art objects. I am glad to say that a month before war was declared, all the pictures of Titian, Cima, Pordenone and other masters were removed to Florence and Rome. Also the famous Giorgione at Castelfranco and many art objects from the museum at Cividale. Then, after war was declared, the supreme military commander, with the consent of the Minister of War, began the systematic removal of historic and art objects from churches, local museums, and municipalities. But as this was said to alarm the people, it was too quickly stopped. Then art objects in private houses were untouched. The result is, that the Germans are boasting of the number of pictures, missals, codices, miniatures, enamels, porcelains and other valuables they have secured, of which an exhibition has been opened in Berlin.

Another class of objects plentiful throughout Venetia was articles of copper and bronze. As travelers know, almost all cooking vessels in Italy are made of copper, and so are all the caldrons used in farm and dairy work. Also, as in Venice, so throughout Venetia, the pails used in carrying water are of bright copper. These have all been seized by the Germans. They have also robbed the churches of their bronze bells, and even carried off bronze statues, such as the large equestrian one of King Victor Emmanuel II, which adorned the chief square in Udine (the Piazza Vittorio Emanuele II). Americans know well two classes of articles, bronzinos and brides' chests. The former are beautifully shaped vessels of bronze, and the latter are made of thick carved walnut. Both classes of objects have an intrinsic and an antique value, being generally one or two centuries old. These, and all kinds of antique furniture, have been carried off.

SO far, the objects taken, with the exception of food supplies, were not such as to endanger life, nor even create insupportable hardships. But now objects have been taken from the poor people which do both. I quote the words of the two escaped Italians to whom I have already referred: "With the pretense of searching for disguised Italian prisoners, or for Austrian deserters, a group of German soldiers go at midnight to a house. If the proprietor does not resist, they simply steal things and go away. If resistance is offered, the inmates are beaten and arrested for having insulted the Kaiser's uniform. When there is nothing worth stealing, the soldiers abuse the women, irrespective of youth or of advanced years. Hundreds of houses have been abandoned. These they sack completely, carrying off not only everything they find in them, but the very doors and windows and floor tiles and roofing, leaving only bare walls. The officers make a particular search for crystal and for linen and lace and silk goods. These they carefully pack and send to their families." In one word, the enemy has made of Friuli, Cadore and the parts of Venetia he occupies, a second Belgium.

Germany and the Germans have certainly gained much; yet, whatever may be the feelings we entertain toward them, envy need not be one. Many months ago a cartoon represented a meeting between the Kaiser and King Albert of Belgium, when the Kaiser said: "Albert, you see you have lost all." Albert replied: "Not my soul." This recalls to the mind our Lord's words: "What is a man (or a nation) profited, if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul?" And we know that even the world, such a man and such a nation cannot keep. "Fret not thyself because of evil-doers, neither be thou envious against the workers of iniquity. For they shall soon be cut down like the grass, and wither as the green herb. Trust in the Lord, and do good; so shall thou dwell in the land, and verily thou shalt be fed."

THERE has been little change in the military situation on the Italian front during the last two weeks, although rumors have been current of an expected Austro-German offensive. Late cablegrams from Rome report intermittent artillery activity on the Asiago plateau and at various points in the Lergareno valley, with occasional attacks by enemy detachments, all of which, however, were repulsed. The Italians, together with French and British troops cooperating, seem to be confident of their ability to hold their lines. A number of aerial fights have taken place. There would seem to be no immediate prospect of a renewal of the artillery attack on Venice.

A Prayer for Venice

By

W. Livingston Larned

A PRAYER for Venice. . . May the Fire
Of War beat 'round it, helplessly;
The sword's keen thrust and sudden ire
Leave this fair realm of Romance free.
We cannot ever countenance the thought
Of Venice, in the bloody Maelstrom caught!
(Her skies are beautiful to see,
Woven of tapestries of red and gold;
And little boats, like Argosies of Light,
Forever come and go—and paths are bright
That, when the World was Young, were Old.)

A Prayer for Venice. . . May the Rage
Of War find here a poignant shame!
Or, Pity that is shown for Age
Hold back the Hot Breath of its Flame.
We cannot see these peaceful ways laid bare,
And only smouldering Ruin scattered there!
(Her Nights are rich Brocades of Song,
And tho' Love had been dead for years,
It stirs within the troubled breast.
Old Memories Time had put to rest
Awake, to Consecrate our tears.)

A Prayer for Venice. . . May the Dread
Of Grim Dawns, draped in Cannon-Mist
Leave here no black mark of its dead;
Nor foul the altars we have kissed.
We cannot bear the thought of Venice, prone,
So many Holy Centuries she's known.
(Her bright canals and tiny shops;
The Sunshine, woven in her hair:
More Shrine than City—wondrous place,
With Reverence shining in its Face!
"KEEP VENICE SACRED," is our Prayer!)

of St. Luke, for distribution. These were not only always accepted readily, but the people came to our house to ask for them, and those who got them this year would show us their copies the next, often bearing marks that proved they had been read and reread.

Now I must state a lamentable thing. Austria and Germany are deliberately trying to demoralize and debauch these people! What I have already said of the visits paid to their houses at night by Austrian and German soldiers proves that, but that is not all. Low cinematographic shows are opened in all the towns and villages (a thing unknown before) and girls and women have to go with soldiers to them. Also at Udine, depraved singing and dancing women have been imported from Vienna, who perform nightly in the newly opened theatres. I once heard Mr. Gladstone say at a great public meeting: "It would be impossible to lay your finger on a spot in Europe and say, 'Here Austria has done good.'" And now the same might be said of Germany. It is a sad thing that these nations develop the worst side of their subject peoples.

Profiting by article 3, many women and girls have been deported into Austria and Germany. Indeed, members of families that my wife and I knew well—some of whom have worked for us in their own homes and in our house at Venice—have been so dealt with. Their fate can be imagined, but not described.

NATURALLY, all arms had to be surrendered at once. One can understand that as a legitimate military measure. But not the following order, that all food had to be given up—food in private houses,

TEXT—I Chron. 12:33, "Of Zebulun, such as went forth to battle, expert in war, with all instruments of war, . . . which could keep rank; they were not of double heart."

TO encounter this living passage in these statistical chapters is as though one were looking through a pile of receipted bills and suddenly discovered a love letter! Or it is as though one were going through the Tower of London, moving amid the mere semblances of warriors, and were suddenly to come face to face with a living soldier!

It is a eulogistic description of warriors in the days of old. I want to transfer the description to the Kingdom of God, and to regard it as portraying the characteristics of all true soldiers of the Christ. It will be only a further elaboration of a favorite New Testament figure. The army, the soldier, active fight, all afford common metaphors to the apostle Paul. "Fight the good fight." "I have fought the good fight." "Put on the whole armor of God, that ye may be able to stand against the wiles of the devil."

"Expert in war." A man does not become expert in warfare immediately he enlists in the army. Nor does a man become an expert fighter in the cause of the Kingdom as soon as he has surrendered his life to the Lord. At the first we are only clumsy warriors, and we often fight in a way which would ensure our certain defeat if the warfare were waged on the ordinary field. We are often ignorant in our fighting, or thoughtless, or ill-informed, or rash, or we have no plan of campaign. We sometimes half condemn and half justify men by the apology that they are "all right, but they go about it in a foolish way." Or we say that a man's heart is all right, but he is wanting in common discernment. And so much has to be done before we can become expert campaigners under the banner of the Cross. How, then, can we become proficient?

FIRST of all, it is admirable exercise to study past campaigns. Napoleon was the most careful student that the world has ever known of the great generals of the past. He was continually busying himself in their plans of campaign, in their mode of approach, in their manner of fighting, and the means by which they husbanded their triumphs. And surely it would be equally wise for spiritual warriors to become familiar with the great soldiers of other days. It would be a rare education to study the apostle Paul; to note how he went about his work, what plans he made, what strategies he fashioned, and how he secured his victories. Or we may take a man like Moody, or Drummond, and carefully watch his doings as he approaches a soul and engages in contest for the Lord. Or it may be that we have some intimate friend who is rarely gifted with the power of winning his fellows for Christ. Let us be willing to be instructed, and diligently study how he sets about it, and by what means he overcomes the adversaries which lie in his way. Let us study past campaigns.

Then, if we are to be expert in war, we must be masterly in the use of changing tactics, alternating them as occasion requires. A great general has recently said that "tactics should be changed every ten years." The change should be far more frequent in the warfare of the kingdom. It sometimes appears to me as though every man required individual approach, and our tactics must be shaped accordingly. I think it is unwise to treat all people alike, and to rigorously follow one plan of campaign. It is unwise to employ no other ministry than tracts, making it a habit to give tracts to everybody.

Some people are repelled by the ministry, and Satan's chances are increased. I think it is very unwise to seek to win children in the same way as we should set about the conquest of hardened reprobates. It is not necessary to have a penitent bench and all the implements of a revival mission. We can surely use simpler methods, and by the simplicity far more effectually accomplish our aims. I am perfectly sure that many a devoted soldier loses many a battle just for want of reasonable tactics; his methods are too rigid and too uniform, and he has not the requisite adaptability to reach the manifold temperaments of men.

AND it must ever be remembered by every man who wants to be expert in war that in dull drill is laid the foundation of all military strength and power. What is done upon the private parade-ground has a very intimate relationship to what is done in the open field. The obscure drill is directly related to the public struggle. When I am diligent in drilling my body, and "keeping it under," subduing all its appetites and passions, and allowing no carnal craving to usurp the sovereignty of the life, I am acquiring facilities by which I shall render splendid service on the field.

And it is even so with the drilling of the mind. Let us settle it with ourselves that the Lord can use us better when we offer him our best. A well-drilled mind is a better instrument than a mind obtuse and only half awake. It is a splendid thing for young people to resolve that they will discipline their minds so as to be able to offer a fine organ to the Captain of their salvation. Every bit of honest drill is well invested labor. Many a man fails in conflict with the public devil because of inefficient preparation.

And to mention only one other requirement if we are to become expert in war—we must attend to the continuity of our supplies. A good warrior has not only a line of operation; he keeps open his line of communication. He sees to it that while he is at the front the roadways are kept open by which he can be supplied with ammunition and food. And we soldiers of the Kingdom are poor fighters if we go unfed. We need to be continually fed with inspiration—that is, with power. And we need to be continually fed with revelation—that is, with light. And these things cannot be accomplished unless we keep "open to God." A good soldier must see to it that the communications remain unblocked, and that he "prays without ceasing."

WITH all instruments of war." The experience of these old-world soldiers covered every variety of instrument, and they were able to use any particular one which was most fitted for their immediate purpose. I have already referred to the use of manifold tactics, and it is only a re-emphasis of this which I wish now to enforce. There are many instruments which we can use, and we must be expert in the use of all. For instance, there is the instrument of speech. A man is becoming finely accomplished when he can wield this instrument deftly and well. A really expert soldier of Jesus can speak a word and slay a foe. To know just when to speak, and how to speak, is one of the finest attainments of the soul.

There are occasions when speech would be quite ineffective, and when silence is terribly destructive. We can slay an unclean jest by withholding our applause. We can put people to healthy shame by "answering nothing." "Jesus stooped and wrote on the ground," and the conscience-stricken men stole away one by one!

And then there is the instrument of kindness. There is magnificent destructiveness in this sanctified weapon. "If thine enemy hunger, feed him!" Yes, it is marvelously true, we can "kill by kindness!" There are other implements which I need not name; these which have been mentioned shall stand as typical of the rest. We must be diligent in tactics; we must drill ourselves in the use of them, and thus become expert in "all instruments of war."

"Which could keep rank." What an accomplishment! They could fight alongside other people. They could keep step with other soldiers; they could obey common orders. What a grace, I say! There are some people who cannot work with other people. They declare that they like a committee of one! They cannot "keep rank."

There is a word of the apostle Paul which always seems to me to be fragrant with sweet and blessed eulogy. "I beseech thee also, true yokefellow." It is one of the finest compliments that the great apostle could pay to his fellow. Here was some friend of Paul's who was a splendid companion to work with! He was a grand sharer of the yoke! He could work in pairs, and the one whose burden he shared felt the graciousness of his service. "And other of my fellow laborers, whose names are written in the Book of Life." They were all able to "keep rank," and they were splendid comrades in a common cause.

NOW there is one thing which greatly helps a regiment to "keep rank," and that is a band of music. And I know of nothing which is more helpful to comradeship in the army of the Lord than the spirit of praise. If we sang more together we should better keep step together. Our very hymn-books are proof of how we can keep rank to the accompaniment of song. In the fervor of praise many apparent incongruities become fused into a gracious union.

"They were not of double heart." These warriors of Israel did not wear one uniform, and carry on secret intrigue with the foe. And so with the expert warriors of the Lord, they do not serve God and mammon. In the true soldier there is no alien affection pulling back his reluctant feet. A man who goes out to fight for the Lord must be single-minded, and must not leave his heart behind in treasure which is buried elsewhere.

"A double-minded man is unstable in all his ways." He cannot be depended upon either day or night, in the trying hour of waiting or in the strenuous season of battle. "His heart is not in it," and therefore he cannot fight with the certain confidence of victory. "If thine eye be single, thy whole body shall be full of light."

DAILY MEDITATION

E. W. Caswell and
Prof. W. H. T. Dau

The Influence of a High Aim

SUNDAY, May 5. Phil. 3:14. "I press toward the mark." And that mark was Christ! The apostle pressed forward to the seizure of his vast inheritance, the full fellowship of the Saviour, the unbroken communion with his Lord. That was the mark which blazed before this man's eyes both night and day. Every other interest was only on the road to this, and had to be taken on the way to the greater. If there was anything which could not be taken on the way, the apostle left it behind. That was his test of everything: Can I take it with me toward the mark? Will it join my ranks and march with me on my eager journey? Yes? Come away, then! No? Then not all the worldly lures on this planet will make me tarry by the way! I must leave them all behind. I count all things but refuse that I may win Christ!

It was this severe singleness of aim which gave the apostle's life such terrific force. Nothing loiters on his road. Everything he does is swept into the current of his dominant purpose and shares its pace. The little things catch the spirit of the big aim. His very salutations tingle with power. His smallest fountains play with an energy which tell you they have come from the hills. And what about his biggest things? What force there is in his doxologies! And what holy violence there is in his prayers! And what intensity there is in his penitences! His one commanding aim makes every one of his activities a child of strength.

But a high aim is more than a minister of power. It is a gracious means of illumination which, like the headlights on a car, throws its beams on the road that stretches before us. A high aim is a means of provision; and when the mark is Christ it endows the soul with the rich and companionable powers of sight, and insight, and foresight. A high aim is, perhaps, not so much light as sight; with the high aim of the apostle we look at everything through the very eyes of the Lord.

One further thing may be said. A glorious aim reacts in vitalizing ministry upon the entire being. It is curative. A big holy aim is very hostile to the petty ailments of the mind, as it is also very destructive of the mean diseases of the heart. And through a healthier mind and heart we give ourselves a chance of more exuberant physical health. Perhaps it is true, in a larger way than we usually think, that "He shall quicken your mortal bodies by his Spirit that dwelleth in you." J. H. J.

A Place Prepared

MONDAY, May 6. John 14:2. "In my Father's house are many mansions: if it were not so, I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you." Who can look at the heavens, says a Christian writer, without thinking of these words of Jesus? In the hour of parting from his disciples, as he is about to return to the home whence he came, he invites them to regard his home as theirs. He has made it their home by his sacrificial life and death.

While the Jews were breaking down the temple of his body in which he had chosen to dwell, he was building a house for his followers, eternal in the heavens, which is to afford room for all who accept the guarantee of his word that it was built for them.

These words of Jesus raise our eyes longingly to the mansions of the blest. Some day the fetters that bind our aching hearts to this earth will be struck from us, and, released from bondage to the flesh, our soul shall soar upward and enter the beautiful palace of our Lord. In the light of the beautiful hope which these words of our Forerunner rouse earth's joys grow dim and the luster of its glories pales in the radiance that streams from those stately halls where the saints made perfect walk in the presence of their Redeemer, in the joy and freedom that has no end.

This promise of Christ shatters with its powerful rays the gloom of night that settles on the believer in his dying hour and turns it into the dawn of the morning of eternity. W. H. T. D.

Abiding Influence

TUESDAY, May 7. 1 John 2:17. "The world passeth away, and the lust thereof; but he that doeth the will of God abideth forever." From a little distance above the earth we mortals must appear like ants, laboriously toiling, carrying mysterious burdens, building strange chambers for our treasures, wearing our lives out doing ridiculously inadequate things. Yes, but seen from a greater distance there is another aspect of life. He who put us here endowed us with a desire for permanence, a longing for unbroken continuance of influence, an insatiable instinct to build for eternity. "Thou has put eternity in our hearts." It is an almost universal impulse to endeavor to project our lives into the future, to lay hold on something changeless. Christianity answers this longing, saying, "It is only one world that passes away, the outer world; there is another world, an inner world, that is imperishable. Live in it and for it. Grow rich in it, build nobly for it. Ally yourselves with forces that abide." This is the message of the words, "He that doeth the will of God abideth forever." Did he that wrote these words abide forever? The fact that we read them today answers the question. Jesus said of a certain woman, "Whosoever this Gospel is preached, there shall what this woman hath done be told." Is it not so? To a little band of obscure men who followed him, Jesus said "Ye are a city set upon a hill." The world has looked to that city and to that hill for eighteen centuries. A humble woman served the poor in Joppa, and we know her name, and rejoice in her resurrection. A boy with a luncheon-basket offered his bread and fish to feed the Master and the Master's friends, and that deed is immortal. A rich man offered his family burial-vault for the sepulcher of a crucified Carpenter, and lo! all our hopes of immortality bloom in that garden. C. C. A.

Mother

WEDNESDAY, May 8. Prov. 6:20. "Forbear not the law of thy mother." Between Easter and Children's Day, how beautiful to observe a Mother's Memorial Day; the white carnation, the memory flower is an emblem of the purity and fragrance in the lives of holy motherhood. Jesus, Home and Mother are words that touch the heart of the world deeper than any others. If it is an angel mother, she makes heaven more inviting; if still in the earthly home, she is the guide and unchangeable friend, moving about in sweet ministries and loving service.

A friend said to S. S. Prentice, "I congratulate the mother who has such a son." He replied, "Rather congratulate the son on having such a mother." Richter says, "To a man who has had a noble mother, all women are sacred for her sake." The mother, more than any other, affects the moral and spiritual part of the children's character. She is their constant companion and teacher in formative years. The child is ever imitating and assimilating the mother nature. It is only in after life that men gaze backward and behold how a mother's hands and heart of love molded their young lives and shaped their destiny.

No child can fully realize the intensity of a mother's anxiety as she bids good-by to the son or daughter going out of the old home to enter school or business life. She realizes that she will not be able to give counsel as in their younger days; she does not need to promise to remember them in her prayers. She cannot help praying—every breath is prayer. Oh, that the youth of America may be true to their mothers and their mothers' God! E. W. C.

Rest for the Weary

THURSDAY, May 9. Matt. 11:28. "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." There are three possible ways to find rest. One of them is by cessation of work. It is not given to many of us to rest ourselves thus, for the pressure of our unfulfilled tasks is too great. A second way to rest is by the readjustment of burdens. The scientific farmer rests the soil by the rotation of crops. The bookkeeper who grows weary of sitting at a desk, takes his books to a higher desk and writes while standing. Indians on a long journey who find it not possible to stop to rest, are said to have the habit of picking up a log or rock and carrying it along for a distance; then when they throw it down, they feel rested. They have rested some muscles by bringing into play other muscles. The third method of finding rest is by all means the most satisfactory. It is by increase of strength. Then, whatever burdens have grown heavy or whatever added burdens may be imposed we are equal to the demands made upon us. "As thy day is so shall thy strength be." The promise of the Master's words in the verse quoted above evidently points to the inward reinforcement of life: "Ye shall find rest unto your souls." Perhaps we are nearer our Saviour's words when we read the promise, "I will rest you." There are strong souls by association with whom we are mysteriously but immeasurably rested. Power flows from them to us. The charging of a storage battery is a physical symbol of what occurs when we come into contact with spirits like these. The companionship of Christ in daily life is the secret of a strength that passeth explanation. C. C. A.

Christ Our Advocate

FRIDAY, May 10. 1 John 2:1. "We have an Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous." The reconciling work of Jesus for the world was finished when he returned to sit at the right hand of the Father. Nevertheless he acts continually as the sinners' Reconciler, now that he is with the Father. The record of his finished work has been left on earth in his holy Gospel.

When the believer who has accepted the expiation of his guilt by Christ is again overtaken by a fault, or views with dismay his daily shortcomings, let him not doubt the sufficiency of the redemption of his Lord. Not only does the Gospel tell him that the grace which reclaims men from their error is renewed for them every morning and abounds over all sin, but he is assured by a text like this that his Lord and Saviour has a perpetual interest in him, and makes the atoning sacrifice which he rendered for the sinner to tell in his behalf all the time.

Again and again is the merit of Jesus' work thrown into the balance of divine justice in behalf of the sinner, and the sinner's daily justification secured. Christ the High priest of our profession is a priest forever, and his intercession in behalf of those for whom his blood was shed is also a priestly function. It is through him as our Advocate that we have access continually to the throne of grace in our supplications. And a result of his intercession for us is that we are preserved in our sonship with God the Father, and that our renewal to the image of God in spiritual knowledge and righteousness goes forward. From the ever-continuing mediation of Christ between God and man the daily life of his believers here below takes on a heavenly coloring: under every feeling of sin and infirmity believers are confident that the union which has been formed between them and God is made indissoluble by the continuous intercession of their Advocate. They need no one else to plead for them. W. H. T. D.

Self-Will

SATURDAY, May 11. Ps. 106:15. "He gave them their request, but sent leanness into their soul." Israel lusted after flesh food rather than the manna, just as people today lust after the evils of the flesh. The body may grow soft and fat and luxurious while the soul becomes thin with spiritual barrenness. Daniel practiced self-denial, refusing the king's meat, while his soul fed on the richest heavenly manna. How many choose the riches of silver even if they lose the golden glory of character!

God will not break down the wall of the will. He wants no machine goodness. When he sees a man determined on an evil course, rejecting all warnings and pleadings, he gives him over to reprobate mind. The striving of the divine Spirit ceases because the heart is hardened. After such people grow rich and prosperous, they are often deluded into thinking that God is on their side, because he has granted their request to increase in riches. They were, however, simply let alone, permitted to enter into temptation without hindrance, left free to do wrong, without the accusations of conscience or the gnawings of remorse.

When moral means have been exhausted, the will is left to rush on to the brink of ruin, where the lusts of the heart and the darling desire lead the man captive.

What a blessed transformation when the covetous lover of wealth, seeing the golden millstone sinking him into the depths of the dark waters, asserts his will power, surrenders his riches, crying out, "I come to do thy will, O God! I will make it my meat and drink, my all in all!" E. W. C.

Dr. Jowett's Farewell

REV. J. H. JOWETT delivered his farewell sermon in the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, New York, on Sunday, April 14, before returning to England. In the course of his sermon he said:

"I return to England as an ambassador of your affections, which I have been privileged to enjoy for the last seven years.

"No soldier has heard the bugle more imperatively than the summons comes to me. I am too old to fight with weapons in our sacred cause, and I can make no contribution to our material strength.

"But there are forces besides those which are supplied by munitions. The moral and spiritual forces of the nation are, after all, its manifest equipment. If the morale of a people suffer, its ideals grow dim. If its enthusiasm loses its fire, all the munitions in the world will not secure its triumph.

"I return to a country which is bleeding in sacrifice and smitten with bereavement. There is no sign of mourning in my country. All the dark trappings of grief have been discarded. But though the outward garb of sorrow is missing, the hearts of multitudes are carrying a hungry pain. I go back with eager yearning to bear to them the ministry of light and consolation."

Dr. Jowett will continue his contributions to the Christian Herald notwithstanding his change of pastorate. His Sermons and Meditations will appear regularly as heretofore.

English Women as Farm Workers

By HELEN H. HOFFMAN

WHATEVER other immediate results of war are felt today in the national life of England, one that stands out in refreshing relief to a visitor is the splendid awakening of her people to the primitive occupations of rural life.

Those who in pre-war times occupied their leisure with hours of golf, and women born to vast estates and the beauty of out-of-door life, are now successfully engaged in making their wide acres respond to intelligent cultivation and to the rearing of stock and poultry.

The growing interest and love shown by the people of the country for this new life indicate quite clearly that the new England after the war will represent a mighty change in this particular. Men and women who formerly looked upon the farmer's life as the dulllest existence possible, now express themselves as surprised that any one should refer to the farm as lacking in wholesome natural interest.

With a zest that can be measured only in terms of success England's vast army of land women are setting a new record in the employment of woman's latent ability in time of need. The old antipathy to farm work felt among young women seeking a livelihood at the various doors of interest opened to women in the last quarter century is gradually dying out. At the same time, breaking down the prejudice of the farmer to the employment of women has been in the nature of things, a slow, evolving process of education and demonstration.

In places where this condition has existed for some time a better understanding has been effected between employer and employee. A new field of industry has been added to woman's expanding ambitions for economic independence, and the farmer, too, has learned many things that he had not dreamed it possible for him to know.

On the other hand, the necessities of war have stimulated interest among thousands of householders to take up the cultivation of the soil, until today the people of England, men and women, particularly women, who knew nothing of the simple, natural life of gardening, farming and stock-raising are today among its experts.

WITH the cry of "food and more food" to feed the armies of the Allies and the army of industrial workers at home, recruiting for women to till the soil has today become a part of the huge machinery of warfare, carried on by women of experience and practical good common sense.

The army of land women has been steadily increasing in numbers, until this summer the number reached will be the largest since the war began.

After long, intimate, personal experience in this work, Mrs. Alfred Lyttelton, widow of the former brilliant member of Parliament, now serving as Deputy Commissioner of the Woman's Land Army Committee, expressed to me the greatest optimism toward this new departure for the employment of woman's ability and industry: "Many young women who went to work on farms for purely patriotic reasons have become strong supporters of this sort of work for women," said Mrs. Lyttelton. "They realize that in this normal, healthy work, a woman is gaining something that is not given to her in many other occupations. One is improved health and another is in the gaining of experience and a very particular knowledge of value that will open the door to a later success. For instance, the possibility of attaining a managership of a farm or estate, superintending the work of women farmers, or specializing in some particular branch of this work with good remuneration.

"Girls who are accepted for this work," said Mrs. Lyttelton, "are required to pass a rigid medical examination. If a girl is merely anemic this does not tell against her with us. I have seen such girls transformed, in a few months in the open, to wonderful examples of glowing health. This work has also performed wonders in the development of a girl's character. I have seen girls, serious, preoccupied, selfish, change into laughing, happy-hearted, alert young women, strong in body and content in mind."

Mrs. Lyttelton and her group of able assistants in this huge work have encountered every objection and every difficulty that arose in the adaptation of girls to the land life, and, one after one these problems have been carefully taken up and successfully mastered.

One of the chief objections to farm work, an objection not confined by any means to this new work being done in different parts of the country, is a monthly magazine devoted to their interests. It is known as the Landswoman. It contains technical articles on various subjects of general interest to land workers, photographs of the girl workers and letters from many of them relating their experiences and their progress on the farm.

ONE thing the farmer has learned is that women are especially fitted for caring for stock. Why shouldn't this be so? They make pets of the animals by the very great attention paid to them, and no farmer has ever complained of the lack of care bestowed by his women farm hands upon the members of the barnyard family. I think this is one of the things that has served very largely in converting the farmer to a strong faith in his new helper. Another thing the farmer has learned in setting aside an old prejudice against the woman farmer is that she is conscientious in her work and that she can be depended upon to look out for the innumerable little details involved in carrying on this work, until today the farmer has a high respect for the woman who helps to carry on the work of his farm.

While today most of these girls can boast of a six weeks' special training arranged for by the committee, yet the first few weeks of the girl farmer at actual work represents the crisis in her new career. But the percentage of those who feel that the work is too taxing or that country life is not preferable to city employment and who quit during the first or second months is small indeed. For the less restricted life of the country with its variety of interests appeals strongly to the girl from the town who has known the routine of office, kitchen or shop.

One of the strongest objections to this class of work by the girls themselves made a few years ago, was the remuneration. But gradually the committee has been working for an increase in wage, and at the same time, looking to the future benefit of the girl by the employment of efficiency tests at intervals.

One of the high testimonials of the work of women farmers comes from no less a person than Queen Mary, who has shown a decided interest in the several girls employed on the royal estates. "These girls have shown an aptitude for gardening and the care of stock that is truly wonderful," her Majesty told a member of the committee.

In not a few cases where a farmer has been loath to employ women helpers his admiration finally for the work and character of his woman helper has led to matrimony. In many other instances women farmers, grown to prefer country life to any other, have married discharged soldiers and settled on farms of their own. I believe women will always hereafter be actively identified with the carrying on of the land and stock-raising. They have proven that they are peculiarly fitted for this work, and they realize that it is one of the healthiest occupations for women and that the independence that goes with such work is something to be desired.

IN addition to the big army of salaried land women there is an ever-increasing number of women cultivating the soil who have merely taken this up for their own personal benefit. That is to say, for the growing of vegetables for the home table. Most all of these women declare that a couple of hours each day spent in the garden has improved their health immeasurably.

The desire on the part of the home women for gardening has been met by the government through the Board of Agriculture, which has arranged to provide applicants with suitable allotments.

That some arrangement will be effected whereby all those who care to continue gardening or farming on a small scale after the war appears to be within the limits of reasonable expectation. At any rate, the woman farmer, introduced by the exigencies of war, is no longer an adventure, but a pleasant reality.

The motor plow eats work but it drinks gasoline and chews oil. This lady of the land is oiling her faithful steed condition that has arisen among these girls in England, is the loneliness of country life for young people. This objection has been met in a large measure by the women, who have gone deeply into every phase of this new life.

As was the experience of men farm helpers in many communities where the farmer's family could offer no accommodation for housing them, the girls have had to solve this difficulty in many instances. And a very happy solution of the problem has been worked out by the girls, frequently with the help of the local Land Committees. Where this situation has arisen, girls from neighboring farms have joined in making a club and a home for themselves by leasing a small house convenient for all and sharing the expense of its support. This arrangement has proven highly satisfactory to a large number of girls through the country and has added materially to the brightness of their lives. To give a further personal touch to this work there are the traveling inspectors who keep in touch with the army of workers, through district committees, composed of women of leisure, who devote their time to this work, so that every girl farmer feels that she is actually always in touch with the organization, and in this way can communicate any desire or suggestion that she has to make.

THE Welfare section of this work, of which Mrs. Margaret Hughes is the head, represents another strong link between the girl and the city she has left. Hundreds of letters from the girls find their way to Mrs. Hughes's desk in the course of a week. Many of them contain requests of a varied nature. Others write for information as to how other girls are progressing in their work, and the advice of others is sought by the girls themselves regarding little things they encounter in their work. In looking after the personal interests of the girls, Mrs. Hughes has brought happiness to scores of these farmers by acting as shopper for them. Sometimes it is for ribbons or yarns or materials for a new gown, or even bits of household articles for the girls who undertake to fit themselves up a bit of home by clubbing together.

The newest medium of interest supplied by the organization for the purpose of keeping the girls more closely in touch with each other and the variety of

How Our Women Help to Win the War

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

VERY few people know how bravely the women of America have risen to their emergency—how efficiently and gallantly they have met the revised economic conditions. To the average on-looker, the woman who knits gray socks and khaki-colored sweaters is the only real war worker, and the woman who uses no wheat flour is the only one who is helping Hoover. And yet government bulletins—official ones—tell a vastly different story—a story that has to do with farm labor, and Liberty Bonds, and scientific cooking, and reconstruction work, and Naval Reserve departments.

NOW that the spring is here perhaps the most important branch of our Women's War Work is the Women's Land Army of America. The system is like that which has been so widespread and successful in England, and while in the opinion of the committee, it may not be feasible in the very different agricultural conditions in our Western states, it may prove of great value where farms are small and agriculture intensive.

It is also through the work of women that the "U. S. School Garden Army" has been started. Women have promised that their children shall be given a garden and taught to make things grow. In San Francisco alone eight thousand women have pledged themselves to see that some one particular child joined the War Garden Army. Many little children across the sea will be kept from starving by the efforts of the children of America.

THE girl-employees of the United States Shipping Board and Emergency Fleet Corporation have adopted a costume of forestier green that is neat, cool, and attractive. Girl ambulance drivers and chauffeurs are wearing khaki-colored uniforms. Munition and factory workers have their standardized dress. And standardization of women's clothes as a war economy measure will be urged at the biennial meeting of the General Federation of Woman's Clubs to be held in Hot Springs, Ark., from the 29th of April to May 8.

"With every month of the war, with increasing labor, expense and responsibilities," says an editorial in the current issue of the official magazine of the organization, "every intelligent woman in the country longs to be released from any form of slavery to clothes. We are learning to look with respect upon uniforms when worn by men and women in the proper way, and the uniform style of street clothes is as inevitable as some of the other things brought about by the war."

To quote further: "Revolutions in the manner of dressing have always followed great wars. The fashion in men's as well as women's garments changed and varied in accordance with styles set by the court until the French revolution and its expression of democracy. Since then, they have adopted a style of dressing which from year to year changes in minor detail but not in form.

"In women's wear nothing like this has prevailed. And it is our fault. First, because we have made clothes a pastime—a part of the competitive social procedure; second, because we have been willing to remain in ignorance of the causes which produce certain effects, and neglected to learn the principles of economies related to the business of buying; third, because, while rebelling at the waste of time and money entailed in following the fashion, we have not been sufficiently courageous to break away from our traditional ways of approaching the clothes problem. Standardization is a principle, not a uniform; it does not mean adopting a single form of dress for that is not, somewhere in the United Kingdom, being performed by women.

(2) Since it is the desire of the Manager of the Naval Aircraft Factory not to employ men of draft age unless necessary and since it is probable that male labor will become increasingly needed, if not for the army, then for other government production, it is respectfully recommended that special ratings on the Schedule of Wages at the Labor Board of the Philadelphia Navy Yard be opened to women for the Naval Aircraft Factory only.

Rutgers College of New Jersey has offered to give any ten women who apply to them a short course in tractor operation. This is another new branch of service for women, and still another is the organization of a Service Corps of trained alumnae, ready to go to any part of the world in War Service, which has been organized by the girls and former students of Bryn Mawr College. The War Service will send trained women not only to France but also to Italy, the Balkans, and possibly to Russia. The workers will be doctors, nurses, and social workers who are capable of doing any sort of work that may be rendered.

COOKING has always been a woman's business. That business, in this time of meatless Tuesdays and wheatless Thursdays and economical everydays, is not an easy one. But the State College of Agriculture at Cornell University, working with the government, sends out on request many bulletins helpful to the housewife.

LAST but not least comes the work women are doing in behalf of the Liberty Loan. On April 6, ten thousand Liberty Loan meetings were held. Approximately that number of women spoke at them. Increased co-operation between the National Woman's Liberty Loan Committee and the Liberty Loan Committees organized under the Federal Reserve banks has produced splendid results. And it is announced, as an example, that 75 per cent. of the women's bonds taken in Washington were purchased by women in the government service. This statement is made by Mrs. Karl F. Kollernan, in charge of the campaign. The women in government service took over $1,284,000 worth of Liberty Bonds of the second issue, an average of a $100 bond for every woman in Federal employ at Washington.

This is a very brief outline of the work that our women are doing to help the nation in its time of need. It is such a tremendous work that one is unable to give anything but a brief outline of it, and it is being carried on in a quiet and tremendously efficient way. American women are doing things that no women have ever before dreamed of doing.

"Women," says a certain war bulletin, "are the buyers for the world. Women are the conservers."

And we, who are watching the women of our country, would like to add that women should be hailed, with the fighting men, as the saviors of the world.

THEY came, with eyes that were dazed and dull,
To a land of Liberty;
Came to a land where folk might live,
A land that was "of the free."
They carried packs on their tired backs,
And their shoulders bent with dread;
They did not know what the land might be
That lay like a path ahead.

They stayed, and their eyes grew bright with faith—
With faith in their fellowmen;
And some found work with a pick of steel,
And some with a flaming pen.
And they challenged dread with an upflung head,
And a proudly singing soul;
For the stranger land had come to be
A road with a shining goal!

And then there sounded a call, and they Looked up from their work and knew
That dread and fear had come creeping back,
While the sighing war wind blew.
Silently then, the pick and pen
Were laid in the dust aside,
For the land was changed from a path and goal,
To a land of men, who died!

Their eyes looked back o'er the troubled sea,
Eyes that had once been dazed;
And they saw a Europe spent and worn—
Its altars and temples razed.
And the ones who might went back, to fight,
Over the ocean foam;
And the rest bought bonds that they might help
The land that they now called HOME!

every single occasion, but it does mean that women ought to accept a form of street clothes as unchangeable as the man's suit.

"We are only discussing street clothes, not house clothes. There should be a place where a woman can express her personality and where she can use the delightfully beautiful fabrics of the present day."

THE Naval Aircraft Factory at Philadelphia has opened its doors to Women. The order was approved by Secretary of the Navy Daniels, and the Civil Service Commission so notified its district secretary. I am quoting from their letter:

The Measure of a Man

By GRACE LIVINGSTON HILL LUTZ

Author of "The Witness"

CHAPTER VI

BUT Harley did not return that night nor the next morning. The chauffeur returned at mid night to say that he had found no clue to the young master. He had even ventured so far as to call at the door and ask to speak with the young lady; but she had declared most decidedly that she knew nothing of his whereabouts. He was very sore about that lost ten dollars. It seemed somehow that he had been ill-used. Nobody had thought to save him any supper, either.

Janet, as she stood at the door and watched the chauffeur out of sight, had pondered deeply. Aunt Nan had reported how Mrs. Bruce had asked about Harley. What was the meaning of it all? Had Harley left home in a huff? Had his mother perhaps said something about her? And why did they think he was here? Did his mother feel that she, Janet, had spirited him away? Was that the explanation of the two calls that afternoon? Janet's cheeks grew rosy and she held her head high as she came back into the house. She was thoughtful all the rest of the evening. She was glad again that she was going away for a little while. But her last thought before she slept was to wonder where Harley had gone.

The next few days were full of delight, going to the shore with Mary, and bringing her back for a visit first at Aunt Nan's, and then back to the Springdale house, from which point Mary made a formal call one afternoon on Mrs. Bruce and was much relieved to find her out with all her guests.

The visit stretched out over nearly two weeks. The two girls roamed the woods, and drove about the country with Aunt Nan having most delightful times; and including now and then some of Janet's girl friends from the village. But never once did they see or hear of Harley Bruce; nor did Janet mention him. Mary wondered a little about it, but was too good a friend to ask questions. Finally, the day came when Mary had to leave to fulfil another engagement of long standing, and Janet was left at home again with her mother.

Somehow the sharpness of the cut that Mrs. Bruce had given had worn dull in the happy days Janet had passed with her friend. She did not dread quite so much lest she might meet the woman on the street. Moreover, it was rumored that the Bruces were off on an extended motor trip at present, so for the present there was no danger of any more annoyance in that direction. Janet wondered much about Harley. Had he returned yet, and was he on the trip with them, or what had become of him?

She was lying in the hammock out in the cool darkness of the pines thinking thus over that first evening after Mary left, when suddenly she became aware of a rosy light that was growing brighter and stronger every minute and throwing the deep shadows on the lawn into weird relief. She had scarcely had time to wonder what it meant when a wild cry, "Fire! Fire! Fire!" burst upon the soft night air and was followed by other voices taking it up, and the bustling hurry of a small town in excitement tearing to the scene of a fire.

JANET rushed to the gate, but could see nothing but a great light in the sky, for the thick hedge and heavy growth of tall trees shut off the view. The fire was in the direction of the Bruces, however, and seemed very near. She turned and rushed back into the house and up-stairs to a third-story window, which gave a wide view above the tree tops, calling to her mother as she went. Mrs. Grayson followed her and they watched together at the window as the long red flames leaped up and dyed the sky. It was the Bruce house. The whole west wing was aflame. It must have been burning some minutes before it had leaped into light and warned the town.

It looked like a great, beautiful set piece of pyrotechnics, with its classic white pillars, stately verandas, and wide-spreading roof. One could not think that the beautiful old house would burn, it had been there so many years and seemed so substantial, so much a part of the scenery, as if it were somehow immortal. Yet the flames were leaping over it joyously, piercing now in little gleeful flames through the very roof and licking round the pillars hungrily. Janet could hear the snap and crackle of the fire, the breaking of the window-panes as the flames conquered one by one. They could see wild figures dashing through the rooms, and things being thrown out the windows, and crashing on the m  le below.

"Do you suppose there is any one there but the servants?" Janet asked her mother in an awed whisper.

"I don't know," said Mrs. Grayson. "Hannah thought she heard a car come home about five o'clock when you were down at the train with Mary. They may have returned. I don't suppose there is anything we can do. Perhaps we ought to walk up that way and tell some one to offer our services if there is anything that's wanted."

"Oh, mother! Must we? They have enough to help them. It isn't likely anybody stayed in the house, or got hurt or anything. Oh, mother! Isn't it awful that a house can burn up that way and just not be any more? I'll go if you think we should, but what could we do?"

"We'll go down to the gate and ask some one. There'll be people coming back pretty soon," said Mrs. Grayson.

They went down-stairs.

"Hark! That's the Rosedale engine coming to help!" cried Janet.

A MAN on horseback came riding back from the fire madly, urging his horse to a gallop. The crowd made way for him. Some one cried out to him, and he answered.

"He says some one was hurt, mother! I'm sure I heard him say some one was hurt—burned. I think he said! He is going for the doctor!" She clutched wildly at her mother's arm. "Mother, I guess we'd better go and see."

"No, wait, dear! We couldn't possibly do anything. If some one is hurt they ought to be brought here. This is the nearest house. There's John Patterson. Call to him. Tell him to bring any one here who is hurt."

Mrs. Grayson hurried into the house and in a few minutes more Janet came in.

"They are bringing her, mother. It is—Mrs. Bruce! Oh, mother! What shall we do?" Janet seemed almost unmoved for the moment.

Mrs. Grayson stood up from the sheet she was tucking in and looked at Janet in horror for a moment; then a look as if an angel hand had touched her on the forehead overspread her face, and she said gently:

"Why, we'll have to let her come, Janet! We couldn't do anything else! Perhaps God is sending her here for some reason!"

"Of course, mother!" said Janet. "What can I do to help?" There were instant lines of sweet self-control around her lips that made her look like her mother.

"Put on those fresh pillow cases. Is she much hurt? Did you hear?"

"Tommye Butcher didn't know. He had been sent down to ask if they might bring her here. She is burned, Tommye didn't know how seriously. She had been heating a curling-iron over an alcohol lamp, her maid told them, and her face sleeve caught, and the curtain, she thinks."

"Poor soul!"

"Here they come, mother! Are you ready?"

"All ready! Let them come up!"

Janet flew down to the front door and stood aside while the little procession of blackened, disheveled men bore the moaning burden up to the guest-room; the doctor with his case giving gruff directions; the neighbors, curious, kindly, ready to help, yet knowing only how to get in the way; Aunt Nan, who had come over in the car when they heard the alarm, fearing lest her loved ones were in danger. It was all so strange and dreadful. The terrible ruddy light still in the sky; the mad, weird shouts of the firemen; the occasional crash of oak beams, the smell of smoke, and the noise in the usually quiet street. It seemed hours that it had been going on.

Janet slipped about everywhere, bringing bandages, answering questions, running errands, white and efficient; while her mother stood beside the bed of horror upstairs and helped the doctor.

GRADUALLY the night settled down and people dropped away. The curious and the weary were gone. The light in the sky died. The Rosedale engine went home; and by and by the home engine clattered by, the men calling hoarsely and suddenly hushing their voices in awed question as they passed the house. Then everybody went home but the doctor, and Aunt Nan, and Mrs. Spellman, who was a trained nurse. Janet saw her uncle go out and run his car into the old barn back of the house. By and by he came in and she got him some bread and butter, coffee and doughnuts. She set out a lunch for the doctor and the others too when they should be able to take it. Her uncle sat down in the big chair in the living-room and dozed, and the soft footfalls and moaning were mingled above stairs. Two of the Bruce servants with bleared eyes and blackened faces came and inquired about their mistress. Some one had taken her maid away to another part of the town. She was in hysterics and utterly useless in the present crisis, declaring that it was not her fault; that her mistress had sent her away to the kitchen on an errand to the cook and lighted the alcohol lamp in her absence. She just came back in time to see the flame leap up and catch the lace sleeve of her neglig  e. Over and over she repeated the tale. The men servants who told it had awe in their faces, but no love for their mistress. Common humanity brought pity. They sneered at the guests who had fled in panic, caring only to secure their own belongings. They said "that kind never got hurt; they always took too good care of themselves!"

AFTER they were gone Janet remembered she had not asked them for Harley! Where was Harley? Had he been in the house? Had he been hurt? Some one ought to find out. And she roused her uncle and made him telephone to the inn where the servants had gone for the night. All the time her heart was saying: "O God, take care of Harley! O God, don't let Harley be hurt." She stood trembling while her uncle telephoned, yet when the answer came that Mr. Harley had not been at home she trembled still more violently. Where was Harley in all this? How long had he been absent? Suppose his mother should die? What could they do? How would they find him?

Aunt Nan came down after a while and told Janet her mother wanted her to go and lie down; there wasn't anything she could do now, and she must rest. So Janet went and lay down on the big couch in the shadowed alcove, but her eyes were wide open and she stared out into the room wondering, and tried to make real all that had happened. How strange that Mrs. Bruce should be here in their house, dependent upon them for her very life! She tried to recall the scene when Mrs. Bruce came over and sat in the hammock and insulted her, and for the first time since it had happened she found she could think of it without the hot, angry blood pouring into her cheeks. Somehow with that poor scorched body lying in mortal agony upstairs she could not be angry and insulted any more. She could only think that it was Harley's mother. And what if it had been Harley!

Night passed. Day came. Janet opened the front door and looked out. Some flakes of charred linen lay on the porch where they had dropped from the stretcher as they brought in the sufferer. The girl shuddered as she looked. The brightness of morning seemed a mockery after the night. The doctor came down looking wan and gray. He shook his head at Janet's questioning gaze.

"Pretty bad!" he said. "I don't know how it'll turn out. I'm going down to telegraph for a man from the city hospital. I don't like to take the responsibility alone. Don't you know where Harley is, Janet? He ought to be here!" and he looked keenly at the girl.

But Janet shook her head sadly. "The servants say he hasn't been at home for several days. I've been away myself, you know. But I'll try to find if anybody knows where he is."

WHEN the doctor was gone she went to the telephone and tried to locate some of Mrs. Bruce's guests. For a time it would seem as if they must have disappeared from off the earth, so completely had they vanished from anybody's ken. But at last a servant remembered that Mr. Watrous had asked the whereabouts of the public garage, and when Janet phoned there she discovered that entire party of guests had been motored over to a summer hotel a few miles beyond the Country Club for the night. She called up the hotel, and after a trying delay a high-keyed voice said sharply: "Well?" She was sure it was Lotta.

"Is this one of Mrs. Bruce's guests?" she asked.

"Yes. This is Miss Lomond!" replied the voice disagreeably. "Have they found my trunk yet?"

"I don't know, really! I am calling up to find out if you know where Mrs. Bruce's son is? The doctor thinks he ought to be sent for at once. His mother is very low."

"Oh, mercy! No, I don't know where he is. He hasn't been home for three weeks. His mother talked a lot about his being off on business, but I don't believe she knew where he was. They don't think she is going to die, do they? How horrid! I never was mixed up in anything like this before. It makes things awfully unpleasant. I suppose she would rather die than be scarred for life though. Do you know whether they got the trunks out of the house before the roof fell in? I got all my things in my trunk before I left my room, and I should think they ought to have been all right, don't you?"

"I don't know, really!" said Janet with disgust, and hung up the receiver, turning away to the window sick at heart, and looking out on the pleasant lawn where only so short a time ago Harley had been walking up from the hedged gateway with a cheery smile and whistle! She shuddered at the thought of all that had passed since. And where was he now? How would they find him?

THE day droned on, and the great doctor from the city came. Her uncle brought him from the train and waited to take him back. Mrs. Grayson and Aunt Nan lingered much in the room above. The doctor came down with grave face and said he didn't know what the outcome would be, that there was still hope.

Janet felt that a leaden weight had settled down into her soul. She walked heavily, and sat down in the hammock inertly. She could not settle to anything. There seemed to be nothing that she could do anywhere but just wait and hold at bay the shadow of death that was hovering over the house.

Her uncle came back from the train and asked her to go with him over to the summer hotel. He wanted to try again to get some clue to Harley's whereabouts. She could see the city doctor had given little encouragement.

They went over to the hotel and her uncle interviewed Thaddeus Wiltrone and Mrs. Gardiner, but got no further light on the subject, save the name of Mrs. Bruce's lawyer in town, and the address of Harley's club. The rest of the morning was spent in telephoning to the lawyer and the club, with the result that they found that Mr. Harley Bruce had not been heard from since he left his mother's home in Springdale three weeks before.

When they had done this Janet went out to the hammock and sat down to think of all the dreadful things that might have happened to Harley; then with a dreadful ache at her heart she went back to the house and tried to find some way to be useful. But the long hours dragged away and the night came on again. Neighbors stole awesomely in to ask after the sufferer. Janet met them and answered their questions. Gradually the house settled down to the battle with death that was inevitable.

AS the hours passed into days and Janet began to realize what was before them all, she faced the future with a startled fear at her heart. Was it possible that they were to go through this long siege of anxiety alone? That Harley would not come at all?

The great city doctor came and went. Mother and Aunt Nan and Mrs. Spellman stuck by their post in the sick-room with only little intervals for rest and food. Hannah kept things going in the kitchen; and there was really little for Janet to do but answer the telephone and see the people who came more and more to inquire. As the days went by and suffering and the possibility of death gave a dignity to the frivolous woman whom they had never any of them liked, the sympathy became more genuine, and the plain villagers showed their true human hearts in many little ways.

There came a day when the great doctor was telegraphed for in haste, and came and stayed all night; when Mrs. Grayson did not leave the sick-room even for a minute. Complications had set in, and the frail life in the tortured body almost slipped away. Then, slowly, gradually, uncertainly she wavered back again to earth, and the word began to go forth that there was hope of her recovery. All this, and still no word from Harley.

The confinement, hard work and anxiety began to tell on Mrs. Grayson. Aunt Nan took her off for a ride one day, and Janet took her place in the sick-room awhile to let Mrs. Spellman make something in the kitchen.

THE invalid lay, still swathed in bandages. Her eyes were shaded from the light, and her querulous voice was weak and fault-finding. She demanded water, and wanted her pillow arranged differently. The nurse had thought her asleep or she would not have left her in Janet's inexperienced hands. But Janet had been about the room enough to know what to do, and with gentle care she performed all that was asked of her. With the first touch almost Mrs. Bruce seemed to recognize a new hand, however, and something indefinable came into her voice, a kind of wonder, one might almost say embarrassment. She asked to have the compress taken from her eyes and a screen arranged so that the light from the window would not be so bright. Then she was very quiet. Janet could feel that she was being watched as she went to the window and drew the shade lower, and then sat down quietly in a chair. The silence grew oppressive. There was something uncanny in that gaze coming forth from the swathing bandages. Janet stirred uneasily.

"I wonder if you would like me to read to you," she said suddenly.

There was no answer for a moment, then the woman, utterly ignoring the question, said sharply:

"Who are you? You haven't been here before, have you?"

"I am the daughter of the house," said Janet gently.

"You are Janet Grayson, aren't you?" There was a touch of impatience in the voice again.

"Yes, Mrs. Bruce," answered Janet simply.

"I suppose you think I'm being punished for what I said to you! It certainly was a strange thing that I was landed at your house. I'm sure I'm very sorry you and your mother have had all this trouble."

"Mrs. Bruce—" began Janet.

"No, don't say a word! I know what a fiend I've been! It wasn't an easy task to take care of me, and your mother has been like an angel! Of course I'm mortified to death at it all, and to think I should have made such a dreadful mistake! I don't suppose you'll believe me when I tell you that I had no idea you belonged to a good family and were educated! I supposed you were just a common little village girl. I was simply stunned, of course, when I found your father was a judge and you were a college graduate!"

"Don't think of it any more, Mrs. Bruce," said Janet with a ripple of amusement in her voice. "I assure you my birth and education have forgotten the slight long ago."

"Well, I hope I've apologized. Harley told me I would have to, and I said I never would, but of course I didn't know who you were then."

"Your son knows about it?" said Janet in a startled voice. She put her hand swiftly to her throat.

"Oh, yes, of course I told him, and he was furiously angry. He went away declaring he would never come back till I apologized, and a lot of raving like that. But I've apologized now, and you can tell him he can come back. You know where he is all this time, I suppose."

"No, Mrs. Bruce, I haven't seen him since the night you came here."

"You don't know where he is?" He didn't come to you at all! He's more of a fool than I thought he was, then! I'm sure I don't know where he got all his whims. I never did understand him, anyway. Well, it was all his fault in the first place. If he had explained to me who you were all this never would have happened; but I suppose you'll never quite forgive what I said to you. I hurt your pride, and that is hard to heal."

"Mrs. Bruce," said Janet turning slowly toward the bed. "It wasn't just what you said to me, it wasn't who I was or what I had become by education, that hurt me. It was that you could think any decent girl who was your son's friend would do the things you seemed to think I would do. My pride wasn't hurt. You hurt my heart! But I accept your apology, and we'll forget all about it now."

"You needn't worry about me," said the voice, which was almost querulous again. "I've been wanting to say this to you several days, and it won't hurt me to talk. But you may get your story if you want to. You're a good girl. And if Harley ever comes I hope you'll tell him I apologized."

"I will," said Janet gently, and turned away to hide the shadow in her eyes. Oh, where was Harley Bruce?

SHE went and brought the story and read it in a sweet clear voice, a pleasant little story of romance woven in a background of home and love and courage. There was no motion from the sick woman. And presently the regular breathing in the silence that followed the cessation of her voice showed Janet that her patient was asleep.

Outside the gate clicked and steps came up the walk. It was the hour for the postman. Janet rose softly and slipped from the room, down to the door. Yes, there were letters, two of them—one for herself and one for Mrs. Bruce; her own thick and bulky, the other holding but a single sheet, and both in the same kind of envelope, with a curious triangle of scarlet in the upper left-hand corner. When she looked at the writing her heart fairly stood still. They were addressed in Harley's clear strong hand!

Questions and Answers

B. W. R., Caldwell, Idaho. The taking of the definite step—the acceptance of the offer of salvation through Jesus Christ as Saviour and Redeemer—may be done either in the quietude of one's own home or in the presence of others. The latter has the advantage, in that it complies with the Scriptural injunction to acknowledge Him before men. Jesus himself said: "Every one who shall confess me before men, him shall the Son of Man also confess before the angels of God." Such acknowledgment in the presence of others, therefore, brings a special blessing and gives strength and joy to the believer. There are many who make the great resolution in secret, however. One's own conscience must prompt him as to the course to adopt. It makes little difference whether the vow to renounce our sins, to accept Christ and to follow him hereafter, be taken in the crowded auditorium of some great Gospel gathering, in the seclusion of one's chamber, on the mountain-top, or afar on the sea, if we are sincere in our repentance and our desire for forgiveness. He is ever ready to hear, to forgive, and to keep us day by day. It is a battle that none of us can win in our own strength; but if we trust in him and consecrate our hearts and lives to him, he will cleanse us and keep us, and the work of regeneration by the Holy Spirit will be accomplished in us. In conversion we turn to God, in regeneration we receive from him. No man can be the author of his own regeneration.

D. R. B., Wharton, Texas. 1. Christ says, "Come unto me, all ye that labor" (Matt. 11:28), and the Psalmist assures us that "he will regard the prayer of the destitute and not despise their prayer" (Ps. 102:17). Christ taught us to pray and to seek everything we needed in prayer. 2. Any of us may fall from grace; in fact, many do temporarily. The danger is ever present (see 1 Cor. 10:12), but by the grace of God, by watching and praying, we can avoid the fall from which there is no rising and that leads to destruction. If we keep close to Jesus, we shall stand till his time comes to remove all temptation and take us home. 3. The soul never goes into the grave, hence cannot remain with the body till the resurrection. Paul said, 11 Cor. 5:8, that he was willing to be absent from the body and present with the Lord. He refers to the subject again in 1 Thess. 4:14, when he speaks of Christ bringing with him, before the resurrection, them who sleep in him. The parable of Dives and Lazarus implies that the resurrection had not taken place when Dives made his petition to Abraham, inasmuch as the five brothers were still living (Luke 16:19-31).

Mrs. W. W. T., Springfield, Mo. The "abomination" spoken of by Daniel is believed to have referred to the Roman eagles, hated of the Jews, but worshiped as idols by the Roman soldiers. They were the standards of those who desolated the temple. This construction is strengthened by a reference to Luke's account, Luke 21: "When ye shall see Jerusalem compassed with armies." Others think it referred to some desecration of the temple by Jewish zealots which occurred at the same time, and which was accomplished under the pretense of a defense of the temple.

Miss N. S., Sanger, Calif. There are several passages in Scripture besides the one you mention (1 Cor. 15:41), that would seem to indicate the probability of degrees in heaven. Daniel's famous passage relative to the soul winners, who will shine as the stars forever, is one of them. Paul implies a similar diversity, when he speaks of one star differing from another in glory; so did Jesus in his reply to the two disciples for whom it was asked that they should sit at his right and left hand in his kingdom. The parable of the talents also bears a similar interpretation.

J. C. F., 1. The question whether Mary had other children than our Lord was treated in the Mail-Bag of April 17. 2. Marrying of cousins is considered hygienically wrong.

M. W., Smithfield, Ohio. Heb. 6:4 and its context refers to those who sin after receiving full knowledge of the truth (see 1 Tim. 2:4) and who after having been enlightened and tasting a certain measure of grace and the spirit of truth (see John 14:17-29) apostatize to Judaism or infidelity. Such sinners crucify the Lord anew. In the backslider there has been no complete dedication, otherwise there would be no apostasy. 1 John 1:9 emphasizes the assurance of forgiveness and acceptance of the faithful. As to the return of the backslider, that lies with God, with whom many things are possible that to us seem impossible. By a miracle of grace the backslider, though beyond human recall, may in God's abundant mercy find refuge and forgiveness.

A. B. C., Shippensburg, Pa. We agree with you that it is unfair to ask us to save grain and then let the breweries have it for their purposes. Protests have, we believe, been made along these lines. Give the Administration time. It is doing wonders every day. Our President is in this war for a good cause and will not allow intolerable conditions at home. Trust in him and his helpers.

C. L. B., Berne, N. Y. The motto, "United we stand, divided we fall," first appeared on the Revolutionary flag under the picture of a snake divided in sections. It first appeared in literature in the poem by George P. Morris, entitled "The Flag of Our Nation."

D. H., Blossburg, Pa. The official history of the American flag began on June 14, 1777, when the American Congress adopted the following resolution: "Resolved, That the flag of the thirteen United States shall be thirteen stripes alternating red and white; that the union be thirteen stars, white on a blue field, representing a new constellation." It is stated that the symbols on the flag were suggested by those on Washington's family coat-of-arms. In Monroe's administration it was decided to add a new star for every state and to retain the original thirteen stripes.

Subscriber, Northfield, Ohio. 1. The food and clothing sent to Syria and Armenia are obtained largely by private subscriptions throughout the United States. 2. The fabulous prices charged for foodstuffs are largely due to the high cost of transportation, etc. 3. At the present moment there is little question that Syria, Armenia and Palestine are the countries most urgently in need of help in the form of foodstuffs.

Emily D., Baltimore, Md. We think you have done splendidly in persuading so many of your friends to buy Liberty Bonds. You might add to your battery of argument, if you will, that a $100 bond will clothe a soldier or feed him for eight months, or it will buy five rifles, or 145 hot-water bags, or 2,000 surgical needles—in fact, there is a whole list of things it will do.

Anna N. A. L., Pittston, Pa. Cards, as we have remarked on several occasions, are the implements of the gambler. It is well to bar them altogether and thus "avoid even the appearance of evil." There is a mighty difference between card-playing and a contest of knowledge, in which equal opportunities to secure recognition are open to all. What is a school or college examination but a contest of knowledge? All life is competitive, and if we exclude this characteristic there would be practically no progress in the world. Even in the spiritual life, the race (or competition) is recognized. We are to endeavor to excel in all good works and in loyal service, that we may become an inspiration to others. But you do wrong to confuse such a competition with gambling. In the one, the motive is high and noble, and the results in every way commendable. The Bible has strong encouragement for all who strive to excel in well-doing. In the other (gambling) the motive is low and mercenary, and the results unworthy and debasing. In the one, there is neither trick nor device, and no cunning, crafty methods of securing undue advantage; while the other is marked by such methods at every step. There are other gambling games besides cards, and it is well to let them all severely alone. What would you think of a friend addicted to dice, bookmaking on horse races, and the like? You wouldn't be liable to trust funds to his keeping, nor would a bank do so if its officials knew. On the other hand, you cannot surely be unaware of the fact that there are many opportunities open to those who excel on really meritorious lines. Who would think of condemning a prize scholar by suggesting that his honors were the result of gambling? To your other question, we would say that God has had his witnesses in all ages, and in many lands—men and women who, with the light they had, served Him acceptably. But when, in due time, the Saviour came, he brought "life and immortality to light," and we, who now live in the new dispensation, have the inestimable advantage of fuller Gospel knowledge, of which the earlier ages had only fore-shadowings. We cannot deal with your other questions in the limited space of the Mail-Bag. You would find a copy of the book, "Difficult Bible Questions Answered," exceedingly helpful.

O. L. S., Cincinnati, Ohio. Your letter and the sentiments it conveys are out of key with the spirit of this nation. You evidently have no part in the "righteous indignation" that has stirred our people to the use of force to put down a tyrannous and brutal power which has already laid half the world in ruins and which unless halted, would destroy the other half and wreck our own fair land as well. The Church does right to invoke all the forces at our command, material and spiritual, to bring an end to the power that is the cause of this world war, and to pray that the mad and wicked ambitions of Germany may be utterly crushed—as we believe they will be most effectually.

J. E. H., Bridger, S. D., and others. Persons who wish to find friends in the army should address the Adjutant General, War Department, Washington, D. C., stating the company and regiment of the soldier whose address is desired. If the soldier is in France he may be addressed "American Expeditionary Forces." If he has enlisted in the French or English army he might be reached through the Ambassador to France or England.

J. E. L. Your question has been often answered in these columns. Read Rom. 2:14.

Get This Book About Water

ARE you sure that your water supply is safe, and will always be safe? Not to be sure is to risk your own life and the lives of your family.

For polluted water means typhoid, and typhoid is one of the most deadly of diseases, especially prevalent in rural sections.

The United States Public Health Service has found that many rural water supplies, which were believed by those who used them to be safe, were carriers of disease.

It has therefore written a pamphlet which tells simply and clearly in words and pictures what kinds of wells, cisterns and springs are safe, what kinds are unsafe, and how the work of safe-guarding your water supply should be done.

No man who lives in the country, or in a small town, can afford to be without this book.

How The Norwesco Laboratories Discovered SE-MENT-OL

"FINDS THE LEAK AND FIXES IT"

IT happened several years ago that out on a lonely road and miles from a garage, the radiator of a certain automobile suddenly developed a leak.

Not an uncommon incident—but it was a subject of great interest to one man in particular, a friend of this motorist and a practical chemist.

The leak was mended with solder and iron, after much inconvenience and at considerable expense. Then another leak followed—and another—with the same costly process of repair.

Soon the radiator was discarded and the chemist friend got it to experiment on.
He had seen the need for a radiator cement; some chemical preparation that would work from within the radiator itself. SE-MENT-OL, produced to-day by Frederick R. Hall and his associated chemists in the Norwesco Laboratories, is the result. It is the first of many chemical automobile utilities now bearing the brand name—

Lift Corns out with Fingers

A few drops of Freezone loosen corns so they peel off

Apply a few drops of Freezone upon a tender, aching corn or a callus. The soreness stops and shortly the entire corn or callus loosens and can be lifted off without a twinge of pain.

Freezone removes hard corns, soft corns, also corns between the toes and hardened calluses. Freezone does not irritate the surrounding skin. You feel no pain when applying it or afterward.

A small bottle of Freezone costs but a few cents at drug stores anywhere.

Jesus Faces the Cross

International Sunday School Lesson for May 12. Mark 10:32-52

Greatness Through Suffering and Service

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph.D.

THE disciples must have well known the determined purpose of the Jewish authorities to rid themselves of Jesus, and now, as he presses forward eagerly on the Jerusalem road, they are astonished. He seemed to be almost anxious to reach the climax of his career and to face the cross which he was now so certain awaited him. Again and again he outstripped his fellow travelers until he strode on ahead alone. Then there would be whisperings and questionings and fears. Doubtless some of the company turned back.

But we can at least partly understand this urgency of the Master. The man who has offered himself for the hazardous expedition into the enemy's territory, the soldiers who crouch in the trenches awaiting the command to go "over the top," these men are restless and impatient for the hour to strike. Moreover, the prophet or the martyr who sees clearly the course that is before him, welcomes the last great witnessing for the cause. When we have staked all, given all, we can scarcely rest until our offering is accepted, our sacrifice complete.

So Jesus, calling the twelve to him, stated quite plainly that he was desirous of hastening to the capital, facing the enmity and misrepresentation and once for all having the decision of his nation and its church. Undoubtedly he was yearning for fuller sympathy from them, for some expression of loyalty, for an offer of comradeship from some few at least of his friends. When it came at last, it came strangely.

The Request of the Sons of Zebedee

At this crisis James and John awaited a convenient opportunity for speaking to him privately. They have a request to make. They want preferment and honor in his coming triumph, to sit at his right and left in his Kingdom! We are accustomed to pour censure on this revelation of self-seeking, and in truth it jars harshly upon Jesus' pure notes of utter self-renunciation. But let us be more sympathetic to our poor blundering fellow-disciples. There is much good in their hearts, as Jesus looks upon them with his matchless understanding, as they stand there, so young and eager, in the road.

They could not believe that Christ would be overcome and defeated. He must conquer and reign, no matter what opposed him. Was he not the Messiah? Did they not know his wondrous power? Now, there is an essential faith and optimism in them which we all need. Doubtless they were in crude error as to the manner of his triumph; but they knew he must be the victor, somehow, sometime. So do we.

When he pointed out that sacrifice and suffering must precede that victory, they were unabashed, unafraid. They were willing and able to follow on; they could win with him the prize. Beneath their self-confidence was a real loyalty and a genuine consecration, as well as unbounded worship of his personality. They had put their worst foot foremost, but whatever else they were, they did not mean to be shirkers. They will go on to Jerusalem with him, come what may, no matter how bitter the cup is to drink, no matter how fiery the baptism he must undergo. Underlying their crude ideals, was a response to the longing for fellowship left unexpressed by Christ when he had turned in the way and told the twelve of the events to come.

"We Are Able." "Ye Shall"

The Master reminds them of the price which must always be paid for true glory; he asks if they are able to share his cup, to be baptized with his baptism. Swift and sure came the prompt answer, "We are able." How little they knew! Yet, according to their light, they were ready. The presumptuous element is still strong; but there is more and more the element of dedication. They would follow in his train, no matter how steep the ascent to heaven, no matter how great the peril, toil and pain. There was something worthy in them that Christ recognized and honored. He smiled upon them, as the seasoned veteran smiles tenderly upon the recruits who long to get into action, though they realize not the ordeal to which they would run.

The youthful Livingstone little knows the agonies to come when he essays to evangelize Africa: the lion's paw, the awful fever, the lonely death. But he goes forth to partake of the sufferings of Christ, like Paul, pressing with confidence to the task. Adoniram Judson, sailing for India with eager spirit, could not foresee the awful months in the death-prison at Ava. But he felt able to carry the message to the men of Burma. To such men, as to James and John long ago, Christ responds, "Ye shall." And it was so with the children of Zebedee. Each endured persecution, the first unto death, for the sake of the Kingdom they had so lightly essayed to win. They profited by their Lord's present teaching as to the seriousness of life and the heavy costs of leadership.

The Suffering and the Glory

It was Paul who first clearly formulated this great truth that our fellowship with Christ in his cross must precede our sharing his crown. The cup to be drunk and the baptism to be undergone are typical of the great truth that the passive virtues of endurance, of fortitude under suffering, of loyalty in persecution, are of highest value in the Christian way. Perhaps we may say that it is not the achievement that the world applauds; but the secret anguish it failed to note, which made our hero-missionaries what they were, which made our martyr President the influence he still is for us. Then let us not fail to see that our personal woes, our heavy burdens, our bereavement and trouble, may be the instruments of chastening to bring us into the likeness of the Great Sufferer.

So by my woes to be Nearer, my God, to thee.

How to Be Truly Great

Of course, the ten were highly indignant when they heard of the selfish request. We can see in their indignation a jealousy and a self-seeking of their own. But Jesus calls them together and restates the whole matter of Christian greatness of the only sort of rank which his Kingdom knows, the greatness of service. He contrasts the heathen idea with the Christian. The great ones of earth are they who have power, and wealth to lord it over their fellows. The great ones of heaven are they who serve most purely, who minister unto the many. It is a flat reversal of human and selfish ideas of glory.

If they must compete with one another, let it be in well-doing. He told them plainly that place-hunting disqualifies men from apostleship; those who would be first shall be last. They have asked for thrones; he would furnish them basins and towels, and set them to washing the bleeding feet of tired, straying humanity. They ask to sit by his side; they must learn to run his errands. Not to sit but to serve. The Christian must put away desire to rule, to be rich, to be leader in the eyes of men. Ambition for power and place is the danger of the self-reliant young James and John today, as always of the eager and the virile type. There are still those who follow after the sin of Diotrophes (III John 9), who loved to have the preeminence. They foment strife and hinder the church. The Lord's servant must not strive, but rather be prepared unto every good work. His whole spirit and aim is for others and not for himself.

This is the way to greatness of character. This is the way to the bringing in of the Kingdom of righteousness and brotherhood. Many want to accomplish the objects of Christ, but are unwilling to adopt his methods. They do not see that humility and patience and love will ever win in the great struggle of humanity. But all other ways have failed far more grievously than the way of service. Its achievements are more durable than the conquests of the Caesars. True victory lies in giving and in ministering, not in gaining or in ruling.

Christ Subject to His Own Law

The supreme service is in giving one's life for others. Greater love hath no man than this. When Jesus faced the cross, he interpreted it under the law of service. He gave his life a ransom for many. It is an inspiration to remember that so many of his followers have followed him even in this. Paul laid down his life for the Gentile world. John Hus and Hugh Latimer gave their bodies to be burned to free the Church. Today, thousands of men are giving their lives a ransom for the democracy of the future. They are fulfilling the law of Christ.

We may think that we would die for him. We should fail in the supreme test when we face our cross, if we do not know how to live for him and to serve him day by day.

Sunday School Methods

By FRANK L. BROWN, Joint General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

Question Box

QUESTION. What plan would you suggest for training young people for church membership?—J. N.

A. Each denomination of course has its own method. Three very good books may be suggested for use in classes of young people preparing for church membership: "Chapters of Blessing and Counsels by the Way," Henderson (Methodist Book Concern); "Being a Christian" (Dr. Gladden); "Probationer's Hand-Book," Hannan (Methodist Book Concern.) The last-named book, while prepared for Methodist classes, is valuable to all.

But there is a most important part of the young people's training which must be cared for, namely, to prepare for definite service. Church membership is not the end but the beginning of real Bible Christian life. And the pastor, superintendent, or teacher should have these young people elect some form of Christian service and then train them for it. Three practical books which outline such service training plans and which can be used as text-books in this training class are: "The Way to Win," Fred B. Fisher (Abingdon Press), indicating successful methods in the local church; "Sunday School Officers' Manual," Brown (Abingdon Press), which describes plans for many forms of Sunday school, church and community service; "The Modern Church," Rev. Philip A. Nordell, D.D. (Scribner's), which suggests the many avenues of service.

Q. Give the three best and most concrete suggestions as to plans for men's and boys' work in the Sunday school.—A. H. S.

A. 1. Give older boys in the school some definite responsibility in assisting in school management, serving on school committees and occasionally planning and running a "Boys' Sunday."

2. Promote a Leadership training class to train older boys for definite service as missionary superintendent, secretary, chorister, social work, etc.

3. Have the men make a real survey of the community in the interest of the protection of the boys of the school and neighborhood from bad influences and environments—and make provision for wholesome recreation.

many refugees as possible, thus making direct gifts of money, with the consequent pauperization of the people, as infrequent as possible.

In Erivan there are scores of Armenian women who spend the time they have to wait in line whirling the little spindle which is their only frail weapon against suffering. They produce material for clothing for others while they wait for the money with which to buy clothing for themselves. All these women and girls ask is for more work so that they can earn more.

Erivan is a busy place these days. In the cold waters of the Zanga, which later joins the Araxes, forty men stand washing wool, beating out the natural oil and then drying the washed wool on the rocks. In the cotton-carding room, twenty-five men card the white mounds with one-stringed instruments like a harp. These few men provide material for more than two thousand women, who spin the wool or cotton into yarn or thread. In most cases, each of these workers represents a family.

Formerly, as many as a hundred women were always padding quilts with wool or cotton, but the great value of calico and the fact that the need for quilts has been largely met has stopped this work except on small quilts which will protect the tiny newcomers among the Armenians from the cold of winter. Warm flannelette baby outfits are supplied to these citizens of the Armenia that is to come, and pure milk is provided for three hundred children and sick women who need it.

In the great warehouse there is a carload of calico which the Committee bought for a fifth its present value, and which they are holding to barter for food when the need becomes more acute. There are tons of wool and cotton, all of it locally produced. The ability of the Armenians in home industries and the presence of raw wool and cotton near at hand have done much to make possible what relief work has been accomplished.

The health of the refugees is being well cared for. Dr. Kennedy, who served with the British army for two years, meets a long string of poorly nourished women and anemic children every day. Drugs are supplied free when they can be had, but available supplies are often adulterated and the need for pure drugs and dressings is very great.

ONE of the remarkable features in the Armenian relief work is the dependence upon missionary workers, and missionary school graduates for its success. Mr. Yarrow says that never before has he so realized the value of Christian missions in which he has had a part as now, when almost every department is dependent upon the loyalty, moral stamina and willingness to sacrifice of young men who have been under missionary influence for years. Orphans saved in the 1896 massacres are helping to save the lives of other orphans whose parents were killed in the massacres of 1915. Others are fighting to end the power of the Turk in the land where his cruelty and incompetence to rule have been repeatedly proven in incidents that have added dark blots to the pages of human history.

Aside from the work in the city of Erivan, the American Committee has a fine work under the direction of Mr. Heald in Alexandropol. Four new workers have just arrived to enlarge the work there, and three new workers will reach Erivan next week. Aside from these two centers, there is industrial work in Etchmiadzin and Gomerloo. There is great need to extend the relief work in these two centers. Outside of Erivan, Alexandropol, Etchmiadzin and Gomerloo, the only relief work possible until more workers and money arrive is the partial support of the fatherless children in most of the villages of the province.

This Home Orphan Department, under the supervision of its founder, Mr. E. A. Yarrow, accomplishes the maximum good at the minimum expense of money and foreign supervision. Out of the refugee population of 130,000, most of whom are women and children, there are probably twenty thousand fatherless children whose need is acute. Only about half of them are being helped by the American Committee at present. About 7,000 orphans are being cared for in orphanages under Armenian direction, and the probability is that the support of many of these will soon fall to the American Committee. The centralized orphanage is far more expensive than the partial or complete support of orphans in the homes of relatives or friends, and to place any large number of fatherless children in institutions is out of the question.

THERE are various features of the work which I would like to see Christian Herald readers support. Five hundred dollars a month will make it possible for three hundred children and sick women to have a daily allowance of pure milk. A like amount will pay the expense of the Erivan orphanage, in which a hundred of the brightest boys among the refugees are being trained for leadership through academic and industrial training.

But I recommend very strongly that Christian Herald readers, of whose generosity I have seen splendid fruits in Japan and China, should assume the support of at least five thousand refugee orphans or fatherless children in the homes of those who love and care for them. For each of these children thus partially supported, two dollars a month will be required, at least until food prices are lower, and their support should be continued for a sufficiently long period after the end of hostilities to enable the mothers or guardians to become rehabilitated in the towns from which they were driven without warning by the massacring Turks. I know of no greater opportunity for worthy relief work than this—to keep a helpless child in a home where it will receive loving care.

Important as other work is, I believe that the most urgent need is that the Armenian refugees shall be kept alive until happier days will make possible better things. Other forms of help will not avail if the refugees starve or die from exposure. The most helpless of all are the fatherless children and the mothers to whom these loved ones are a fearful burden. Two dollars a month will save a young life of infinite possibilities. It will make it possible for a loving mother to prevent her offspring from being snatched from her breast by the grim messenger of death. Before spring twenty-thousand of these young children will depend upon the American Committee for support, wholly or in part, according to how much work the parent or guardian can find to do. I earnestly ask that Christian Herald readers at once assume the responsibility for five thousand of these helpless children. Thank God, none of them are starving yet. But they surely will unless help is continued.

This then is the present condition. Erivan city, Alexandropol, Etchmiadzin and Gomerloo are free from immediate starvation and death from exposure, thanks to the work of the American Committee and other relief agencies. In four hundred and fifty villages the most needy children are being saved from suffering and hunger. But aside from these two measures, suffering is great and rapidly increasing.

The great change that has come is due to the collapse of the Russian government and Armenian aid through political chaos. This will necessitate a doubling of the work of the American Committee in all lines, or great numbers of deaths and untold suffering will surely follow.

The fruits of all previous relief work may be lost unless the Committee can assume a larger burden. "We must assume a larger burden," say these overworked men and who have given their best for the relief of a martyred race.

ON April 1st the Christian Herald in the name of its subscribers sent a check for $15,000 to the Chairman of the Armenian and Syrian Relief Committee, the receipt of the same being acknowledged on the following day.

THE TOUCHSTONE OF TRUTH

Ages ago men sought the "philosopher's stone," which would, they thought, turn all it touched to gold.

This touchstone, though never discovered, has its modern counterpart in CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Instead of turning dross to gold, CHRISTIAN HERALD, however, separates the false from the true in advertising. The touchstone of truth has been applied to every statement in every advertisement appearing in CHRISTIAN HERALD. Anything offered for sale here is "good as gold"—pure gold.

CHRISTIAN HERALD

The Martyred Nestorian Patriarch

By PAUL SHIMMON

Representing the Nestorian Patriarchate in America

BINYAMIN MAR SHIMUN (Benjamin My Lord Simon), patriarch of the Nestorian Church, whose death at the hands of Mohammedan Kurds is announced in the cable dispatches, was the one hundred and thirty eighth Catholicos of the East and was recognized as the civil head of the Assyrians of Kurdistan and even of Persia. The manner of the death of this great Church Prelate is still shrouded in mystery. The following telegram received through the State Department on April 12th for the Armenian and Syrian Relief Committee tells of it briefly: "No communication with Urumia, Salmas, several weeks. The last reports famine Urumia. Mar Shimun killed and the Assyrians are still fighting but the Persian plan to exterminate Assyrians with the assistance of Turks is probable. Most of Syrian men may be killed, leaving the others absolutely desolate and unprotected; also it is generally believed there is much danger for all Christians in that region."

Mar Shimun, murdered Patriarch

The isolation of the Nestorian Assyrians is probably the most tragic event in the history of this war. A small nation, out of touch with the world war they were drawn into its vortex and engulfed by it. The Assyrians have paid the supreme sacrifice in the death of their Patriarch, and very likely of all among them who were able to use the arms given to them by the Russians, who now evidently have retreated and left these Christians to face the combined fanaticism of Turks and Kurds and Persian Moslems. Mar Shimun is the first Church and civil ruler to pay the supreme sacrifice in this war.

We loved and almost adored our Patriarch. He was only thirty-one years old when he met his fate and had been our chief Bishop since 1903. He was educated under the hands of special teachers and also enjoyed the tutorship of the Clergy of the Archbishop of Canterbury's Mission, one of whom resided for twenty-five years at Koehannes, the Patriarchal seat and who died there. Koehannes is in the center of a triangle running from Mosul (Nineveh) to Lake Van, thence to Urumia in Persia and back again to Mosul. The whole Patriarchal family is held in the highest reverence by the neighboring races, even by the wild Kurds and the devil worshippers (Yezidis). Men visitors, on entering Mar Shimun's room took their hats and kissed his hand, while women visitors placed one hand on their breast and with the other touched the Patriarch's hand and kissed it.

Mar Shimun was a most affable man. There was something princely about him, yet he was thoroughly democratic in his ways, and would converse with the humblest of men. Such personages in the East have great influence. One of his chief functions was to settle disputes arising in his dioceses and among the members of his flock. Among the highlanders in Kurdistan, the Church and state are one, and all important disputes were ultimately decided by His Beatitude.

There being no hotels in the East, the Patriarchal House was the largest guest-house in Kurdistan. Surma Khanim, the charming sister of the Patriarch, presided over it. Like the Patriarch, she is a Nazirite, as are the Nestorian Bishops in the East, who abstain from meat all their life. Usually a Bishop is succeeded by one of his near relatives, who is brought up from childhood with the hope of becoming his successor; and sometimes more than one person is raised up for the purpose, and the choice is left to the Patriarch and his flock. We know nothing yet of the safety and escape of his successor.

Mar Shimun was the third of his family who have paid the sacrifice of life in this war. His brother Hormuzd was a student in Constantinople when the war broke out. He was brought to Mosul, and nothing has been heard of him since. His brother Eshia died during the flight in 1915. Then his people, after a great stand against the combined force of Turks and Kurds, were driven out of their mountain homes and crossed into Persia, where they were looked after by the American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief. The Russians made great use of the splendid fighters of the mountains. Their young men performed deeds of valor and even the Russian Cossacks were amazed at their audacity and their skill in climbing the slopes of the mountains.

The new order of things in Russia brought all nationalities concerned into a great plight. Rumania, Serbia, and Armenia were more deeply involved than the nations in the West. The Assyrians numbered some 125,000 before the war, exclusive of the Jacobites and the Chaldeans. There is no doubt that the greater part of the 125,000 are involved in the disastrous situation indicated in the telegram referred to above—at least that part of them who are still left after the great toll of the past three years' persecution is taken into consideration.

For years the Christian Herald has been one of the best friends of the Nestorians. And even now America is the last and best friend of my fellow-countrymen. The American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief and its auxiliaries has sent about two million dollars to these and other afflicted races in Persia, and even to Kurds, Jews and Persians. Mar Shimun has often expressed his debt of gratitude for their great work.

Lady and General Azgapatian, Armenians connected for two years with the Russian Red Cross in Persia, who had seen much of Mar Shimun and of his sister Surma, called at committee headquarters in New York to express their great sorrow at the news of the Patriarch's death. The General said: "Mar Shimun was a man of liberal ideas and high principles. He was naturally very anxious as to the future of his nation, but hoped that, under the protection of the Russian army, the remnants of their once great people might yet be saved from extermination. He was looked upon by his people not only as their Patriarch but as their King. Still he was a man of extremely gentle and unassuming ways, winning the hearts of all. He had a very high opinion of the Americans and always spoke with gratitude of the generous assistance they had given to his suffering people. He seemed to have a strong premonition that he would ultimately become a martyr."

Mar Shimun's people in the United States mourn him deeply, and in many places they have held special services, fasting all the day in his memory.

A great nation which is undertaking to carry on a great war, as America is now doing, and yet finds time to give of its life and substance to rescue our people, cannot die. The life of such a nation is imperishable.

The Hebrew Christian Alliance of America will hold its fourth annual conference at the Moody Bible Institute, Chicago, May 29-31. The call for the conference sets forth that its object is to bring Hebrew Christians in the United States into more brotherly relations, on the basis of a common salvation in Christ, to give counsel and encouragement to converts, to demonstrate that the relinquishment of the Jewish religion does not necessarily involve abandonment of the desire for a home in the ancient fatherland, nor apostasy from the Jewish people, who are kinsmen of the Hebrew Christians.

The Garbage Pail

THE title is unpleasant. The thing it represents is undeniably repulsive. Yet the subject connected with it has been deemed sufficiently important by the corporations of our principal cities to demand official investigation. Of the results of this I shall have more to say presently.

As a keynote to the estimation in which the unsavory receptacle of domestic refuse is held by a certain class of household workers, I may be pardoned for quoting a story reported to me less than six years ago by a woman of unquestionable veracity. Through the dining-room door, which was ajar, she overheard a colloquy between cook and waitress.

Said the cook: "There's no surer way of telling whether folks are quality or common people than watchin' of the garbage-pails when they come down on the dumb waiter. There's the family that lives in the apartment above ours. They're the real sort! Sometimes the pail is so full the top won't go on, and it's always real full. Not with just the scrapings of the plates, you bet! If there's chops or slices left loose on the dishes they ain't saved to be cooked over. And it's so with bread and cake and potatoes, and carrots what is too small to be worth peelin', and specked apples and the like. There's nothin' mean about that fam'ly!"

As an evidence of the wide disparity of opinion between individuals and corporations, I set over against this anecdote part of a conversation I held half a year ago with a city physician of extensive practice who had accepted a position on the commission appointed by the Food Administration Bureau to look closely into this very matter of domestic wastefulness. Without giving warning of their coming, the committee visited scores of apartment houses in humble and in fashionable residential districts, and made official returns of results.

"We all know, of course, that we Americans are the most extravagant of all civilized nations," said the doctor to me. "But I own I was amazed at the reckless improvidence of what may be called our 'well-to-do classes.' The garbage-pails were a disgrace to housekeepers and servants. Would you believe that we counted in fifteen pails in one district no less than five loaves of bread from which the baker's or grocer's paper wrappings had never been removed? Half and quarter loaves were too frequent to be counted. Slices of cooked ham and beef, whole onions, carrots and potatoes, slices of cake, stale cookies, biscuits and rolls were found in quantities that would have fed many a poor family. It was monstrous and incredible!"

This is no exaggeration, but simple and disgraceful fact, that should put the women of our country on their guard.

To the housemother who has never so much as glanced into the pail consigned daily to the city scavenger, I would make this note of warning a matter of personal and present interest.

This same garbage-pail is an important utensil from the viewpoint of health and cleanliness. It should be scalded regularly, and each day lined with several thicknesses of paper to absorb moisture and prevent corrosion and rust. The top should be similarly protected and fit closely. These are details the cook is likely to neglect unless she knows that her employer has a personal eye to them and considers them essential. Keep the pail clean and dry, and it will outlast by years one in which dregs and wet are allowed to collect.

NOW for the main thing, to be regarded jealously and persistently: Allow nothing to go into the pail that may be made useful in any department of housewifery. Not a scrap or crumb of bread should ever find its way to the garbage-pail. Make this rule absolute. In future talks we shall deal with the many ways in which these fragments may be utilized. Be it a wheaten, or oaten, or barley loaf, or a corn-meal muffin, see to it that it is saved. Dry single slices or scraps in the oven without letting them brown, and when they are cold crush into fine crumbs and put away in jars or boxes in a cool, dry place. Of their ultimate end, more anon.

Cold vegetables should be sorted and set aside to be warmed over, or to add richness to soups and stews. Not one teaspoonful of stewed tomato or apple-sauce—least of all, of mashed potato—should ever make acquaintance with the paper-lined pail. The skins of oranges, grapefruit and lemons, cut into shavings and dried in an open oven or in the sun, then pounded fine, make spicy flavoring for puddings and sauces. Or, should you not fancy these, utilize the brittle shavings as kindling. They catch fire readily and burn like pitchpine splinters. One woman I know cooks apple peelings tender in enough water to cover them well; sets them away over night; strains out the liquid next day through mosquito-netting, pressing out every drop of the juice; sweetens it and boils it down, and uses it for pudding-sauces. Apples should never be pared for "sauce." The best part of the fruit lies next to the skin. Cut them up, cores and all, cook before sugaring them, and press through a colander. Then sweeten while hot. You will be surprised by the superior flavor of sauce made thus to that cooked in the old way.

It should not be necessary to say that cold rice and other cooked cereals may be worked up to advantage in divers ways. Of that, too, I shall be glad to speak in future chapters.

AFTER eliminating from the maw of the Garbage Pail the articles of which we have treated, there would seem to be little left to be thrown away except what our self-appointed judge of "the quality" describes as "plate-scrappings." If we have lent a dutiful ear to Mr. Hoover's injunctions respecting the "clean plate," we have discarded once and forever the silly notion of leaving something on the plate "for the sake of manners." The rule was designed in far-off days to prove to hosts that guests had had all they could eat—and more. In this day when "waste not, or somebody will want!" is the watchword in every well-conducted household, the wise mother trains her flock not to overload plates at the outset.

In the work of apportionment to larder and to pail, it will be seen that little falls into the latter. Bones are too valuable to be consigned to it because they have been cooked once.

Collect them from plates as well as from dish, dash hot water over, and set away in the refrigerator those that have been "picked." They are then cleared from the suspicion of "germs." When you have a good supply on hand take time to break them into pieces an inch long to expose the richness of the marrow left in them, put over the fire without salt, cover deep with cold water, and cook slowly for hours. Salt, then, and let them get perfectly cold before you skim the fat carefully from the top to keep for "shortening." It will save lard and butter. Strain the liquid, add vegetables cut small, season to taste, and you have the base of a nourishing broth or thick family soup.

YOU are not the sensible woman I take you to be if you have not found out that the outside and coarser leaves of lettuce, the "tops" and tougher stalks of celery which are unfit for salad, may be cooked and creamed into palatable vegetable dishes. In fact, surprisingly little is left from the market-basket for the paper-lined pail. Up to date I know of no way of disposing otherwise of the parings of potatoes, carrots, radishes and turnips. Our Cornerites are invited to send in hints on this point.

If our instructions be followed faithfully, your neighbors may comment unfavorably upon your "quality." That is, if they are of the vulgar variety themselves. True gentleness has higher standards of breeding. When the queen of England gives up her motor-car and returns to the old-fashioned carriage and horses to save gasoline for the army ambulances, the patriotic American wife and mother ought to regard it as a solemn obligation to count pennies where she once handled dollars. No right-minded woman now hesitates to purchase food in small quantities and to make every pound of provisions "go" as far as it will.

I would make this Corner a veritable Housewife's Exchange through which all may give freely of what they have learned under the strain and stress of the times, and profit gratefully by the experiences of other practical and patriotic workers in the same great school.

Our next talk will embrace recipes especially adapted to the altered conditions in which we are living and learning.

"The Furniture That Blooms In The Spring"

Along with the early Spring flowers comes house-cleaning days, comes new furniture, comes re-upholstering.

This Spring there also comes something worth while, in the nature of an upholstery fabric—of interest to every housewife—a splendid, long-wearing, economical upholstery material, which can be subjected to severe wear; can be easily cleansed with soap and water, without fear of harming.

Chase Leatherwove Galloway is the name of this wonderful upholstery fabric, which has been highly endorsed ever since the first day it was manufactured—some 21 years ago.

Ask your furniture dealer about Leatherwove Galloway, or write to L. C. Chase & Co., 89 Franklin St., Boston, Mass., for samples. (Adv.)

The Red Cross Expedition to Palestine

Council appropriated $390,000 as a beginning. The work is to be done in conjunction with the British Syrian and Palestine Relief Fund and the American Armenian and Syrian Relief Committee, with the last named of which the Christian Herald has been cooperating in relief work up to the present time. There will be four medical Red Cross units to combat prevalent diseases, and the purpose is to establish a large, well-equipped hospital at some suitable point as early as possible. Lay assistants will aid by devoting their time to general civilian relief, distributing food and clothing, and assisting in the rehabilitation and reconstruction of devastated areas. The present appropriation is intended to cover a period of six months.

Dr. Finley will leave for the Holy Land very soon for an indefinite stay.

Included in the Commission are Dr. Ward, already mentioned, who will hold an important post; Theodore Waters of the Christian Herald corporation, New York, who will represent a large constituency which has the welfare of Palestine deeply at heart; Jesse K. Marden, Boston; Charles E. Clark, Elyria, O.; William S. Dodd, Montclair, N. J.; Harry C. Hurd, Indianapolis; Harry Warren Carson, Danville, Ill.; Giles S. Pease, Worcester, Mass.; Julius A. Brown, Hartsdale, N. Y.; James H. Nichol, Auburn, N. Y.; B. Carter Milliken, Roselle, N. J.; A. Edward Kelsey, Portsmouth, R. I.; Arthur A. Bacon, Geneva, N. Y.; William C. Groeniger, Columbus, O.; Jacob Norman, Malden, Mass.; Frank H. Williams, Portsmouth, O.; Montgomery Ogden, Orange, N. J.; J. Milton Vance, New York City; Graham C. Hunter, Riverside, Cal.; Edmund B. Chaffee, New York City; Ethan O. Jago, New York City; Samuel Edgar, Greeley, Col.; R. Livingstone Methany, Beaver Falls, Pa.; Harry S. Huntington, Jr., Roselle, N. J.

With the Commission goes a large equipment of medical and surgical supplies for use in the hospitals, automobiles for transportation, and trucks to be employed in general service work.

Mr. Waters, who was called to this service in the early part of the movement, has the rank of Major. It will be remembered by many readers that Mr. Waters, shortly after the outbreak of the war, was sent to Europe by the Christian Herald and took the first cargo of supplies on the steamship Jan Blockx from England to Rotterdam, and thence by canal into Belgium, personally supervising its distribution in a number of the stricken Belgian cities and surrounding districts. He visited Brussels and, with the aid of United States Ambassador Brand Whitlock, organized a Christian Herald Relief Committee, which did excellent work. He also visited a number of the other warring countries, organizing, with the cooperation of the American ambassadors, committees in Berlin, Lodz, Belgrade, Vienna, Galicia, Constantinople, Paris and London. His letters, which appeared in these pages, were the history of a great humanitarian work in which tens of thousands of the good people of America succored the widows and orphans, and were the means of saving many lives and relieving a vast amount of suffering.

Mr. Waters, whose first letter appears in this issue, will find time in the intervals of his official duties to write fully concerning the progress of the great work which the Red Cross has undertaken in the Holy Land.

Stomach Acidity -the Cause of Over Fifty Diseases

By S. D. HOPKINS

IF I were asked to sound a health warning that would be of the greatest possible benefit to mankind, I should say emphatically—"Beware of acid stomach." For acid stomach is the cause of fermentation which, bad enough in itself, is the forerunner of over fifty ills that sap the energy and vitality of its victims. I venture to say that 90 per cent of all sickness starts with acid stomach.

Nature provides hydrochloric acid as one of the digestive fluids, but too much of this acid causes fermentation, hurries the food out of the stomach and carries the acid all through the body. As a consequence, poisons (toxins) are formed which are absorbed into the blood, causing auto-intoxication, nervousness, mental depression and countless ills of which this is but the beginning, as a glance at the accompanying chart will show.

Every one of the vital organs in time becomes affected—the heart, the liver, the kidneys, the intestines, the nerves and the brain all decline, for the stomach is the Power Plant of the body.

Stomach remedies only neutralize the acid because they are stronger than the acid. This ultimately ruins the lining of the stomach. The acid being neutralized is absorbed into the blood only to come back to the stomach in greater quantities at the next meal.

Go to the Source

How much more sensible would it be to attack this disorder at its source. Instead of attempting to neutralize acid after it had formed, why not prevent it from forming in the first place?

Superacidity is caused by wrong eating, and the remedy must be found in the field of the cause—in eating correctly.

The individual sufferer from indigestion, acidity, fermentation, gas and such disorders has not carried his experiments with food very far. If he had he could easily cure himself as Eugene Christian, the famous food scientist, has proved beyond all doubt.

The reason which led Eugene Christian to take up the study of food in the first place was because he himself, a young man, was a great sufferer from stomach and intestinal troubles.

So acute was his affliction that the best specialists of the day, after everything within their power had failed, gave him up to die. Educated for a doctor himself, Christian could get no help from his brother physicians.

Restored His Own Health

Believing that wrong eating was the cause and that right eating was the only cure, he took up the study of foods and their relation to the human system. What he learned not only restored his own health in a remarkably short space of time, but has been the means of relieving some 25,000 other men and women for whom he has prescribed with almost invariable success, even though most of them went to him as a last resort.

Christian says that all stomach and intestinal disorders—with their countless sympathetic ills—are caused by wrong selections and wrong combinations of food, and that right combinations of food will positively remove every stomach and intestinal disorder by removing its causes.

No one would think of putting salt into an open wound, and yet we do worse than that when we keep putting irritating acid-creating food combinations into our stomachs already surecharged with acid.

The Foods You Like Best

Christian believes in good foods deliciously cooked—the kind all of us like best and which may be obtained at any home store, hotel or restaurant. He says that most of the things that we eat are all right—but that we don't know how to combine or balance them.

Often, one food good in itself, when combined with another equally good food, produces an acid reaction in the stomach; whereas either of the foods alone or eaten in combination with some other food would have been easily and perfectly digested.

Study This Chart— Shows the Cause of 90% of All Diseases

Unfortunately, each food we eat at a meal is not digested separately. Instead, all of the foods we combine at the same meal are mixed and digested together. Consequently, if we eat two or more articles at the same meal which don't go well together, there is sure to be acidity, fermentation, gas and all kinds of digestive trouble.

There have been so many inquiries from all parts of the United States from people seeking the benefit of Eugene Christian's advice and whose cases he is unable to handle personally that he has written a course of little lessons which tells you exactly what to eat in order to overcome the ailment which is troubling you.

These lessons, there are 24 of them, contain actual menus for breakfast, luncheon and dinner, curative as well as corrective, covering all conditions of health and sickness, including acidity, constipation, and all including disorders, from infancy to old age and for all occupations, climates and seasons. They also tell you how to reduce and how to gain.

With these lessons at hand it is just as though you were in personal contact with the great food specialist, because every possible point is so thoroughly covered and clearly explained that you can scarcely think of a question which isn't answered. You can start eating the very things that will remove the causes of your disorder the day you receive the lessons and you will find that you secure results with the first meal.

bill in the House of Commons, members of the government set about drafting a Home Rule bill. It was said that general opinion favored a federal measure which could be made applicable to Scotland, Wales and England. Close observers of sentiment in Parliament declared that never on the surface at any rate had Ireland such a good chance for a form of self-government. Meantime, the very threat of conscription appeared to be solidifying the long divergent parties in Ireland into a measure of agreement never before known.

BATUM FALLS TO TURKS. An official statement issued at Constantinople, on April 15, announced the capture by the Turks after a two day battle with the defenders, of the city of Batum in the Russian Caucasus. The Turks also claimed advances east of Lake Van, which would indicate that they are attacking and pressing back the Georgians and Armenians on both flanks.

GERMANS LAND IN FINLAND. Berlin dispatches, on April 16, told of the landing of troops east of Helsingfors in Finland. After overcoming difficult ice conditions the troops pushed forward toward Viborg, which since the fall of Helsingfors had been the headquarters of the Finnish Red Guard. Dispatches from London placed the number of Germans in Finland at 40,000, while information coming through Stockholm indicated the continued success of the White Guards against the retreating Red Guards, who on April 16 had evacuated Abo. According to the Swedish information the backbone of the Finnish revolution had been broken.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA SHAKEN. Beginning at Barstow at 3.30 o'clock on Sunday afternoon April 21 an earthquake shock was felt throughout southern California. It was most severe at Hemet, San Jacinto and San Bernardino, but did considerable damage in Pasadena, Los Angeles, Long Beach and Santo Monica. Walls were cracked, plate glass windows were broken, chimneys were toppled over and the people were badly frightened. Many people were hurt and two deaths were reported.

CITY MUST BE GOOD. Because of uncontrolled vice in Philadelphia, where politics and police were hopelessly entangled, Secretary Daniels let it be known that the city must be cleaned up or the government would take drastic action. As a result the police department was reorganized, divorced from politics and practically commandeered the nation. Lieut. Col. C. B. Hatch, U. S. M. C., was appointed by the Navy Department to cooperate with police in removing conditions that threatened the health and efficiency of both soldiers and sailors. More than 200 property owners were notified that they must eliminate vice from their buildings.

FRAGMENTS OF NEWS. The Catholic directory for 1918 gives the number of Catholics now in the United States as machine-guns and 500 prisoners, of whom fifteen were officers.

The night of April 18 saw the end of attacks along the front of the battle of Armentieres. At Givenchy the enemy secured a limited footing at one or two points in the advanced positions. Elsewhere he suffered a complete repulse, especially south of Mt. Kemmel where he had made great preparations for the storming of the heights, the 117th and 11th Bavarian divisions and an Alpine corps, all hill fighters, being concentrated against Kemmel, which must be taken or outflanked before the Germans can go much farther west. Prisoners agreed that the German infantry had suffered heavy losses from British artillery fire before opening the day's attacks.

April 19th saw only local attacks, south of Mount Kemmel and in the neighborhood of Givenchy. The slaughter attending the repulses of the two preceding days had apparently destroyed the enemy's striking power. The day was marked only by an intense artillery fire on both sides. British counter-attacks northeast of Robecq and at Givenchy and Festubert completely restored to British hands all the positions penetrated by the enemy in the fighting of the two days preceding.

The most significant development of the day was the announcement by Premier Orlando, in the Italian Chamber of Deputies, that Italian forces had gone to France to form the right wing of the Allied army and that Italian regiments would soon be in action in the great battle. The announcement was received with great enthusiasm by all parties in the Chamber. It was reported that Italy could send 500,000 men to General Foch for use in the western front without endangering her own defense.

April 20th and 21st saw no material change in the positions of the armies in Flanders and in Picardy. British counter-attacks on Sunday southeast of Robecq and northeast of Bethune put them in possession of some German outpost positions. A German attack on the Belgians and British northeast of Ypres was stopped by artillery fire. Along the whole front of the recent battles both sides were busy getting ready for the next move. If Ludendorf had more men to gamble with, the Allies were ready to meet, shoulder to shoulder, such attacks as might develop. If the month's desperate fighting had left the enemy too weary to go on, General Foch was in a position to turn the tables and clinch the German's partial defeat with a complete allied victory.

After a bombardment with over 50,000 shells which set the city afire from end to end, Rheims was reported on April 20 to be no more than a ghastly ruin. The shell of the cathedral still stood.

GRADUALLY out of the mist of early reports there are coming interesting stories which explain the disaster before St. Quentin on March 21, 22 and 23. The British fifth army, under General Gough, here held a long line of well-placed trenches. In front of the first line were strongly held observation posts with machine-guns so placed that no enemy could advance without meeting an almost annihilating crossfire and enfilading fire. The whole setting of men and guns was mathematically, tactically and humanly perfect. But crossfire requires observation, and the whole carefully planned system of primary defense was rendered useless by a dense fog which covered the whole battle-ground. The observation posts and machine-gun posts were overrun before the British knew the enemy had left his trenches. Thus the German waves swept practically unbroken into the British battle positions.

All the carefully made plans of defense were scrapped. It became a case of each unit battling for a new position against an overwhelmingly superior enemy. The Fifth army was badly broken and the retreat toward the Somme was on. As always in open fighting when an army is pressed by superior numbers, there were times when adjoining corps or divisions would be separated and their flanks left in the air. Every time this occurred the enemy faced his much-sought opportunity to break through.

One of these penetrations, between Ham and Peronne, offered such a serious threat to the security of the British armies that a hurry up order was given to Major General Carey, in command of certain detachments behind the lines, to gather around some squadrons of cavalry such a force as he could and fill the gap. General Carey assembled his headquarters clerks, and advanced to take the positions assigned him. On his way he accumulated men from every element of the non-combatant forces. He had blacksmiths and mechanics of various sorts, clerks, cooks, messengers, road builders and commissary employees, many of them of little military training, most of them middle aged or old men. These he had to train to fight while they did it, to operate machine-guns while they were trained against an advancing enemy, to fight rear-guard actions while they learned the tactics of delay. Out of this motley force Carey produced an army that for five days fought the Boche to a standstill, figuratively and actually, and effectually blocked the gap until French and British reserves came up and took over the work. One of the principal elements of this heroic force was a battalion of United States Engineers. They had fallen back before the advancing enemy, being assigned the task of destroying a great ammunition dump, which done, they retired further and dug trenches. Under Carey, these engineers turned from pick and shovel to rifle and machine-gun and so acquitted themselves as to win the written commendation of General Rawlinson in command of the British army in this sector.

The final report on the work of the battalions of engineers, who fought so bravely in General Carey's mixed division, gives the total period of their fighting as thirteen days and their losses as 22 killed, 53 wounded and 45 missing.

A Sermon to Fishermen

It is customary in Lunenburg, the "Gloucester of Nova Scotia," to preach a farewell sermon in the spring to the men of the fishing fleet just before they sail for the Banks. This brief sermon was preached to four hundred men, in the Methodist Church of Lunenburg, N. S., on a recent Sunday evening, by Rev. E. E. Crowell, B. A.

MEN, the time has again come when you are called to sail away. I know that many of you dread to go. For the past few months you have enjoyed the comforts and pleasures of home and family, and this breaking away is hard for all concerned. However, it is the call of duty, and your response is: "We're ready!" You remember that there are those depending upon your labors: mouths to be fed, feet to be shod, bodies to be clothed, homes to be sustained, and good causes to be supported; therefore you go, that you may meet these legitimate demands like men!

There is another view that must not be lost sight of, and that is, as fishermen you are producers; you are one of the groups of people that stand between the world and want. You plow the seas to secure the harvests of the deep. Every time you come alongside of your vessel with your dory load, you can say: "Here is food for more families; we will beat off the wolves of starvation with food from the Banks." May the great Father above protect and prosper you, as you go forth to help supply the larders of the world.

I am perfectly aware that some of the things I am about to say do not apply to all of you; but I feel sure that every man will recognize his portion. When you leave the pier, you say, "Haul in your bow line." "Let go your spring." "Let go your after line." You even say to the anchor, "Let go of the mud." Are there not a few other things that you ought to "let go," for this trip and every trip? In the first place; Let go the booze! If in some port to which you go, you can get this by backdoor or hidden way, don't do it. Don't consider it smart to evade or defy law. It is no evidence of high manhood to go aboard a newly arrived vessel from a foreign port, and hint around for a bottle packed in straw. Don't carry "anything on your hip"—larger than a handkerchief. Rum is an enemy, and is to be dealt with as any other enemy; that is, to be watched, beaten and destroyed. The man who peddles booze is no friend to the community, and should be ridden out of town on a rail, and then told to get a ticket without a return. "The danger of the saloon is the safety of the people. Prohibition is like the railing on a bridge, it is to keep reckless drivers from going over." Be helpers in the struggle. Keep your brain clear and your nerve steady. If you are a drinker you are an enemy to your country, because you encourage the traffic which takes the grain for beer that ought to go for bread. Give your money to your family, a worthy comradeship to your wife, a good example to your children, and your heart to God.

Let go profanity. It is a foul, degrading, sinful habit. If you speak lightly of high things, you will hold them lightly; and no man can afford to speak lightly of God. When you take that name in vain, you empty it of its meaning. The profane man contaminates children and disregards the feelings of those who are purer than himself. The swearer advertises that he cannot control his temper or his tongue. Moreover, profanity is usually a sign of a rather vacant or lazy mind and a limited vocabulary.

Let go the unsavory story. One mark of a gentleman is to speak respectfully of women. If a woman is not worthy of your respect, do not degrade yourself by considering her name, even in a joke. Every woman is somebody's wife or mother, or sister or daughter; speak of her as you would like others to speak of yours.

A good haul on the fishing-grounds means not only your enterprise but God's goodness. Praise him; let every successful day be a thanksgiving day! Always bear in mind that there is One member of the crew whose name is not on the ship's papers. In storm or calm, God is near. He loves you every one, and there is not a thing he will not do for your good, if you will only walk uprightly. If distress or danger presses a prayer from your lips, he will hear you; or if, which is much better, prayer rises from your lips like water from a fountain, he still hears and is ready to help. Trust in him who is strong to deliver and "mighty to save."

Some day you will take your last voyage. When you do that, may you leave behind you a wake that will show that during all these years you were really sailing for the great Home Port; and when you "make the land," may you know that it is the Glory Land; may the light you see be the light of the City that is never darkened by a sorrow or a sin; and may the first voice you hear be the voice of him who shall welcome you with a "Well done, good and faithful servant."

Sail away, sail away, and may the blessing of God go with you and abide!

Send in Your Books

PARTICIPANTS in the National Bible Picture Study may now submit their sets of verses, and all sets must be submitted by May 31, 1918. Sets mailed as late as that final date—May 31—will be accepted, even though we receive them much later; the postmark will show that they were mailed on time.

The following excerpt from the Rules gives the directions for submitting sets. Everyone must follow these directions:

"Participants may submit sets of answers after April 22, 1918, but not later than May 31, 1918—which is the last day for submitting answers. Sets of answers sent by mail must be mailed not later than May 31, 1918. Sets of answers sent by express must be delivered at the express office on or before May 31, 1918. Participants who present sets of answers at the Christian Herald office personally or by personal messenger must do so before 5 P.M. May 31, 1918."

Tell your postal clerk, when he weighs your set of answers, that it must go as first class mail, upon which the postage rate is now three cents for each ounce or fraction. One Answer Book, in a thin envelope or light wrapper, will require nine cents in stamps. If wrapper or envelope is at all heavy, the postage will be twelve cents or more.

Be sure your set of answers carries sufficient postage! And do not fold or roll your set of answers; wrap it up flat.

Why Germany Cannot Rule the World

Dr. Gray Shows what Prophecy Clearly Fore-shadows on This Subject

By Prof. JAMES M. GRAY, D.D.
Dean of the Moody Bible Institute

THE further along we get in Dr. Gray's latest series of contributions on Prophecy, now running in the Christian Herald, the more interesting they become. Every article leaves a deep impression upon the mind of the careful reader and brings a flood of light on topics which to him have been wholly unexplained till now. In his article on "How the Kingdom and the Church Differ," he makes clear as noon-day the distinction with which comparatively few Bible readers are familiar. Another of his articles, published elsewhere in this issue of the Christian Herald, deals with the "Age and Its Apostasy"—another extremely difficult topic which he illuminates so that all may understand. The next article to come, which will appear two weeks hence, is still more vital to the moment, the title being "Why Germany Cannot Rule the World." A little later will come another contribution showing the bearing of prophetic fulfillment on the events of today, the title being "Prophecy Changing the Map of Europe."

Another article for the near future is a "Glossary of Prophetic Words" which is a complete vade mecum or guide-book for the student of the Bible, and which will prove a wonderful help over the "hard places." Can you, who read this, define the prophetic meaning of "Age," "Antichrist," "Armageddon," "Beast," "The Coming," "The Parousia," "The Times of the Gentiles," "The Dispensations"? Who are "Gog and Magog"? What is the "Remnant"? What is understood by "Restitution"? What does a "Week" signify in prophetic time? All of these are vital to the student of God's Word.

"FORTY PROPHETIC WONDERS"

By Rev. MICHAEL BAXTER

WE have ready for delivery that remarkable volume written, many years ago, by the Rev. Michael Baxter, entitled "Forty Prophetic Wonders." This book is known to very few now living, and is remarkable for many things. Dr. Baxter was an enthusiastic student of prophecy, and had collated all the best authorities of his own and preceding times, and they are set forth in his book with his own comment and interpretation. As an example of his perspicacity, it can be stated that among the conclusions he then reached were the following:

1. 1907-1919, Great European wars, beginning 24 to 10 years before the end of the age, including probably a German war or revolution.
2. 1919, The Euphrates (or Turkish Empire) dried up—Turkish power over Judea may notably decrease about the same time.
3. 1919-1925, Great revival among Christians everywhere and preaching of the Advent.
4. 1917-1919, Formation of the Ten-Kingdomed Confederacy foretold in Dan. 2: 8.
5. 1922-1929, Jerusalem to be restored and the Temple rebuilt.

Dr. Baxter's book goes much further than this, both before and after the dates indicated. It is the most complete setting forth of Scripture prophecies to be found anywhere. He himself never assumed to fix dates, but assembled the views of eminent students of the subject and gave the average of their computations. It is, in his view, a time of the unfolding of many mysteries, and the outcome of his many years of devotion to the great prophetic themes will have a wonderful fascination for all readers.

His book will be welcomed by all who love the Scriptures, and its influence will be to lead many to take a new view of the meaning of life, and of the great purposes of the Creator and Redeemer for the salvation and purification of the world.

OVER 200 TRUE STORIES OF THE GREAT WAR

In Six Thrilling Volumes. More than 200 True Stories of Adventure and Daring, Told by the Fighters, Thrilling Personal Experiences of Men on the Firing Line in the Greatest War, of Outraged Belgians, Prisoners of War, Air Men, Submarine Men, Torpedoed Castaways

THE true stories from the Fighting Front! Told by the fighters themselves! Will any set of books appear in the world in this year that will so enthrall readers of every degree and every taste?

For here is the one set of books in existence in which over 200 men and women "over there"—the very actors in the greatest tragedy in the history of the human race—give you first-hand, intimate, vivid, accurate, unforgettable pictures of the most dramatic episodes of the world-tragedy. They are reporting to you because the titanic struggle touches us all.

Look over the fascinating titles; a mere glance within the covers of any one of the six volumes will convince you that every American home must have this unique set of books, and that no wide-awake man or woman whose eye meets this announcement can afford to let the chance given here slip by.

These hundreds of stories will keep your eyes open wide from the first page to the last. They are the inside stories of the tremendous struggle, told by the very men and women on both sides who are fighting the battles in the trenches, in the air, on the sea and under the sea. No other stories in the world can be as interesting and thrilling, because no other thing since the world began has been so big and new and terrible as this war.

Here are tales told by the fighting Irishmen—the daring Scots—the daring Frenchmen—the brave Canadians—the bleeding Belgians—the starving Serbians—the bulldog Englishmen—the valorous Italians—the Russians, Greeks and Roumanians—the desperate Germans and their Austrian allies, and by no means least, here are the stories of our own Americans on the firing line.

There is no other set of books in the world to-day, no matter how costly, that appeals so universally to the American people.

There is no other set of books which so satisfies the cravings of the human mind and heart, which grips so strongly both old and young, which tells so intimately about the most important and tragic happening in the history of the world.

You cannot follow the wonderful stories told by these strong men and brave women without a glow of pride in your own manhood, without a thrill of true patriotism, without the uplift that comes from witnessing deeds of devotion, of self-sacrifice and heroism.

FICTION PUT TO SHAME BY FACTS

PICK up any one of the volumes, and you will not willingly lay it down; for you will find the stories so vivid, so dramatic, so stirring, so fascinating, so realistic, so absorbingly interesting, so heroic, so wonderfully told, that it leaves an ineffaceable impression on your mind. The images rise from the pages of this wonderful work like the creations of fiction, and you read on and on without effort or weariness.

Yes, Here Are True Stories of Adventure, Daring, Valor, Self-Sacrifice, Love, Passion, Fortitude, Revenge, Kindness—The Whole Gamut of Human Emotions—Far, Far, Beyond the Imaginings of the Greatest Fiction Writer (Whoever He May Be) That the World Has Ever Seen.

Here are Stories of the Submarines—of life at the bottom of the sea, of thrilling escapes—how they hunt for prey and are preyed upon—of ocean graves.

Here are Stories of the Air Fighters—of battles in the clouds—how it feels to drop 5,000 feet—how to twist and turn to get or avoid the enemy—of the fall to death.

Here are Stories of the Trenches—behind the big guns—on the firing step—"over the top"—"no-man's land"—the barrage—the bayonet charge—taps.

Here are Stories of the Ambulances—heroism of the nurses—silent suffering of the wounded—the doctors—scenes at the hospitals.

Here are Stories of the Battle Line—the thrill of victory—the despair of defeat—how brave men live and brave men die.

Here are Stories of the Atrocities—the true ones, attested and proved.

And remember, these stories are true. They are not the wild flight of imagination—no man could have written them who had ever been an author before. They are written without style—without polish—without fine language—without fine literature. Yet they will live in the annals of literature as no other writings of the war times will do.

OUR OFFER—SEND NO MONEY NOW

OUR offer to you is to send these six volumes to you free in connection with subscribing to The Christian Herald and The Review of Reviews, both for one year at the regular subscription price.

Denominational (Christian Endeavor)
Fellowship

B. Y. P. U. and Christian Endeavor
Topic. 1 John 1:1-7

"IF we walk in the light, as he is in the light, we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin."

The sons of darkness can have no fellowship with the sons of light. Sin bars the soul from the company of the saints. We walk by faith in the light of God's love, revealed through the Son. He stands illumined in the full favor of the Father, for he shared the Father's love for men enough to be a willing sacrifice for their redemption. If we love until we can rejoice in sacrifice, then we, too, as redeemed sons, shall walk in the light of God's favor. But if we harbor jealousy of another's success; if we covet the place of leadership for the adulation it brings; if we let our tongue dabble in mischievous tales; if we permit our minds to dwell on the gross and the impure; if we demand profit at another's loss; if we deal by a scant rule and a short measure, we will draw the veil of darkness between us and him. We could not stand the light in which he dwells, much less walk with him.

Fellowship means both a condition of sharing and a common endeavor. Between Britain, France and America just now there is developing a fellowship of devotion. United in suffering and in purpose, they wrestle together against the brute force of a nation which has turned its face against civilization, a nation that prays to God but worships Mars. Between Christians in the same communion a similar fellowship exists. Each church has its shibboleths and its points of emphasis. We enjoy the company of those whose religious thinking coincides with our own. We work happily with those who strive with us for the same goals according to similar methods. So there is a real fellowship within denominational lines. Christian Endeavor, however, overspreads denominational lines. It is one of the most potent of the forces which are helping to make the denominations subordinate, as they should be, to the great purposes of the Kingdom. Through Christian Endeavor, Presbyterians, Baptists, Methodists, Congregationalists, and all the other "ists" are adding to their denominational fellowship that wider fellowship which unites them in spirit and in purpose with all those in all connections whom Christ has redeemed and who walk in his light.

Speeding Up the Liberty Loan

great quota, resembles a great fair. Hundreds of gayly decorated booths in all parts of the city, enormous banners floating above the streets, speeding automobiles gayly hung with colors, and with passengers tooting for the success of the loan, give the streets the appearance of a big festival. The old-time "procession" of boyhood days would have turned green with envy at the sight of the beautiful ladies, the gold-braided musicians, the well-groomed animals, elephants, camels, and horses—comprising the first circus parade seen in Manhattan for many a year—all bearing banners boosting the big loan. Who could have imagined years ago those haughty monsters, the elephants, parading and silently pleading for cooperation in winning a world war?

At a meeting of moving picture interests on the New York Theatre Roof $787,000 was raised in twenty minutes for bonds. They will make it a million.

Reports from practically all parts of the country indicate heavy subscriptions by the foreign-born element. At six meetings held recently in Baltimore, $1,125,000 was pledged by Italians, Bohemians, Poles, Lithuanians, Jews and Germans. Americans of German birth in Pittsburgh have subscribed $137,000, and the foreign-born in Cleveland and Chicago are doing great work.

Women are doing great work in the campaign, according to reports. They have sold $12,000,000 worth of bonds in Pennsylvania, and in forty-five Indiana counties they have been responsible for the sale of $4,492,850 worth.

A statement from the Treasury Department, issued on April 18, gave this inspirational touch to the campaign:

"Tonight, the eve of the anniversary of the battle of Lexington," five twentieth century Paul Reverses will ride from Wichita, Kan., over various highways, carrying a message from Chairman C. L. Davidson to district and county Chairmen. Instead of horses, automobiles will be used, and speakers will be carried to spread the Liberty Loan message among rural residents. Each car will carry a Boy Scout bugler to announce its arrival. The message which will be distributed broadcast follows:

"A bond in every home! The war isn't over; neither is the loan campaign. Every idle dollar is an enemy alien. Put every county over the top!"

In response to the suggestion of Secretary McAdoo, strong appeals were made from thousands of pulpits on Sunday, April 21, in behalf of the Loan. In the metropolis, practically every church audience heard a Liberty Loan sermon at the forenoon service.

The program for the parade in New York, on Friday April 26, included among the marchers 20,000 mothers, wives and sisters of American soldiers and sailors, each carrying a service flag with the stars to represent the members of the individual families in service at the front. It is believed that such an appeal must produce great results and stimulate subscriptions.

From a Treasury Official in Washington, the following comment on the Loan campaign was given:

"One of the most striking developments of the present campaign is the prompt response from States whose population is largely rural. All of the States which have now exceeded their quotas are agricultural States. The list includes Iowa, Oregon, Arkansas, Kentucky, North Dakota, Montana, Utah, and possibly Minnesota. The Minneapolis District was the last to start its selling campaign and claims the attainment of its quota in six selling days.

The battle is being waged bravely, and with every one actively helping and buying to the limit it is hoped that the nation will be gladdened by the announcement of success at the close.

Buy Liberty Bonds! Everybody buy! Buy to the limit and help to win the war!

Why Take Less Than Your Full Share of Pleasure, Health and Happiness?

Why deny yourself the super-joys, the super-pleasures and the super-happiness? Why deny yourself the best there is in existence? Why deny yourself these advantages when they are so easily available, and when it is so absolutely certain that you can attain them? Why, in other words, live the inferior life in preference to the superior—the genuinely successful life? Why cheat yourself of the advantages of life? Why deny yourself this super-energy, this super-power, this super-health, this super-vitality, and this super-activity of personality and mind, that is made easily and absolutely possible through progressive evolution, self-evolution, scientific evolution, personal evolution — through Conscious Evolution.

WHAT OTHERS HAVE TO SAY:

"Conscious Evolution has done all for me that you promised and I am simply radiating good health. I can hardly believe it myself, it has made such a great change in me. I am in better condition than I have been for twenty years and am chuck full of energy and ambition. Tasks that were a burden to me in the past are now easy and a pleasure. I have no money to burn or throw to the birds, but if you were to offer me one thousand dollars in good hard cash and put me back where I was before beginning your system, I would say: 'Nothing doing.' I enjoy the work you have mapped out for me and am impatient to get at it."

"I SHALL BE SIXTY-SIX YEARS OLD NEXT AUGUST and if you were to see me right now you would say 'forty,' and, as a fact, I am better, stronger, and have more energy than the average man at forty. I have only you and your system to thank for these things, and I want to thank you from the very bottom of a grateful heart for what you have done for me. I am a man now in every sense of the word, whereas I was only a fraction of a man and rather a small fraction before profiting through Conscious Evolution."

"The strangest part of it all is that my hearing is greatly improved. The muscles of my shoulders, back and abdomen are immense, and I have forgotten that I have a liver, kidneys, heart, or any other organs, except my stomach, which makes a loud call three times a day. I have lost all desire for stimulants."

"I AM SEVENTY-ONE YEARS OF AGE, and in three weeks your system has apparently made a new man of me. I am so enthusiastic over Conscious Evolution that it is difficult for me to control myself, and not do more than you say. I want to thank you for the interest you are taking in my case. When I wrote you for your instructions I was in a very desperate condition. I have never been sorry for one minute that I have written you. On the contrary, I want to thank you for what you are doing for me. I am getting along fine; I am a wonder to myself. It does not seem possible that there could be such a change in any one in such a short time."

"When I tell some of my friends how quickly I was benefited by Conscious Evolution, they do not believe me. They think I exaggerate."

"One year ago I was an old man at forty; to-day I am a youth at forty-one."

"I must state that the principle of your system is the most scientific, and at the same time the simplest, I have ever heard. You do not misrepresent one single word in your advertising."

"Just think of it, five weeks ago I was ashamed of my physique, to-day I am almost proud of it. I am delighted with Conscious Evolution."

"Fourteen years ago at the age of sixty-eight I was an old man; to-day at the age of eighty-two I am the marvel of my friends; I am younger than most men at forty. Your system gave me a new lease on life."

"Last week I had a reading of my blood pressure, and was gratified to learn that it was fully ten points below the previous reading. This was a surprise to me as well as to my physician, who did not believe that my blood pressure could be reduced because of my advanced age."

"Doctors told me I had hardening of the arteries and high blood pressure. They advised me exercise. Conscious Evolution reduced my blood pressure and made a new man of me."

"The beauty of your whole advertisement is that every word of it is the truth. Your system is the most wonderful in the world; it gave me new energy, strength and life, in other words, it made a new man of me. I have been an advocate of your system since the first day I used it. I have withstood a mental strain during the past year which would have broken my health had it not been for your system."

"Can't describe the satisfaction I feel."

"Worth more than a thousand dollars to me in increased mental and physical capacity."

"I have been enabled by your system to do work of mental character previously impossible for me."

"I was very skeptical, now am pleased with results; have gained 17 pounds."

"The very first lessons began to work magic. In my gratitude I am telling my croaking and complaining friends, 'Try Swoboda.'"

"Words cannot explain the new life it imparts both to body and brain."

"It reduced my weight 20 pounds, increased my chest expansion 5 inches, reduced my waist 6 inches."

"I cannot recommend your system too highly, and without flattery believe that its propagation has been of great benefit to the health of the country."

"My reserve force makes me feel that nothing is impossible, my capacity both physically and mentally is increasing daily."

"I have heard your system highly recommended for years, but I did not realize the effectiveness of it until I tried it. I am glad indeed that I am now taking it."

"Your system developed me most wonderfully."

"I think your system is wonderful. I thought I was in the best of physical health before I wrote for your course, but I can now note the greatest improvement even in this short time. I cannot recommend your system too highly. Do not hesitate to refer to me."

"You know more about the human body than any man with whom I have ever come in contact, personally or otherwise."

"Your diagnosis and explanation of my brain trouble was a revelation to me. I have had the best physicians of my State, but your grasp of the human body exceeds anything I have ever heard or known. I have read your letters to many people, also to my physicians, who marvel at them."

"I feel that I must express once more my sincerest and warmest appreciation of the benefit you have given me. Had anyone told me that I could possess such fine quality of body and such development as I do at present, after nine weeks of Conscious Evolution, I would have said that they were raving mad. You have proved beyond the shadow of a doubt that you can do everything you say. In fact, I believe you really do more than you promise. Results have been so startling in my case that I feel that I have been born again. At the time of writing I feel full of life, energy and ambition. My body has assumed a most graceful shape, of which I am more than proud and thank the day that I ever heard of you. I could write you a whole lot about your Conscious Evolution, I feel so thankful. There is no better value on God's earth than what you offer, and anyone who doubts your statements must be indeed more than skeptical. I would consider it an honor to have you use my letters in every way you think fit."

"I am very thankful that the Lord directed me to Conscious Evolution through 'The Christian Herald.'"

Evolution — consciously brought about through Conscious Evolution—is the beginning of a new era. Will you continue to live in the old conditions, or do you intend to enter into the new life—the better life, the superior life, the pleasurable life, the joyous life, the successful life, and the happy life?

These New Copyrighted Books Free

"Conscious Evolution" and "The Science of Life" will show you how you can increase the pleasures of life to a maximum—how to intensify them and how to make your life more profitable, pleasurable and joyous.

"Conscious Evolution" and "The Science of Life" are the A, B, C of evolution and persistent youth. These books explain Conscious Evolution and the human body as it has never been explained before. They explain the Swoboda theory and the laws of mind and body. They startle, educate and enlighten. They explain as never before the reason for the evolution of the mind and body.

They tell how the cells and their energies build the organs and the body, and how to organize the cells beyond the point where Nature left off for you, and where you, as Nature, may continue your self-evolution.

These books will give you a better understanding of yourself than you could obtain through reading all of the books on all of the sciences and philosophies on the subject of mind and body.

These essays will show you the way to the full life, the superior life, the more satisfactory life, the lively life. They will show you how to overcome the inferior life, the feeble life, the negative life, the unsatisfactory life.

"Conscious Evolution" and "The Science of Life" will show you how to increase your pleasures and happiness to a maximum, and how to reduce your troubles of every character, mental, physical, physiological, and conceptual to a minimum. Conscious Evolution will show you how to intensify, prolong, increase and magnify your pleasures.

"Conscious Evolution" and "The Science of Life" will show you that you have not as yet experienced the real and highest pleasures of life, and will show you how to attain the super-pleasures of life. Life will mean much more to you when you intensify your pleasures through Conscious Evolution.

Why Deny Yourself Super-Pleasures, Super-Joys and Real Happiness?

"Conscious Evolution" and "The Science of Life" which Swoboda has written and copyrighted, will be sent to you free of charge and free of all obligation to Swoboda, if you will write for them.

Just write your name and address on this page, tear it out and mail it to Swoboda or drop a ring about your name on your letterhead, or merely send a postcard giving your name and address. Do it today! You cannot afford to live on inferior life!

The WOODS of YESTERDAY

Childhood's not so far away,
 You can find it any day.
 If you turn, and backward creeping,
 Find the woods where magic sleeping,
 Wakes to greet the searching eye—
 Ah, the woods where pixies fly
 Airily from tree to tree;
 Where the humming of a bee
 Is a witch's voice invoking!
 Blackest magic quite provoking!
 Where a robber band is hiding,
 Where a brownie troop is riding,

Bucking beetles;
 I have seen
 Devils' ring, and fairy green;
 Hollow logs that gnomes lived under,
 Caves where elf-land hid its plunder.
 Childhood's not so far away,
 In the Woods of Yesterday.

Childhood's not so far away,
 If you wander back with me,
 Where the shadowed willow tree

Takes an almost human form,
 Where a far-off thunder storm
 Is a fairy fight at sea....
 What if hair is streaked with grey,
 When the heart is young and dancing,
 When the eyes are ever glancing
 At the magic few may see?

Childhood's not so far away;
 Come with me, and we will stray
 Through the Woods of Yesterday!

Our Army of Girls at Washington

By ABBY GUNN BAKER

THE declaration of war hurled an avalanche of work upon the great departments of the government at Washington, particularly those of the Army and Navy. Then when the first draft came and all the departments lost many of their young men clerks the situation became so serious that the Civil Service Commission began advertising for young women to fill the new positions created by the war as well as those which the draft had made vacant; and young women from almost every state in the Union began responding to the call.

It was not realized at that time what an influx of young women would come to Washington to take these positions; but when they began to arrive daily, first by dozens and then by forties and fifties, the general secretary of the Young Women's Christian Association, Miss Florence Brown, who is blessed with a broad vision of the possibilities for the work of the Association, and who has unusual executive ability, saw that some provision should be made for boarding-places for the girls before they reached the city. She wrote the War Department, offering to cooperate in finding suitable homes for the new young women. In June, July and August the girls continued to come in increasing numbers. Every day brought fresh instalments of them to the city, and suddenly they began flocking into the G Street Y. W. C. A. building.

"The War Department sent us to you. Where shall we go to find boarding-places?" was the cry of the girls to the secretaries.

THE need of this action on the part of the government was evident to any one who took an interest in the new girls. They arrived in such numbers that in less than three months, last fall, forty-two hundred of them had applied to the Y. W. C. A. for boarding-places. They are still coming, and many of them are having their first experience in being away from home. One evening a Washington woman who is actively identified in many kinds of war relief work sat opposite a young girl at a dining-table in a restaurant on Capitol Hill. The girl, who was exceedingly pretty and who looked exceedingly young, was evidently a stranger. By gentle questions the older woman drew from the girl her story. She lived in a state in the extreme southwest of the country. She had seen the fascinating advertisements of the Civil Service Commission for government positions in Washington, she had taken the examination, and had received her appointment by telegram. She knew no one in Washington, but the salary offered was fabulously large to her, and she determined to come. "But your mother, how did she feel about it, and what did you expect to do when you reached here?" questioned the Washington woman.

"Oh, mother didn't want me to come, of course," replied the girl lightly, "but it was too good an offer to miss. I didn't 'now anybody living here, but I had heard of two boys in our township who had come to Washington to take Civil Service positions, so I telegraphed them to meet me. They met me all right, and they were just as nice as they could be. They said it was awfully gritty of me to come on alone."

"But what did you do?" gently insisted her interrogator.

"Well, it was dark when I got here, so the boys took me out for my supper, and then they took me to a hotel for the night."

"To a hotel, and you alone?"

"Y-e-s, I'll own I was pretty badly scared," the girl blushed as she spoke. "It was the first time I had ever been in a big hotel. But I gritted it out, and the next morning the boys came and took me to the office where I was to report for work."

"How did you find a boarding-place finally?" again asked her companion.

"Well, when my chief at the office asked when I came into town and where I was staying he seemed surprised about the hotel, and he asked me what I was going to do for a home while I was here. I told him I didn't know, I supposed it was up to him, as he was my boss. He looked awfully sober, but he was just as game about it as he could be. I guess he telephoned to all the friends he had in town before he found me a place. After a long time he came back and gave me the address of a widow he knew and told me how to get to her house. She was awfully good to take me in, for she had never had roomers before. She gave me the nicest kind of a room, and gives me my breakfast every morning before I go out. I get my lunch in the office building and I get my supper—I mean dinner, we call the six o'clock meal supper out home—wherever I like. I think I was awfully lucky, don't you?"

Most of us will agree that she was far more than lucky.

SO many of the girls come without the slightest idea of where they will be housed after they reach Washington. One stormy, snowy afternoon last January this same Washington woman was called to her telephone and asked if she could see a girl who had come from the same town in the West in which the Washington woman was reared. Of course the girl was invited to the house, and in a little while she appeared. She told her hostess that the Civil Service had advertised in their home papers, in a city of about twenty thousand, and that thirteen of the girls living there had taken the examination; all of them had passed and had been appointed by telegram from the War Department.

"Three of us have come on together now, and the others will come in a few days," said the girl. "We do not know any one in Washington, but the Baptist minister out home knows your brother and he gave us a letter to you, because he said he was sure you would find us boarding-places."

And it was five o'clock in a stormy winter afternoon in crowded Washington, where boarding-places were at high premium! However, the faith of the Baptist minister was honored, and the three girls were comfortably housed, but the Washington woman devoutly hoped that the remaining ten girls would give her a little longer notice of their expected arrival.

Stories of this kind could be multiplied indefinitely, and it was that condition which led the Washington churches to organize hospitality committees to look after the young women who are strangers. The pastors appealed from their pulpits, urging every family in their congregations who could spare a room in their home to place it, at reasonable terms, with the church hospitality committee. They urged also that wherever it was possible the family should board the girls as well as provide rooms, in order that the girls might be thrown under home influence. The result has been fairly satisfactory, and hundreds of girls have thus been taken into the family life of Christian homes.

While this last statement is true it must not be overlooked that the churches have by no means reached all of the girls, nor indeed half of them. The Y. W. C. A. has kept steadily on with its part of the work. In addition to placing thousands of the newcomers in private boarding-places the Association opened two large buildings of their own. Through the generosity of Mrs. Elizabeth Somers, the founder of one of Washington's best-known fashionable finishing schools, the Mount Vernon Seminary, the Association secured the two buildings at Eleventh and M streets, formerly used by the Seminary. In addition to naming a most reasonable price for the buildings Mrs. Somers turned them over to the Association completely furnished. They were immediately filled by the young women government clerks, and there was a long waiting-list. The Association maintains also two cafeterias where several thousand young women have their lunches daily. The G Street building is well equipped with reading and rest rooms, a spacious gymnasium and swimming-pool, beside several class- and sewing-rooms where the girls are made welcome at all hours.

IN addition to providing boarding-places for the girls the churches of Washington have added many social and other features to their usual weekly programs. Classes have been formed in the Sunday schools especially for the new girls, where every girl who joins is brought into the home of the teacher and becomes an especial object of interest to the Christian Endeavor Society or other young peoples' organization of the church. It has become a custom also in the larger churches to keep the buildings open Sunday afternoons where members of the hospitality committee are present with the young people of the church to welcome not only the girls who are strangers but the soldiers and sailors who come in great numbers. At six o'clock a buffet supper is served without price and with a cordial welcome to the strangers. An acquaintance hour follows, and there is always music, when everybody sings—and how the men in uniform do love to sing! Before the hour closes some distinguished man or woman usually makes a short talk. At eight o'clock the entire company goes into the church auditorium for the evening service. The wife of the Vice-President, Mrs. Marshall, and the wife of the Secretary of the Navy, Mrs. Daniels, frequently help to receive at these church entertainments, and Mrs. Baker, the wife of the War Secretary, who has a gifted voice, often sings at the different churches during the social hours.

Social clubs of all kinds have been organized for the new girls. At the Church of the Covenant, Presbyterian, which has led all the other churches in the work for the soldiers and strangers, a music club meets every Tuesday evening and free instruction is given in voice culture and note-reading to the girls who are strangers. Another evening of the week, at this church, is devoted to recreational pleasures. On other evenings Red Cross work is carried on, and French classes are maintained for those who wish them.

At Calvary Baptist Church an organization called simply "The Girls' Club" meets on Friday evenings. As an illustration of the diversity among the girls—fifty-four were present at the first meeting of the club and they were from twenty-four different states. The big banquet hall of the church building is thrown open to the club, where classes in surgical dressing, knitting and other Red Cross activities are conducted. The pianos of the church are placed at the disposal of those who care to use them. Instruction in French is given for those who care to learn by an efficient French teacher, and the Sunday school library is thrown open to those who wish to use it. The object of the club is to make the girls feel that the church building is a home for them, so the big roomy kitchen, with its long tables and gas ranges, is open to them, and fudge parties are one of the popular features of the club. Easy chairs and rockers are provided for those who would rather sit and chat together than to join in the activities. Miss Mary Glascock, who is the superintendent of nurses in one of the large hospitals of the city, is at the head of this club, and her efficient practical training explains much of the success the club has made.

Several of the other leading churches also have clubs for the girls of the same kind. But the Y. W. C. A. is conducting much the largest of any of them.

This Y. W. C. A. club was an outgrowth of the Billy Sunday meetings and is a continuation of the organization of the business women's meetings which were held during the Sunday campaign. At the close of Mr. Sunday's meetings the young women organized themselves into a Business Women's Club and became auxiliary to the Y. W. C. A. Miss Belle Bagley, the sister of the well-beloved wife of the Secretary of the Navy, who is employed in one of the departments at Washington, was made president of the club, and a full roster of other officers were elected. This club meets in the Y. W. C. A. buildings and has educational classes as well as those for physical culture, swimming, and dramatic art. They use the library and the assembly halls of the building and carry on all kinds of Red Cross work. Once a week the club gets together for a jolly good time, when good things to eat are served and all kinds of "stunts" and entertaining features are given by the members, or by outside talent.

WHAT the girls are making of their stay in Washington, and what it might mean to them, is pretty clearly illustrated by a conversation that took place between two of the girls at one of their clubs recently.

"I thought I'd die of loneliness when I first came to Washington," said a young girl from Maine one evening when talking with a friend at her club. "I got in a boarding-house when I first came here where the landlady evidently had determined to make all she could out of us, with the least outlay possible on her part. She filled every nook and cranny of her big house. The 'new girls' were her victims, though she told us repeatedly that she was doing her 'patriotic bit' by taking us in. She took us in all right on the average of forty dollars a month apiece, and we calculated it cost her fully ten dollars per person to feed us. She brought soldiers home with her from church for Sunday dinners, and if they were handsome young officers they always went with her daughters for an auto ride after dinner. If they were only plain privates in khaki the rest of us girls could have them in the parlor. Sometimes she got left on that dicker, for some of the private soldiers went a long ways ahead of her officers."

"Well, we stood it as long as we could, but after we joined the club and found that boarding-places weren't nearly as scarce in Washington as we had been led to believe, nor as high-priced, our emancipation day came, and several of us have found mighty pleasant boarding-places elsewhere. Still," she added energetically, "it costs a lot of money to live in Washington, and I have found as far as money goes I saved as much on a salary of six hundred dollars in Maine as I'll be able to save on twelve hundred dollars here."

But the girl who answered her had learned far more truly what living in Washington in these epoch-making days might mean. Said she:

"I've found it expensive to live here too, but have you taken into consideration the advantages—the Library of Congress, the public buildings, the art galleries, the beautiful city itself? But aside from that, think of being in Washington, the capital of our nation, when history is being made as it is today! Think of being able to see the War Congress and the world's greatest people whom the war is bringing to Washington! We are seeing history made, and that is wonderful, but I think too, sometimes," she added shyly, "that I am doing my bit for my country by being in the government service now, and surely that is an honor none of us would miss."

Religious Activities in the Soldiers' Camps

By REV. H. B. ROLLER, Evangelist

IT is quite evident of late that trouble may become a means of spiritual understanding. It seems as though some men must be knocked down or removed from their environments before they really get a true vision of life. Truly man's "light affliction, which is but for a moment, is working out for him a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory." God permits the bitter to be mixed with the sweet. Man often gets so busy digging in the soil for dollars, so busy in his business pursuits for gain, so busy in professional life for standing and salary, that he will not look up at the Sun of Righteousness until the Lord puts him on his back.

The psalmist says, "For in the time of trouble He shall hide me in his pavilion. In the secret of his tent shall he hide me. God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble." Then, like the sun's rays bursting forth through the dense, dark, storm-threatening clouds, the psalmist exclaims, "Oh that men would praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men!"

With these words as introduction, I want to point out a bright side of the soldier's life, as I saw it in Camp Taylor, Kentucky. While in a union revival meeting in an Indiana town I received two invitations by telegram, asking me to spend the time from March 25 to 31 in Camp Taylor. The Holy Week was set apart as a special time to conduct evangelistic services in the camp. The following special speakers were also called to conduct these meetings: Dr. Vance from Nashville, Tenn., Dr. Fox from Springfield, Ohio, Dr. Hanson, recently in charge of the religious work in a camp in Texas, and Dr. Mantle from England. Each man was assigned to a Y. M. C. A., where he preached each night, with special services during the day as occasion demanded it. With Rev. E. Y. Mullins, D.D., president of the Southern Baptist Seminary, at Louisville, Ky., as Camp Religious Work Secretary, and around him other men of faith and devotion, the spiritual work is well looked after.

I WAS assigned to Y. M. C. A. building No. 157, in the Field Artillery Department of the camp. Since thousands of readers whose sons and relatives are in a camp have not had the opportunity to study camp life or inspect the religious work of the camp, I trust I will not be considered out of place when I go somewhat into detail, for I want the readers to know that the young men have every chance they need to live clean, act clean, and, if need be, fight clean.

The attendance at the religious service is always voluntary, but we never lacked for good attendance. I was fortunate in being associated with very fine, sincere, Christian workers, and shall never forget the

Y. M. C. A. secretaries, who were so eager to do all they could to encourage me and show their appreciation of the efforts to lead men to Christ. Religion seemed to beam from the very countenances of those men.

Congregations who wish to break their pastors of preaching long sermons or reading manuscripts in the pulpits, should give them a vacation and let them preach to the soldiers. If they do not come back cured, their case is hopeless.

The speaker must grip his men and hold them absolutely or he loses his audience. It is a constant study to know how to hold every man and get the truth to reach the heart of the soldier. Mr. Gerald Karr Smith, business manager of the Y. M. C. A. work in the camp and a song-leader of experience, usually led the music, assisted by a chorus-choir of soldier-boys. I saw to it that my sermon was brief and to the point, since the religious service was not always the only attraction of the evening, but occasionally it was preceded by a musical or illustrated lecture, and occasionally was preceded and followed by other attractions. Our services were held at 6:15 or 7 P. M. The attendance varied on account of the war movements, as the soldiers are constantly coming in and going out of the camp. When the song leader gave a chance to choose a hymn some one was liable to call out, "Where's my Wandering Boy Tonight?" That song was more frequently called for than any other song in the book. The men love hymns and sing well. The old Gospel songs seem to be preferred to some of the new songs bordering on ragtime music.

ON the second night when I asked how many men wanted to be subjects of prayer, about twenty-five raised their hands. When we gave an invitation on the third night for men to come forward, a number responded at once and later signed the War Roll Card, which reads like this: "I hereby pledge my allegiance to the Lord Jesus Christ as my Saviour and King, and by God's help will fight his battles for the victory of his kingdom. Name, Regiment, Regimental Number, Camp, Home Address, Member of Church, and Church Preference. Date." Some of those who signed the cards are members of some branch of the church. We did not hand out cards through the audience, for we wanted men definitely committed to Christ by coming forward. It was a grand sight to see men come forward with moist eyes and determination on their faces. Frequently men came to see us alone about their spiritual condition. In the quiet moments while the men were coming forward and the names were being signed, it gave us a chance to get at the heart of the soldier and definitely commit him to Christ.

On the afternoon of Easter Day, we spent about three hours in the base hospital, calling on the sick. Songs were sung, flowers were distributed, and over 300 scrap-books and joke-books arranged for soldiers were given out to invalids. Many of them thanked us for our kindness. I most highly recommend this method of cheering the inmates of the hospitals. More than 400 calls were made that afternoon on the 1,500 patients in the wards. Frequently we saw the New Testament and the Bible used by the soldiers or lying by their side on the cot. Free stationery was furnished to all the invalids who desired it. When we came to contagious wards we furnished the material to the chief nurse to be distributed by her. In one ward we entered the department of the "furious ones," kept under close guard, behind locked doors.

ON former occasions I went through the "dirty wards," as my guide called them, where hundreds of cases of venereal diseases are being treated. If any one wants to know what the sin of impurity leads to, there is the place to visit. It is sad in the extreme.

It was easier for me to preach and warn men that night than usual, as I had seen the great need of a clean life in order to fight a clean battle. It was a pleasing sight to see how the faces of the soldiers brightened up one night when I showed the true greatness of our government in removing the temptation of liquor from them, and the red light district could not live or be permitted within five miles from a cantonment, and made plain to them that no soldier need to go wrong, even if he enters the maelstrom of liquor and immorality in Europe, for soldiers can set their faces against these things like flint, if they will.

It is for work along these lines that the Y. M. C. A. is being used of God to provide a social center, free from enticements of evil, to provide entertainment, innocent amusements, and religious instruction, and to found "a home away from home." I found some of the finest Christian characters in the meetings. There are scores of men in the ranks who are men of deep piety and consecration, with great ability and are Christian leaders, exerting a good influence among the men.

ON my closing night I asked for an expression to learn how many men were members of some church, and it was encouraging to see the hands raised. Among the number who came out definitely that night for Christ and signed the War Roll card,

"The City of the Sun"

Wonderful Cuzco. Its Inca Builders and Their Descendants Today. By CLAYTON SEDGWICK COOPER

THE traveler who is able to endure high altitudes will look long about the world today before finding a more picturesque or interesting historic spot than the region of the Peruvian Andes, the original home of the Incas. Cuzco, the City of the Sun, was their capital and the seat of the old dynasty that ruled an empire extending from Quito in Ecuador to the southern coast of Chile.

Here on the west coast of South America there existed a civilization in the early part of the sixteenth century when the Spanish conquerers arrived which was more advanced and productive of agricultural results, especially, than that which has been seen since under the rule of the Peruvians of Spanish stock.

When Pizarro and his adventurous followers came to Peru, there were nearly eight millions of these Inca inhabitants in this country alone, industrious, law-abiding, practicing the arts of road-making, irrigation of lands, and the tilling of the soil, making the table-lands of this sequestered section one of the most prosperous parts of the American continent at that period. The llama trains followed by the stolid Indians still climb the Cordilleras along the ancient Inca highways, and the remains of fortresses and temples and tombs, together with the mountainsides still bearing the scars of an industrious agriculture, speak eloquently and pathetically of days that are dead, the days when the sun god ruled alone.

Although these Inca remains are found throughout the Andean sections of Peru, the capital city of these races of men, who lived and worked and carried on an ordered civilization long before our fair North American lands were discovered or settled, continues to be the great center of interest to those who find in these early ruling races of South America subjects of fascinating study. Every part of Cuzco is remindful of the past. It is one of the most antique and spectacular of cities. It is too remote to have been very thoroughly modernized as yet, though a railway recently built, and owned by an English company, connects it with the west coast at Mollendo, after a two days' train ride. "Sorochee," or mountain sickness, is common to travelers visiting these lofty regions where one reaches over 14,000 feet above sea-level. Yet the proximity to the equator affords a climate capable of permitting many kinds of agriculture on the rolling plains and in the rich valleys of this mountain world. White men are comparatively few. Mixed breeds abound. The Indians do virtually all the work, and under conditions that resemble slavery much too closely.

AS one enters Cuzco through a wide green valley studded frequently with Indian villages, he finds this old and famous seat of power lying in a hollow of the hills, with green mountains all about and an air of remoteness and age afforded by the decaying buildings and great Inca walls and temples. It is at once evident that the city with its wide plazas was built for a much larger population than that which is found there today. The sanitary condition of the town reminds one of Seoul, Korea, before the Japanese arrived. The medieval air of ecclesiasticism is felt in the old churches, the cathedral, and in the monasteries filled with Spanish priests. The Indians whose famous capital here at Cuzco ruled the land, now sell their trinkets and vegetables in the market places under picturesque booths and clad in their even more picturesque ponchos and flat, round hats; or bend double beneath their heavy loads as they trot through the winding streets.

The Plaza des Armes of Cuzco is unforgettable. It is a sea of color, color everywhere. There are Indian men and women in variegated clothing from the distant Sierras, modern cholos wearing hats made in Germany; a team of mules drags the antiquated Cuzco horse-car and long trains of lofty-necked llamas sweep by you each with his back-full of alpaca from the high interiors.

We called it a four-ringed circus, and so it is; as you sit in this great flower-filled square, more than eleven thousand feet above sea-level, the semi-tropical sun shedding its warmth radiantly upon your head through the thin, transparent, cloudless air, you find yourself wondering which way to face lest something of the strange ever-unfolding scenes escape your gaze. One side of the square is lined by a row of little shops filled with fifty-seven varieties of merchandise in which predominate gay-colored saddles and diverse accoutrements for the burros and pack animals, with profuse decorations of red and green and blue wool; before these shops sit Indian and cholo women holding in their hands spindle spools which they manipulate dextrously during the intervals of trade, spinning the wool and weaving it into the poncho and caps and full shirts of the native dress.

Part of the old Inca Wall and the Temple of the Sun, Cuzco, Peru

Above these quaint places of merchandise in the top of these two-storied houses that spread out over the sidewalks are homes with elaborately carved balconies overhanging the street in old Spanish fashion, and with red tiled roofs that glitter in the sun.

On another side of the plaza stands the ancient cathedral, built as one is told of the famous Inca stone and containing the brother of Pizarro and that Spanish conqueror's partner, Almargo. On the doors of the chapel of Santiago, adjoining the cathedral, one can read the legend preserved in archaic sculpture of St. James coming down visibly on his white horse, standing with lance in rest, turning the tide of battle in favor of the Spaniards, thus noting the last throes of the famous Inca empire.

On still another side of the square, you can study the remarkable façade of the old Jesuit church and the ancient University of Cuzco founded in the sixteenth century, which buildings are said to be connected by an underground passage, associated with many an historic intrigue in the days that are dead.

These great piles of ancient masonry look straight away to the east where the great megalithic fortress of Saesahuaman, that cyclopean structure often called the ninth wonder of the world, tops the hill 600 feet above the city, and where one climbs to behold the rock remains which guarded the aboriginal Inca empire of Manco Capac. On the summit stands a cross bearing the inscription to the effect that he who climbs the hill, kisses the crucifix and says a prayer at the foot of the cross, to him a hundred days of indulgence shall be granted.

Here one can sit for hours and dream out again the scenes that were enacted on these bounding terraces overlooking the heart of the Inca city. It was an agricultural empire—this far-famed empire of the children of the sun. It was a kingdom of labor, and a nation that depended upon the land. On one great slope of hill which is now waving with golden grain, the Cuzconian will point out to you the place where in order to dignify labor the old Inca kings were wont to initiate with their own hands the seasons of planting and harvest. The Inca king, amidst pomp and festival, would go to the terraces of the Coleompata, and begin to break up the soil with a golden pickaxe, while the populace stood below in the famous square with uncovered heads. Later when the maize and quinoa had ripened he again went out amid the rejoicing of the multitudes to signalize the harvest time by plucking the first fruits of the high standing grain. These harvests were under the direct supervision of the Inca Son of Heaven, and seeds from this first harvest were distributed throughout the empire.

No one can journey through this land of the Incas, behold the great roads and aqueducts and see the scarred faces of the mountain which were in other centuries cultivated to the very summits, and realize that the irrigation of the present day is still carried through the trenches that old Inca hands prepared, without feeling a high sense of respect for this people who antedated the Spanish conquest and in many respects were superior to their victors.

IN these ancient days such vices as now fasten themselves upon the Indian were virtually unknown. Lying, stealing, and adultery were punishable by death in the Incas' reign. Instead of the present condition of drunkenness and sloth, too apparent in many of the Indian communities, the old ancestry showed sobriety and an industry that has rarely had its equal anywhere on the face of the earth. Is it to be wondered that one finds certain old families or tribes directly descendant from the Inca kings who hold themselves proudly aloof and bear in their faces and general attitudes a conscious dignity of lineage that disdains association with the diluted racial stock that now for the most part has become the servile vassal of the semi-white man?

The brown faces of the Indians who follow their llamas through the dusty streets of Cuzco give food for thought. They are dark, sorrowful, somber faces, and reflect the unspeakable tragedies that the last four centuries have wrought upon the natures of a once noble race of men. These people who efface themselves in the presence of the white man, turning out to give him space as a pariah might make a wide circle around a Brahman in India; these men who work for twenty-five cents a day, or are impressed for long periods of labor for the price of the coca leaves and alcohol that the landowner or the gangster may give them; this long-suffering race upon which all Peru lives at present, and upon whose ignorance and superstition the Roman Church thrives and grows arrogant in the Andean tableland; these tillers of the soil and keepers of sheep and alpacas on the cold windy slopes of the paupers where white men cannot live, dwelling in vermin infested huts that are breeding places of typhus and a dozen deadly forms of destruction, seeing even about Cuzco 90 per cent. of their children die before they are two years of age; these are the sad descendants of those 200,000 Incas who inhabited Cuzco when Pizarro came to loot and to kill, and to carry away out of the Cuzco temples alone $100,000,000 in gold treasure, giving in return a destiny of labor and slavery.

IN the cathedral and in fact in all of the forty or more churches of Cuzco, where barely 20,000 inhabitants now remain of the once populous city, the traveler will see the pathetic vision of the Indian bowing with his head touching the stone floor, his face a study of abject fear and ignorant awe. In spite of the fact that the scales of justice seem to have been held so unevenly by his rulers in Peru, the strength of the race is revealed in many ways. On his small bit of land in the fastnesses of the high ranges about the City of the Sun, he lives an independent and often happy existence, an ardent worshipper of the life-saving tropical sun.

To Put Liberty Loan Over the Top

ON April twenty-seventh, the subscriptions to the Third Liberty Loan officially received and acknowledged totaled $2,178,877, 050, and subscriptions were coming in at a constantly increasing rate. The twenty-sixth, pursuant to the President's proclamation, was Liberty Day throughout the land. In hundreds of cities parades expressed the loyalty and confidence and determination of America. In Philadelphia the Liberty Bell was followed by 30,000 school children and civic and military organizations.

Throughout the South there were parades, mass meetings, community singing and increasing pressure from every side to wipe out the stigma of being last in the list to make their quotas. Individual towns which had won their Honor Flags were striving to carry the totals far beyond, while efforts were redoubled in the cities, which like the cities in the north, were lagging.

In New York City an interstate parade marched up Fifth Avenue to 54th Street, led by two mothers each of whom had six sons at the front. The marching mothers with their service flags were the feature of the parade, in which 35,000 men and women marched for Liberty. One of the banners was inscribed: "We Give Our Sons — They Give Their Lives — What Do You Give?"

And this was the spirit of the parade and of the day. The parade was reviewed at the Public Library by Gov. Holcomb of Connecticut, Gov. Edge of New Jersey, and Gov. Whitman of New York, by Mayor Hylan of New York City and by the mayors of the principal cities in the three states.

Liberty Day turned in to the New York Federal Reserve Bank subscriptions to bring $35,950,850, the largest since the opening day of the campaign, placing the district's total at 56 per cent. of its $600,000,000 quota.

President Wilson celebrated Liberty Day by reviewing a parade in Washington and by making a second subscription of $2,000 to the Third Liberty Loan. His first subscription, two weeks earlier, was $1,000.

On April 27th Minneapolis district led the country with 119 per cent. of its quota subscribed. The St. Louis district, the first to reach its quota, had 110 per cent.; while the Kansas City district counted 100 per cent.; Chicago 82 per cent.; San Francisco 78 per cent.; Dallas 77 per cent.; Cleveland 66 per cent.; Boston 73 per cent.; Philadelphia 69 per cent.; and New York 59 per cent.; Richmond 55 per cent.; Atlanta 34 per cent.

The last week of the campaign opened with the Boy Scouts making a house to house canvass to glean where the men's committees had harvested, and with the Liberty Loan Committees in every district redoubling their efforts to make the over-subscription reach a total which would mark the Liberty Loan a Victory Loan and a body blow to the watching enemy.

A Week in the World's News

GERMAN ULTIMATUM TO HOLLAND. According to press reports of April 23, Germany has presented an ultimatum to Holland demanding the right of transit for sand and gravel and also for war materials crossing Dutch territory, both on the Dutch Canals and on the railways. Early in the year the Allies protested against the transportation across Holland of sand and gravel used by the Germans in constructing concrete defenses. Germany claimed that the material was for road building purposes but the traffic was stopped. The new demand was viewed anxiously in London, although official confirmation was lacking. On April 24 there were reports that the Minister to the Netherlands had left the Hague for Berlin and that the Dutch minister to Germany had left Berlin. This report like the report of the German ultimatum was unconfirmed, but the Dutch authorities were said to be determined to maintain their position of neutrality. There have been rumors that Germany had concentrated forces of cavalry and artillery on the Dutch border in greater strength than the covering troops which she has held along the boundary for the ordinary purposes of administration. It was also rumored that the Dutch forces, numbering some 500,000 men, which had been mobilized at full strength since 1914, might have to be demobilized and sent home because the financial burden was becoming too great for Holland to carry. On April 25 the Dutch Foreign Minister, Jonkheer J. Loudon, told the Dutch Chamber that the question between Holland and Germany was a very serious one, but he could not say more about it. It was announced on April 26 that all leaves of absence had been stopped in the land and sea forces of Holland.

PUBLISHERS PROTEST POSTAL RAISE. At the annual meeting of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association the publishers of the daily press of the nation went on record in regard to the new postal rates effective July 1st, as follows:

Whereas, The revision of the postal provision of Section III of the act of Congress approved Oct. 3, 1917, and which is to take effect July 1, 1918, will be unworkable in practice and most unfair and oppressive to the newspapers of the country and the reading public.

Be it resolved by the American Newspaper Publishers' Association, that Congress, if insistent upon legislation of this character, have any circulation beyond the second zone, it is obvious that the rate must be revised if justice is to be done to the periodical publishing interests upon which the American public must depend for that fair statement and free discussion of the news without which it can form no intelligent judgment or opinion.

OUR LIST OF HEROES. Although no word has come during the past week of any outstanding actions in which the men of the American army have won further glory except the reference to the Franco-American front at Hangard, Gen. Pershing's daily reports of casualties have indicated constant touch with the enemy. On April 26 a report covering the activity of the marines told of 25 killed, 12 of whom had died of wounds 2 who had been killed by accident, and 251 had been wounded. Although the marines were among the first in France, their work along the line of communication was so valuable that they were not permitted to follow out their slogan of being "the first to fight." As the numbers of trained troops in France grew the marines were at last given their longed for opportunity. Gen. Pershing's reports of casualties for the week in the forces other than the marines show, killed 40, dead of wounds 20, dead of disease 31, killed by accident or unknown causes 12, wounded 279, prisoners 2.

ARMY AID FOR NEW YORK POLICE. At the request of the New York Police Department the Army, on April 24, placed in New York City a detachment of soldiers, under Capt. T. N. Pfeiffer representing the law enforcement division of the War Department Commission on Training Camp Activities, to co-operate with the police in the suppression of undesirable conditions affecting the general welfare of soldiers and sailors. This action followed a number of midnight and early morning raids on all-night restaurants and chop suey joints, in many of which soldiers were found to have been served with liquor and to be in undesirable company. It was also reported that whiskey peddlers were active in the city and that the police had not been able to control the situation.

CENTRALIZING AIRCRAFT PRODUCTION. Secretary of War Baker, on April 24, announced a re-organization of the aircraft division of the army. John D. Ryan of Montana, a member of the Red Cross War Council, was appointed Director of Aircraft Production for the army. Brig. Gen. William L. Kenly, was appointed Chief of the Division of military aeronautics, which will train aviators and operate the aircraft. Maj. Gen. George O. Squier, Chief Signal officer of the army, will give his entire attention to the administration of signals. Mr. Howard L. Coffin, who has been Chairman of the Aircraft Production Board will remain a member of the Council of National Defense and will cooperate with Mr. Ryan.

THE SAINT PAUL TURNS TURTLE. The American liner, St. Paul, just out of dry dock, turned on her side as she was entering her pier in New York on April 25. Three men of her crew were missing. It was supposed that an ash port had been left open on the port side. Divers at once took up the work of righting the ship.

WOULD ELECT LORDS. Lord Bryce's committee on the reform of the House of Lords, reported on April 24 recommending that the House consist of two sections, one of 246 persons, selected by members of the House of Commons, according to groups and the other to consist of persons chosen by a joint standing committee of both Houses of Parliament. The latter group would number about one-quarter of the total membership. The proposed second chamber would not have power to amend or reject a financial bill passed by the House of Commons.

THE NEW CZAR. Dispatches received from Copenhagen on April 27 reported rioting and a counter-revolution in Petrograd, and told of a persistent rumor that the Grand Duke Michael Alexandrovitch had proclaimed the former heir apparent, Grand Duke Alexis Nikolaievitch, Emperor of Russia. Observers of Russian events in Scandinavia have predicted a revolution in Germany's interest, while others have found a spirit of revolt and a growing restlessness due to the continued aggressions of the central powers.

BRITAIN'S WAR BILL. The budget of the British government for the coming fiscal year was presented in the House of Commons, on April 22, by Andrew Bonar Law, Chancellor of the Exchequer. The estimated expenditures for the coming year he placed at £2,972,197,000 or a little over $14,000,000,000, of which he estimated

Germans Still Driving Toward Amiens and Ypres

IMPELLED perhaps by popular expectation of victory, for Germany waits impatiently for the peace which her masters had promised should come after this greatest of battles, the German hosts on April 24 with big guns brought up and lines reformed again swept forward on the Somme and in Flanders. The advance on the Somme was made with 50,000 men, some four divisions, one of which was newly arrived from Russia. The waves of men came forward not in masses, that has proven too costly, but in open order, with light machine-guns fired from the shoulder while ammunition carriers followed closely with heavier machine-guns just behind to meet any counter-attack. German tanks too had a part in this thrust toward Amiens. But British, Australian, French and American men and guns stopped the thrust and threw back the enemy for negligible gains, so that his 50,000 men were halted and Amiens stood safe. Perhaps, after all, the fighting below the Somme was only a feint, for the enemy's strength was thrown desperately against the lines in the hills back of Messines Ridge and as this was written a bloody battle was raging all about Mont Kemmel, the dominating height which once lost to the enemy gives him the key to the plains and the long-held salient about the embattled city of Ypres.

It Was a Real Fight

THE raid made by the Germans, on April 20 and 21, against the Americans, in the neighborhood of Seicheprey, proved to be more than a raid, it was a real battle. Instead of 1200 picked storming troops as given in the earlier reports, there were more than 3000 of the enemy's best, outnumbering our men 8 to 1. The raid had been carefully rehearsed on similar ground behind the German lines, and the men were equipped with emergency rations and trenching tools, indicating that instead of being a raid in the ordinary sense, the attack was a definite attempt to take ground and hold it.

According to German reports the village was taken by storm and was found full of American dead. Bitter hand to hand fighting ensued from street to street and from house to house, the Americans persisting until they were almost annihilated. Dense columns of American reinforcements were reported to have been badly mauled by the German artillery, while the German airmen attacked the reserves with machine-guns. The Germans claimed to have evacuated the position after blowing up the defense works and dugouts and reported their own losses slight, while those of the Americans were severe. They claimed also the capture of 5 officers, one doctor, 178 men and 25 machine-guns. There had been no confirmation or contradiction from Washington or the Berlin dispatches on April 26, but the French official dispatches and the stories of American correspondents indicated that the American total loss was about 200 of whom about 20 were wounded and less than a score killed, that the Germans retired from Seicheprey under the pressure of the American and French counter-attacks and that their losses were heavy, over 300 dead being counted in the American trenches and between them and the German positions. The Germans took away their wounded with them. The positions from which the attack was launched were on the high ground overlooking the American outposts. Back of the American lines was a steep hill covered with a small rectangular grove, called the Wood of Remières, while the village of Seicheprey was on the further slope of the hill beyond the wood. The Germans succeeded in getting into the wood on Friday and in working through it during the night in small groups supported by machine-guns. From the vantage point of the wood the attack on the village was launched on Saturday morning. The Americans fought from house to house and from street to street. Machinegunners, ordered to retreat, stuck to their posts and were found by their returning comrades with a circle of dead Germans around them. A cook grabbed a rifle and fought until killed.

Fighting with hand grenades, a section of twenty-three men held out throughout the day in the northern outskirts of the village, refusing to surrender, and when the village was again American, nine of the twenty-three were still fighting. The Germans' hold upon the village was quickly shaken, and before Saturday night the enemy was on his way home, not voluntarily, as he was immediately turned into day by star shells and the German batteries concentrated their fire upon the Vindictive, which although hit, was not disabled and succeeded in getting alongside the mole with her consorts. The marines and blue jackets immediately stormed the German works on the mole, a semi-circular breakwater which protects the entrances to the canal leading to the port of Bruges. The garrison on the mole was driven back to the mainland, while the shore batteries concentrated their fire against the British, and against the squadron of destroyers and small craft which supported the action. The men of the storming party were armed with special mortars and with flame throwers, and they completely destroyed guns, warehouses and munitions on the great mole. Under cover of this attack three of the concrete laden cruisers maneuvered for position. One of them ran aground, the other two succeeded in anchoring across the channel, where they were promptly sunk. Their crews escaped to the auxiliary vessels. Two of the other cruisers were run ashore at Ostend. It appeared probable that the objective had been completely realized at Zeebrugge. The measure of success at Ostend was not known. The British lost heavily, as was expected, every man who went on the expedition having volunteered with full knowledge of the danger. A German torpedo boat attempting to escape from the harbor was torpedoed. Two old English submarines loaded with explosives were used in the enterprise and one of them was driven against the piling approach of the mole which it destroyed. The gates of the canal locks were also thought to have been destroyed, and it was considered probable that the port of Zeebrugge would be of little further value to German submarines, while the use of the port of Ostend was restricted as the result of the raid. This action was looked upon in Allied naval quarters as the beginning of an offensive against the submarines which has been talked of more than a year and which American naval authorities have been understood to have been urging. The state of the German mind may be indicated by the fact that one of the German marines, fleeing from the British marines on the mole was heard to cry out: "Donner und Blitzen! It's the Americans!"

Naval aviators on the following day found that twenty yards of the mole near the shore at Zeebrugge had been destroyed and that sunken objects appeared to block the channels both at Zeebrugge and at Ostend. The reported damage to the canal locks was not verified. Berlin declared the raid a failure, reporting the sinking of five cruisers off the coast and of three destroyers and a number of motorboats. The British reported the loss of one destroyer, two motor boats and two launches.

GERMANS RENEW ATTACK. After several days of bombardment along the whole front from Flanders to the Oise the Germans, on the morning of April 24, started a violent bombardment of British and French positions around Mont Kemmel in Flanders and on the British positions from Albert north of the Somme to the Avre south of the Somme, and on the French positions southward to beyond Hangard. Fighting was especially severe in the neighborhood of Dranoutre, northeast of Bailleul and two miles southwest of Mont Kemmel, near Albert, at the village of Villers-Bretonneux south of the Somme, and at Hangard south of the Avre. The first attack was repulsed along the whole line. If the Germans could have pressed back the French at Dranoutre, Kemmel would have been outflanked. The day's fighting left the northern positions unchanged. At Albert and at Festubert, the British not only repulsed attacks but gained some ground. At Villers-Bretonneux the first attacks were repulsed. New attacks were made with three tanks leading the advance. The day closed with the Germans in possession of the village,

A Tax On Intelligence

THE "zone" system of postal taxes on second-class matter, forced into the War Revenue Bill at the extra session of Congress, is a matter of so much concern to the reading public that they ought to understand its full meaning.

Briefly, this provision not only raises all rates for carrying newspapers and periodicals through the mails, but it divides the country into "zones," and imposes a charge on readers increasing with the distance of their residence from the place of publication, and amounting, in the case of people living in the zone most remote, to six times the present rate of postage!

It is not a war measure, but properly belongs in a postal bill. It is not a revenue measure, for the chances are that it will decrease rather than increase revenue.

It is not necessary to boast about the national service performed by the magazines. Everybody knows it, including the sullen politicians who resent it. These publications are a necessity in the daily lives of the people. They are more necessary than a good many things we wear or eat. Thirty or more years ago a sensible Congress, having in mind the importance to the nation of the general dissemination of good literature and sound information, provided that this class of matter should be carried by the Post Office Department at a rate of one cent a pound. The rate was fixed, not for the benefit of the publishers, but for the benefit of the public. Upon this rate the great magazine circulations have been built up.

With the circulation came advertising, and from the advertising revenue rose the possibility of paying high prices to authors and artists for their stories and articles and pictures. Under the existing rate a ranchman in Wyoming or a fruit grower in Florida can have delivered to him for five cents a week such a collection of the works of the best authors and draftsmen as forty years ago he could not have obtained for twenty times that sum if he lived next door to the old Corner Book Store in Boston.

An important feature of the low postal rate was that it was uniform throughout the United States. A reader in Oregon or southwestern Texas paid no more for his magazine than a reader in Boston or New York or Philadelphia or Chicago. A reader on the farm got his paper as cheaply as a reader in town. Instead of isolated groups of local publications reflecting the jealousies or animosities of their separate neighborhoods, there has grown up a large number of publications that have been bound to cultivate the good will of all sections of the country. They are a clearing-house for the exchange of ideas between communities widely separated, between South and North, East and West, town and country. They send their messages everywhere and illuminate the problems of one section for the enlightenment of others. A man in New Mexico enjoys the same reading at the same cost as a man in Maine, and by that much is directed toward the same way of thinking on national subjects.

It is now proposed to destroy the fruits of this wise system by discriminating against readers who happen to live at a distance from the place of publication. Congress virtually says: "If you live in the South or West and want to read Eastern publications, we intend to fine you for the privilege." What this senseless bill actually provides for is not a tax on production but a fine—a fine on reading! A man in Cambridge, Mass., will pay one cent and three-quarters postage per pound on magazines published in Boston, a man in Carolina three and one-quarter cents, and a man in Postmaster General Burleson's own district five and one-quarter cents.

The tax is essentially a destructive blow at good reading for the whole public, an impost on information and intellectual advancement, and an inciter of narrow sectionalism. As such the public should insist on its modification. But a majority of the congressmen who voted for the bill did so, no doubt, from a misconception of the facts and without considering the results, and it may be possible to induce Congress to vote a postponement of this unjust tax until after the war is over.

Every one who is interested in the dissemination of intelligence to all alike throughout the whole country can help secure such postponement. Nothing counts so much with a Congressman as a letter from a constituent. Many Christian Herald readers are writing to their Senators and Representatives at Washington, declaring the postage zone system for periodicals unfair and requesting postponement of its operation. Many thousands more should write such letters at once, if the disaster is to be prevented.

would have the world believe, not victoriously, as his returns would indicate, but driven back by men a little better than himself. The German correspondents declared that the attack was made to teach the Americans a lesson. The French correspondents replied that the Germans "broke their nose" in the attempt.

The artillery fire which preceded the German attempt to break through the American lines was a hurricane of shrapnel and gas shells. The fire was concentrated on the American telephone and telegraph wires so that at times com-

THE BRITISH FLEET BLOCKS U-BOATS. On the night of April 22, a dark, stormy night, British naval forces under Admiral Reyes with French destroyers co-operating behind a smoke screen that covered the Belgian coast, raided the German held Belgian ports of Zeebrugge and Ostend with the object of bottling up the German submarines in the two harbors. Five obsolete cruisers were filled with concrete. Another old cruiser, the Vindictive, with two ferry boats carrying troops, attacked the Mole of Zeebrugge but was discovered, before she reached her objective. The night

What Are You Going to Do?

TEXT—John 20:28. "And Thomas answered and said unto him, My Lord and my God."

SUPPOSE anybody should talk like that to you and call you Lord and God, what would you say? You'd say what Peter said to Cornelius. You remember Cornelius was about to worship Peter, and Peter took him by the hand and said, "Stand up; for I also am a man as thou art."

But did you ever notice that Jesus never rebuked Thomas? He accepted his worship and commended him for it.

Who was Jesus? Do you know, there is not another question in all the realm of human thought quite so important as this one, unless it is the question of what you are going to do with Jesus after you find out who he is.

There are problems, of course, connected with the person of Jesus which no human intellect has ever fathomed or ever will. The greatest minds of the world have grappled with his deity and his incarnation and the general mystery that surrounds his personality, and their noble efforts have brought us much that satisfies and helps. But they have said, one and all, that their explorations have been like those of Sir Isaac Newton, who, in his search after knowledge, said he seemed like a schoolboy walking by the sea-shore and picking up a pebble here and there, while the vast deep rolled unexplored at his feet.

There's no doctrine that's been pounded like this one. Of course, we can't agree on every little thing, and I've absolutely no patience with these cramped and contracted heresy-hunters who are eternally whetting their theological razors and trying to split ecclesiastical hairs with a view to stirring up a muss because of some little deflection of doctrine on the part of somebody else. But when it comes to the one thing upon which the whole system of our Christian religion rests, the deity, the divinity of Jesus Christ, we must be of one mind. This fundamental truth must be accepted. Deny it, and you knock the keystone out of the arch, and the whole thing comes down with a crash.

And now some one steps up and says, "Biederwolf, you're confusing your terms when you talk about deity and divinity in the same breath." Well, I'd like to know the difference between the two. There is but one who is divine, and he is God; and if Christ was God, if the apostle John was right when he said, "The Word was God, and the Word was made flesh and dwelt among us," then Christ and Christ alone was divine, as God is divine. If a difference between deity and divinity must be admitted, let it not be the kind of difference that some people want to make, a difference that makes Jesus Christ less than he really is. That at once robs him of his Saviourhood and strips him of his power to redeem me from my sin. I tell you, I want a God to be my Saviour.

DO you know that the unbelievers of this world have tried to outdo each other in applauding the character of Jesus Christ? Pilate called him "the man without fault." Diderot called him "the unsurpassed." Napoleon called him "the Emperor of Love." David Strauss called him "the highest model of religion." John Stuart Mill called him "the Guide of Humanity." Lecky called him "the highest pattern of virtue." Pecant called him "The Holy One before God." Martineau called him "the divine flower of humanity." Renan called him "the greatest among the sons of men." Theodore Parker called him "the youth with God in his heart." Francis Cobb called him "the regenerator of humanity." Robert Owen called him "the irreproachable." But none of all of these will do. Doesn't the Bible make it plain enough, and doesn't your own conviction corroborate it, that no man, however great or wise or good, can save his own soul, much less the soul of any other man?

If there ever was a time when both the world and the church needed a clean, clear, concise reaffirmation of the fundamental fact upon which Christianity rests; and without it we have nothing more than a creed as insipid and lifeless as the humanitarianism of Auguste Comte and a religion as effete and worthless as Matthew Arnold's "dilettante gospel of sweetness and light," that time is now.

What about the seething social unrest of our day; the criminal degrading responsibility for existence; the toiling, struggling masses clamoring against what they believe to be the unjust and pathetic inequalities of the present-day economic system; the scholastic testing everything under the searchlight of experiment; modern society which, too often, alas, is little more than refined paganism, atheistic in head and superstitious in heart, seeking to relieve its sense of emptiness by horrible extremes of voluptuous indulgence? What about it?

Is it not true after all that the world's ache at the bottom is a heart-ache? What kind of a Christ, then, shall we give to it for the healing of its wounds and the righting of its wrongs? Shall we give it the Christ of John Stuart Mill?

Some ministers preach as if this was a thing no longer essential to the Christian faith. Our churches are filled with members who know little if any difference between the Unitarian Church and their own. Why is this? It is because we preachers have been remiss in defining the faith.

That the Bible writers claimed that Christ was divine and that Christ himself claimed to be divine in a qualitative sense that no other man is divine there can be absolutely no doubt whatever. Isaiah in so many words called him "the mighty God, the everlasting Father." (Isa. 9:6). John said, "The Word of God," and "the Word was made flesh and dwelt among us." (John 1:1, 14). Paul said he was "God manifest in the flesh." (I Tim. 3:16), and called him "The Lord of glory" (I Cor. 2:8) and "God over all" (Rom. 9:5).

Could they have said all this about you or any other mere man?

DON'T tell me that Christ didn't claim a divinity different from that of any other man. He claimed his deity on the threefold ground of his divine knowledge, his divine power, and his divine authority.

I. As to his divine knowledge. He said, "No man knoweth the Son but the Father; and no man knoweth the Father but the Son and he to whomsoever the Son will reveal him" (Matt. 11:27 and Luke 10:22). What a daring, what a tremendous statement! How profane and how shocking if he were only a man! Would any mere man dare to say that he knew God as well as God knew him? Would you?

II. As to his divine power. Among other things, he said these three:

1. That he had the power to do whatever the Father did. "Whatsoever things the Father doeth, these also doeth the Son likewise." What man ever used language so daring as that and claimed the full right and power to do all that the eternal Father had the right and power to do?

2. That he had the power to raise the dead. "As the Father raiseth up the dead and quickeneth them, even so the Son quickeneth whomsoever he will." He said he would raise up his own body (John 2:19-21), and that the day was coming when all the dead would hear his voice and come forth out of their graves. How could he do this if he were not divine in some sense that no other man has ever been?

3. That he had power to forgive sins. He said so in so many words. The Jews were right when they asked, "Who can forgive sins but God only?" But Christ not only claimed the right and power to do so, but he emphasized his claim and proved it by a miracle.

III. As to his divine authority. He said in the plainest terms that he will be the Universal Judge at the last great day. He said, "The Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment unto the Son." He says that he "will sit on the throne of his glory," and all shall be gathered before him.

What mortal could say things like these? Who is this that professes to be able to scrutinize the thoughts and secret motives of men, to sit in judgment upon their words and their needs, and who claims the authority to grasp and wield the divine thunderbolts of retribution, if he be not something more than a man? Did ever man make a claim like that?

These are only a few of his claims. He said, "Before Abraham was, I am." Could you a man, say that? He said, "Glorify thou me, O Father, with the glory I had with thee before the world was." Could a Gladstone or a Napoleon say that? He says to the weary soul, "Come unto me and I will give you rest." Could you, a man, say that? He says that faith in him means eternal life. Could you, a man say that? He said that he was sinless. He said, "Which one of you convinceth me of sin?" Could you or any other man say that? He not only allowed Thomas to worship him as Lord and God, but he distinctly said in so many words, "All men should honor the Son, even as they honor the Father." Could you, a man, say that about yourself? He says he is coming again in the clouds with great glory. Could you, a man, say that? He says he is going to bring his holy angels with him.

A man who can read the New Testament and not see that Christ claims to be more than a man, can look all over the sky at high noon on a cloudless day and not see the sun.

Oh, I know your verse. You say, "Didn't Jesus say, 'My Father is greater than I?'" Yes, and God was greater than Jesus was in his humanity. But your verse knocks the props out from under your own argument. Because if Jesus was only a man, what need was there that he should tell us that his Father was greater than he was? Suppose you should get up and say, "God is greater than I am." We'd say, "Well, you fool, sit down; don't you suppose we know that!"

NOW let us go a little farther. Why do I believe in the divinity of Jesus Christ?

1. I believe it, in the first place, for the reasons just given. Because the Bible writers said he was divine, and because Christ himself claimed that he was divine.

2. I believe it, in the second place, because of his matchless character. He never for a single second wavered in the sublime self-consciousness of who he was.

Then look at the universality of his character, its completeness and its moral perfection. Born in a particular race and in a particular age, the whole world, in our age as well as in his, has found in him its ideal and the answer to its every spiritual appeal.

Every man has some good points, but Jesus Christ had them all; and he had them all in absolute perfection. He was the only impenitent man that ever lived. And he died that way. He prayed for others and said, "Father, forgive them," but he never prayed for himself and said, "Father, forgive me," because there was nothing in his life for which he needed to be forgiven.

3. I believe it, in the third place, because of his masterly teachings. "He spoke as never man spoke." That's what the officers said when they came to arrest him, and they were right. If the books that have been written about his words were gathered up they would fill a thousand Congressional libraries, but his words alone would hardly make a vest-pocket edition. But their heights have never been scaled; their depths have never been sounded.

4. I believe it, in the next place, because of his marvelous influence. The biggest proof of the deity of Christ is just Christianity itself. Harnack's book, "The Expansion of Christianity," does not allow the deity of Christ; but read it and tell me how such things could ever be wrought save by a power divine. What did Darwin mean when he said, "A man about to be shipwrecked on some unknown coast will devoutly pray that the lesson of the missionary will have reached that far?" He meant that where the Gospel has not gone civilization has not gone, and such a shipwrecked man would likely find himself in the soup tureen of a tribe of husky cannibals. Take Christianity out of civilization; take it out of art, music, literature, and most of all out of the human heart and life, and you'd have mighty little left worthy of the name.

5. I believe it, in the next place, because of his mighty works. Jesus said, "The works that I do bear witness of me, that the Father hath sent me." Look at his miracles, and like Nicodemus you will have to say that God was incarnate in the man who did such wonderful things.

But greater, after all these, are the miracles of his grace; and these he is doing today as in the days of old. He is redeeming all kinds of people. He takes the rich and shows them how really poor and naked they are. He takes the self-sufficient and shows them how really dependent they are. He takes the moral man and the moral woman, strips them of the worthless rags of self-righteousness, and redeems them one and all to a new and powerful life.

Yes, and he does the same thing for the roué, the debauchee, the drunken sot. The chemists took the black, foul, filthy residue of the refinery and made it into pure white, transparent paraffin. That's wonderful enough, yet a man can do it. But a man can't take a human heart that's black with sin, and make it clean and white like snow; he can't take a human character befouled and besmirched with the pollution of hell and transform it into one of the world's mightiest instruments for righteousness. It takes a God to do that!

Jesus Christ takes a poor, staggering, drunken river-thief and transforms him into a man of whom

Returning from the Wilderness

SUNDAY, May 12. Luke 4:14. "And Jesus returned in the power of the Spirit into Galilee." Jesus returned from the wilderness clothed with added power for the ministry in Galilee. He came back from the place of temptation enriched with the spoils of conquest. The wilderness had been the scene of spiritual conflict. Our Master had been at the familiar place in life where there are many roads but only one right one. And the wrong roads were decked with all sorts of shining allurements. And the allurements were all the more perilous because they had a suggestion of religion and piety about them. The wrong road was made to look as though it led up to a Church. There was a sound of church bells as though a subtle temptation had been wedded to a call to worship. That is the most insidious trial in life, when the church bells are ringing on the broad road that leadeth to destruction.

But our Master knew the broad road even though it was carpeted with flowers. He knew the egotism which lay concealed under seeming homage. He knew the difference between faith and presumption. He knew the infinite contrast between a swelling imperialism and the holy Kingdom which he had come to found in sacrificial blood. And so with all his might he fought the tempter and overthrew him, and with richly invigorated strength he went forth to his work in Galilee. The wilderness had been to him the arena where the athlete puts on strength and beauty like a robe.

And so, too, it may be with us if we are in Christ. Our wilderness may be our armory. The place of the meeting of the four roads may be the sanctuary of a larger equipment. Our perplexities may be our educators. Our antagonisms may be our servants. Our temptations may be our endowments. In the name and fellowship of Christ our Lord we can regard the threatening wildernesses as possible houses of power. There are brave things to be done on those desolate roads, and great trophies to be won. And when the brave things are done, and the trophies won, and we go forth into Galilee, the folk in Galilee will wonder at our mingled gentleness and strength.

Prayer for Guidance

MONDAY, May 13. Ps. 143:10. "Teach me to do thy will; for thou art my God; thy Spirit is good; lead me into the land of uprightness." The prayer for the guidance of the Holy Spirit is a typically Christian prayer. The heart of the believer in Christ that has been touched by divine grace has learnt, among other things, to distrust its natural wisdom and the strength of its moral resolves. It has realized that in its endeavor to cling to the Reconciler, Christ, and to lead a pure and upright life, it is opposed by forces that are not flesh and blood, and hence cannot be defeated by mere human ingenuity and prowess. Against the spiritual wickedness which constantly assails the believer, attacking either the truth of the believer's creed or the saving virtue, there must be placed a spiritual force which God alone can supply. Accordingly the true believer is ever in a docile frame of mind toward God: he wants to be taught by the Spirit of God, and led into straight paths. The Spirit of God, being himself God, is good; his instruction and directions can aim only at what is good. The Spirit of God is a Lover and Teacher of righteousness, and all who submit to his tutelage are trained in uprightness. The natural intellect and will of men, being subject to the promptings of the carnal mind, are neither good nor upright, not even in Christians while they are still in the flesh. They become good and upright only to the extent that they obey the impulses which the Holy Spirit through the gracious word of God exerts upon them. Our carnal reason may be offended at the manner in which the Spirit of God leads us, and may balk at being thus led. Our natural desires, being thwarted by the Spirit within us, may rebel. Still, the believing soul will continue praying, "Teach me and lead me, thou good Spirit of my God." W. H. T. D.

Excellent Loving-Kindness

TUESDAY, May 14. Ps. 36:7. "How excellent is thy loving-kindness, O God!" The late Dr. Howard Osgood of Rochester maintained that in every instance in which we find the term "loving-kindness" in the Old Testament, we are at liberty to substitute the word "grace," and that in every instance in which we find the word "grace" in the New Testament we do not go far astray if we substitute for it the word "loving-kindness." Doubtless there is a doctrine of grace in the Old Testament. God's grace is eternal. He loved us before the world was, and chose us from before the world's foundation. He will love us until—and after—the world's last hour of doom. God's loving-kindness is excellent because of its eternity. Human loving-kindness has a time limit, but God's has not. Moreover, God's grace is excellent because of its pure benevolence. Who of us deserves salvation? What man ever earned it? "God commendeth his love to us in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us." Then God's loving-kindness is excellent because of its methods. Many an act of human kindness is wrought so tactlessly that it gives offense without meaning to do so. How gentle is God's approach to human life! With more than a father's pity and more than a mother's love the Eternal touches and teaches us in order that he may lead us into the way of life everlasting.

It is the testimony of practically all the students who sat under a certain college professor recently gone to his coronation that he never was impatient with even the most stupid. Only rarely did he indulge in words that left a sting. The wilful and the vicious he could reprove with words that fairly blistered, but his tenderness to the timid, his care not to wound the feelings of the sensitive, earned for him the title "saint," by which he was affectionately known to many. He had learned patience in the school of Christ, and his loving-kindness was excellent because it was derived from God. C. C. A.

Parental Love

WEDNESDAY, May 15. Prov. 6:20. "Keep the commandments of thy father." If Mothers' Day is not changed to "Parents' Day," then Fathers' Day should be universal. "Honor thy father and thy mother" is the command of the Heavenly Father. Surely the father feels the responsibility of teaching and training the children equally with the mother. The home is controlled by both parents and should be magnified on these memorial days. It is the head of the river of church and national life, of school and business life.

When children obey their parents in the Lord, both father and mother live again in the lives of their household. How beautiful is parental love! How faithful and undying! Like as a father loveth his child, so the Lord loveth. "As one whom his mother comforteth, so will I comfort you." If parents give good gifts to their children, how much more will your Heavenly Father give good things to them which ask him. God thus presides over his innumerable family as the parent over the humble home.

Bishop F. W. Warne of India tells how his aged father put his hands on his head, blessing him in the patriarchal manner, and then prayed all that night for his son's conversion. The mother telling her son in the morning how the father had passed a sleepless night was the means of his immediate conversion. This is parental religion, the church in the home. Such a father and mother are our best friends, our first friends, our last friends, and our eternal friends. There are no substitutes for parental care. There are no richer gifts to posterity than the children of Christian parentage. To be a parent is to be a priest in the home, a patriot in the country, a partner with the Almighty. E. W. C.

Cleansing of the Spirit

THURSDAY, May 16. Ezek. 11:19, 20. "I will put a new spirit within you; and I will take the stony heart out of their flesh, and will give them an heart of flesh: that they may walk in my statutes, and keep mine ordinances, and do them." The blessings of salvation, although they lie ready for every person in the Gospel of Christ, are not realized by the individual sinner except by an operation of the Holy Ghost upon the sinner's heart. "No man," says Paul, "can say that Jesus is the Lord, but by the Holy Ghost." The story of the great reconciliation effected by the sacrificial life and death of the Son of God finds no ready acceptance with men in their natural state: they claim that their intelligence and ethical sense are scandalized by the teaching that they have been restored to the favor of God by the vicarious living and dying of another. The preaching of Christ crucified proves to the Greeks foolishness and to the Jews a stumbling-block. The natural man receiveth not these things; they must be spiritually discerned. The Spirit of God must remove from the natural heart of men the conceit of self-sufficiency, viz., that they are wise enough of themselves to plan, and morally strong enough of themselves to achieve, their own salvation. As the redemption of Christ was procured for men without their aid, so it is also secured to them, not by their own reason or strength, but by the gracious operation of the Holy Spirit, who induces them to accept Christ as their Saviour. That is what Scripture calls removing the stony heart and putting in its place a heart of flesh. This is spoken metaphorically; it does not signify a surgical operation, but a spiritual metamorphosis, by which natural blindness in regard to spiritual matters is removed from the intellect and natural impotence from the will of man, and man is induced to bow in glad submission to the gracious terms which his Redeemer proposes to him for his salvation in the Gospel. Accordingly, the outpouring of the Holy Ghost was as necessary for reclaiming the world from its lost condition as the sacrifice on Calvary.

First, Disciples; Then, Apostles

FRIDAY, May 17. Rom. 1:1. "Paul, a servant of Jesus Christ, called to be an apostle." We can not be disciples of Christ without being in some sense apostles as well. A wounded prisoner said to a chaplain of the enemy forces, who ministered to him on the field of battle, "If there is anything in your religion which makes a man feed his enemy and give him drink—if there is anything in your religion which makes you do what you are doing, you may talk to me about it." The most of us have little influence over any one to whom we have not been of some service. It takes a faithful disciple to be a successful apostle. Familiar is the story of the candidate for church membership who was asked under whose preaching he had been converted, and who replied, "Under my aunt's practicing." With all our professions and confessions, with all our creeds and prayers, what poor apostles we make, apart from our fidelity to the ideas and ideals of Christian discipleship. Do we want to be apostles? We must first prove our discipleship. How shall we prove it? By wearing a smile where now we wear a frown; by cultivating "an intense desire not to have our own way"; by giving up what we have long clung to so tenaciously. There is eloquence in character. There is permanence of power in the testimony of one who is a faithful servant of Jesus Christ. No argument avails against the testimony of one whose life is patterned after that of Christ. The best evidence of Christianity is the life of the Master brought down to date. As Jesus was the incarnation of the Father, we must incarnate the mind and spirit which were in him. A man who had greatly wronged another was freely forgiven. As he clasped the reconciled hand of the man he had sorely injured he said, with entire sincerity, "Now I know that Jesus lives!" C. C. A.

The Family of God

SATURDAY, May 18. Eph. 3:15. "Of whom the whole family in earth and heaven is named." Our Divine Father built the earth and heavens as a sanctuary for his children. When the earthly home was finished, he called it "very good." It must have been an hour of supreme interest when man became a living soul and the house of Eden had an inhabitant. The Father God could not bestow his affection upon planets, forces, laws or worlds, for they could not reciprocate his love. He longed for beings in his own image and likeness, who could know and love him as he loved them and be companions in his household forever. We are aware that this planet is only a temporary residence, a vestibule to the permanent palace in the heavens.

The whole family of God is in two great divisions, but dwelling in one great mansion home. Some are in the lower story; others in the higher outlook, but all have the family resemblance and joy, being born not of the flesh or the will of man, but of God. He sends the spirit of his Son into our hearts so we may delight to cry, "Abba, Father," and to say when we pray, "Our Father, who art in heaven."

There are many figures used in speaking of the Church of the living God. It is called a building fitly framed together, a tree spreading its branches over the earth, a vine laden with fruit, a body with many members, a bride with the bridegroom; but the idea of a family is the nearest and dearest of all other comparisons. He is the Mother God and the Father God; we are his offspring, and though sin once estranged us, like the prodigal we have come home to the Father's house, feeling the embrace of his fellowship. Jesus has washed us in his own most precious blood so the Father could kiss our tears away and whisper the pardon of our sins. After being tenants here, we will become residents yonder, where angels will join the family and sing with us, "Unto him be glory and honor and power forever and ever."

Religion in War Time

IT was doubtless inevitable that the great war should stimulate the production of books on religion. They have come upon us like a flood from the presses, both here and in Europe. Occasionally, however, a volume of unusual spiritual power appears, which deeply stirs the souls of men in these trying days, bringing to us all the needed message of an ever-present God and Father, who will not leave the faithful unsuited nor the supplications of his believing ones unanswered. A book of this type is "Prayer in War Time," by Dr. W. Robertson Nicoll, who has long been recognized as a leader in spiritual thought not in England only but also in America, where his writings are well known.

Dr. Nicoll is an ardent advocate of and a believer in prayer. "In these days of trouble," he writes, "many are seeking God who hardly gave him a place in their thoughts while the sun shone on them." This is a time for prayer and supplication and intercession, and the more the spirit grows, the more intense our petitions are, the more frequent our assemblies, the happier will be the prospect that our trials will bring us spiritual enrichment. God waits for the cry of his troubled children. He tells them to call upon him in the day of trouble and he will give answer. He asks to be entreated. And the petitioners need to be constantly reminded of the Divine fullness and of Christ's own words, "Ask and ye shall receive."

But prayer needs not only to be importunate, but strong in faith. The more we pray the greater becomes our faith. "Prayer," writes Dr. Nicoll, "succeeds through the intensity of will force put into it." Importunate prayer is prevailing prayer. We must put a heroic trust into our petitions. Nor should we forget that if we pray in the name of Christ, we have the assurance that we need but ask in order to receive.

There is a rare opportunity for the Church today. It is lawful and right, our author holds, to pray for our troops that they may be spared to return to us victorious. We ought to pray for a speedy and decisive victory; if we are not ready to pray for it, then we have no right to desire it. And if we maintain "a continual siege of heaven," lifting up our hearts in Christ's name, then "even as the days are saturated with thought about the war, they will be saturated with prayer about the war; and when we have prayed enough, the war will end. Those of us who believe in prayer, therefore, should see to it that it is not prolonged by our neglect."

"First Righteousness and then Peace"—meaning, of course, a righteous peace. Righteousness is "the granite foundation of our faith, the keynote of Christianity, and Jesus is the King of Righteousness." We can afford to and ought to have our days of humiliation and prayer, for God will not despise humble hearts. We must confess our sins and our unworthiness, for that is of the very essence of prayer. Yet humiliation should not shut out our real petitions. We must ask and go on asking. We may pray for anything that concerns Christ's Kingdom and the glory of God, and we may rely upon its coming. So we ask for victory—the victory for righteousness, for justice, for freedom for humanity—and these will all come, for God is behind those who are fighting for these things. And at every step of the way we should unfailingly give thanks for all the mercies shown us, and for every encouragement. All struggle involves sacrifice and if we pray much and trust much, He who is faithful and who Himself gave the greatest Sacrifice of all, will give us strength to endure the struggle and grace to bear the burden.

In conclusion, Dr. Nicoll writes: "It is no longer Germany but a fiendish power—naked Evil—that we are fighting, and we can fight but one way, for reason and persuasion are out of the question. So our hesitations vanish." Prayer, the strongest weapon in the Christian's armory—our prayers—should sustain and inspire our heroes at the front and bring the final victory. "Prayer in War Time" is a book that deserves to be widely read and which cannot fail to prove helpful to many at the present time.

The American Spirit

STORIES of the intrepidity of our brave boys at the front show that the American spirit needed but a great cause and a fitting opportunity to prove that it still lives, and that it is the same spirit that has carried the nation forward in all its enterprises in the past.

General Foch, on learning of the gallant stand of our boys when they in conjunction with the French troops repulsed a strong German raid recently, made particular inquiries concerning the affair, afterwards declaring his conviction that the American troops were "the equal of any soldiers in the world today." This commendation from the hero of the Marne, now the commander-in-chief of the Allied armies, must bring a thrill of gratification wherever it is read. Not only have the Allies a warm place in their hearts for our young heroes, but the Germans are rapidly imbibing a wholesome respect for them, also. Picked "shock troops" have failed to strike them with panic; they have stood the brunt of deafening artillery, hurricanes of gas shells and the onset of masses of the enemy, and on every occasion, have acquitted themselves in a way to excite the admiration of the home folks.

Lord Reading, Britain's special ambassador now visiting this country, at a dinner at the Waldorf Astoria at which many Allied representatives were present, told his audience that America's entrance into the war "lifted the conflict to a higher level." This was possibly the most striking compliment he could have uttered. He, too, applauded the American spirit in the field which brought victory nearer and made it more assured. "It is the spirit that makes impossible in this war anything like defeat," he said, and he urged his hearers to carry forward that same spirit of cooperation and unselfishness, that the world might be freed from giant military dominion.

Where all are fighting so bravely, it is invidious to draw distinctions. Yet, we must accept these spontaneous tributes to the spirit of America, as illustrated in the splendid soldierly bearing and gallant behavior of our men at the front. It is the spirit of coming victory.

How the Children Can Help

WAR has been transformed. In a great world-conflict, it is now seen that all ages and classes are capable of service. Even the children can help, and it is a splendid showing which is being made by the young folks of America today. Yet their part in winning the war has just begun. In the Thrift Stamp Campaign, Secretary McAdoo has given them an opportunity to stand side by side with their grown-up brothers in carrying forward the war for freedom and democracy to a successful issue.

Here are the figures that demonstrate the importance of the Children's Campaign, now under way: There are 20,000,000 boys and girls in the schools, capable of earning and saving 25 cents per week and applying it to the purchase of a Thrift Stamp. Assuming that every child could save one stamp a week, it would mean $5,000,000 toward winning the war. Kept up for one year, the great army of 20,000,000 young folks would turn into the Treasury $260,000,000.

All over the land, the school children are "doing their bit" splendidly. A monthly "drive" would inspire them to keep it up enthusiastically and would bring in the laggards besides. Surely the goal is worth striving to reach. One year's work of the children would equip a good-sized army. It would build a fleet of U-boat chasers. It would equal the cost of a full squadron of warships. It would provide a great fleet of aircraft, or cover the cost of a supply of ammunition to win a great offensive.

This is what the youth of America can do. And it will be done, if the parents and the teachers of our land make it sufficiently clear to them. Teach them to save their nickels, dimes and quarters to help Uncle Sam win the war.

Our Voluntary Conservation

IN a speech before the Pittsburg Press Club, Food Administrator Hoover stated that roughly, every 5,000 tons of food to the Allies requires 15,000 tons of shipping from Australia, 10,000 tons from the Argentine and 5,000 tons from North America. Every steamer we can save from these long journeys means the possibility of an additional shipload of American soldiers and munitions to France. If the Allies were compelled to go to these more remote markets for their whole food supply today, it would require over 2,500,000 tons more shipping than is at present in use for this purpose. If North America could next year provide the whole of the Allied necessities, we could save 1,500,000 tons of shipping. Every ship we save is a ship built. The weight of our blow against the Germans will be limited not alone by the ships we build, but by the ships we save.

If the Allies were forced to rely wholly upon the remote markets for their food, we could have no soldiers in France today. Nor will the burden grow less in the near future, for every ship we build will be needed to replace losses and to increase our army at the front. This is conservation of ships, as well as of food.

Therefore the whole war food problem is simply and solely a determination of the amount of food that can be spared from North America; the marginal amount must be drawn from the more remote markets.

Probably there is not another nation in the world in which the proportion of individuals with a willing sense of self-sacrifice is so high as in this people of ours, and in which a sufficient voluntary reduction could be obtained.

The programme, therefore, as Mr. Hoover explains, has been a hazard upon the number of people of this kind in the United States; but it may now be said with perfect assurance that we shall have performed our national duty, the Allies will have been fed during this harvest year, so far as the obligation falls upon us, almost wholly upon a voluntary footing. Far beyond this, it justifies the belief in the high idealism and willingness to sacrifice in the American people.

Dr. Jowett's Message to Our Readers

MANY Americans will regard the voluntary closing of Dr. J. H. Jowett's ministry in New York with sincere regret. Yet they cannot but feel that he has followed the clear path of duty in responding to the more urgent call from the other side. His nation-wide ministry through the Christian Herald will continue uninterrupted, however, as this letter below will inform our readers:

"The Editor kindly asks me to send a brief message before I cross the seas to my native land.

"It has been a great joy to have such intimate communion with the readers of the Christian Herald, and I am grateful for the many assurances that have come to me that I have been helped in the service of others. I feel that the believers in Christ Jesus have a wonderful opportunity, in these days, of manifesting the power of the risen Lord. It is for us to shine with the light of life in this gloomy season of general depression. The optimistic songs must be heard in our camp. We must be children of light, heralds of the morning. It is not for us to speak of midnights or of any darkness that cannot be changed. We must proclaim the inexhaustible power of the Gospel of grace. We must tell the whole world that in the love of Christ there is saving dynamic for the uttermost need. The Church has come to the day of her great opportunity! Let her call out her reserves and gloriously manifest the power of His resurrection!

"I do not call this a farewell message, for I am only crossing the seas and shall still be counted in the fellowship of your great Family.

"Yours sincerely,
"J. H. JOWETT."

It is a pleasure for the editors and readers of this journal to have from one of the great spiritual leaders and preachers of our time the assurance that he will still speak to us weekly words of cheer and comfort in the Meditations, and at regular intervals through the sermon page. These years of his ministry in the Christian Herald have been fruitful ones. Now that he is leaving us, he will carry with him the abiding love and esteem of every member of our Family Circle, and will be accompanied by their prayers that he may long be spared to fill out to the fullest measure, his lifetime work of Gospel presentation.

Evening Call for Prayer

A READER of the Christian Herald in Virginia sends this excellent suggestion, which is especially worthy of adoption at the present time.

"I wish to call your attention to what follows, that it may serve as a suggestion for your weekly paper, should you see fit, to the end that others may follow:

"Every evening, at seven o'clock, some church bell is rung here, as a signal for every one within its sound to go to prayer for the Allies in France, during the present conflict. Our pastor pro tem., Dr. William Hervey Woods of Baltimore, stated that he knew of only one other town that was doing this, and further, that while we were late in going into this war, we certainly were very late in taking to concerted prayer. All this, in spite of the fact that by way of heaven is the shortest cut to France."

Most Perfect Telescope Lens

WHAT is said to be the most perfect telescope mirror in the world, and the second largest, has just been completed in Pittsburgh and shipped to the Dominion Astronomical Observatory in Victoria, Canada. The mirror is 73 inches in diameter. The largest is a 100-inch mirror made four years ago for the observatory at Wilson, California. Nine years was required for the grinding and polishing of that, while the one just sent to Victoria was completed in a little less than four years. The large piece of glass, which in its finished state weighs two and one-fourth tons, was made in Belgium and shipped from Antwerp in August, 1914, just one week before the war was declared. The requirements about this lens were that its greatest error should not be more than 1-250,000 of an inch. The greatest error in the work just completed is 1-400,000 of an inch. The mounting and general equipment for this lens is completed and is being set up at the observatory. The instrument weighs fifty-five tons. The polar axis is twenty-three feet long and weighs ten tons. The telescope tube is thirty-one feet long and weighs ten tons. The mirror cell, weighing, with mirror, six tons, forms the bottom or lower end, while to the upper end is firmly attached the signal skeleton tube constructed of structural steel. The mirror, which is twelve inches thick at the edge, is pierced centrally by a hole 10 6-8 inches in diameter. Astronomy along with other sciences has made giant strides. With the old telescope worlds and systems were revealed. But under the new great lenses, millions of worlds rush into view, and the man who looks at them can weigh them, locate them, determine their velocity, and even photograph them. Lincoln said to a young printer, one moonlight night as they were walking just out of Springfield, Illinois, "I do not see how any man could look up at the stars in the heavens and be an atheist." They worshipped the stars in olden times, but did not know much of their nature or movements. The Jews looked up to God as the Author of them all. Their ideal poet looked up to the firmament and comparing the material greatness of the stars with the littleness of man's body, and the superiority of man over them, said: "When I consider thy heavens, the work of thy fingers, the moon and the stars, which thou hast ordained; what is man, that thou art mindful of him? and the son of man, that thou visitest him?" (Ps. 8:3, 4.)

Autos Substitute for Life Boats

THE steamship Kershaw went aground and was wrecked recently 175 yards off the shore at East Hampton, N. Y. The storm was so fierce that the lifeboats could not be used. The life-savers rescued the passengers in a manner never known before in those parts. They rigged a breeches buoy and worked it by putting a hawser over the top of a building and making it secure behind it, and fastening the other end to the top of a mast of the ill-fated vessel and pulling it back and forth. Two citizens brought their automobiles and furnished the motor force by alternately running up and down Ocean Avenue till all the passengers were landed by the buoy, the captain of the ship being the last to leave it. It is said that the ship was a total loss. This wreck calls to mind the one in olden times when the ship ran aground and was destroyed and not a single life was lost. There were no professional life-savers on the coast like

Birthday of Representative Government in Japan

JAPAN recently celebrated the thirtieth anniversary of the granting of her national constitution. The late Emperor belonged to a family that had ruled Japan for 2,000 years. The monarchy was absolute. The Mikado a generation ago saw that the Western nations had a something, a life, a progress, which his people did not possess, and he and a group of great statesmen put their heads together to find out the secret of success. They sent their most gifted men to England, America and other countries to investigate free institutions. Steadily they came up to the granting of a constitution and a parliament, and for the first time in the modern history of the world, they changed the government from an absolute monarchy to a popular government, without bloodshed. Almost all the best things, almost all the rights of the people, have had to be paid for with blood. Japan is a hereditary monarchy. The cabinet consists of ten ministers of state, presided over by a prime minister. The House of Peers has about 330 members, male members of the royal house, life peers or peers elected for life or for seven years, and other persons nominated by the Emperor. The House of Representatives has 369 members, elected to a term of four years by citizens who pay a government tax of our superb men in our country, nor automobiles to work any buoy, but the captain first ordered those who could swim to jump into the water and make the land, and then he ordered the rest to get planks and pieces of the broken vessel as life preservers, "and commanded that they which could swim should cast themselves first into the sea, and get to land; and the rest, some on boards, and some on broken pieces of the ship. And . . . they escaped all safe to land." (Acts 27:43, 44.)

Airplanes Steered by Knees

A NEW steering appliance has been adopted by some of the airships, especially in war service. The steering is done largely by the knees, leaving the hands, heretofore needed on the wheel, free to load or shoot a gun, drop a like a bird with which he walks. The bird does not stay on the wing all the time. It cannot do so. It has to come down to the earth to get its food and sleep and make its nest and rear its young. Man has to use his feet much of the time, walking on the earth, making his living, founding a home, dealing with society, and meeting mental, moral and spiritual obligations by service with material, earthly instrumentalities. The divine strength secured by faith is as necessary in this walking process on the earth as for flying with wings in the upper air. This tremendous thought the prophet thus expresses: "They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength; they shall mount up with wings as eagles; they shall run, and not be weary; and they shall walk, and not faint." (Isa. 40:31.)

Photograph Early Papers

THE New York Historical Society is endeavoring to complete its file of Bradford's New York Gazette, the first newspaper printed in New York City, by photographing facsimiles of copies in other collections not owned by the Society. William Bradford, the famous colonial printer, established the paper in October, 1725. The most complete file of the earliest copies of the paper are owned by the New York Society Library, and it is the privilege of taking photographs of some of these early copies that the Historical Society is asking. The Massachusetts Historical Society began a similar work a few years ago in reproducing a file of the Boston News Letter, the first newspaper in America. By this photographic process the files, now simply historical relics and curiosities, are turned into a practical help to the student. In ancient times, the Jews preserved their historical records with great care that they might be read with profit by posterity. Of the record of the wisest of kings it was written, "Now the rest of the acts of Solomon and all that he did and his wisdom, are they not written in the book of the acts of Solomon?" (Kings 11:41.)

Animals Spreading Disease

A WRITER in a current magazine makes a severe indictment against the lower animals for communicating diseases to the human family. It is charged that the faithful family horse will spread glanders, rabies, lockjaw and other terrible diseases; that the pet dog or cat are circulators of hydrophobia, fleas and ticks; that the mosquito is the rapid transit for malarial and yellow fevers; that oysters bring typhoid, and fish make tape-worms. The severest indictment is made against the cow. Many men of science contend that the cow spreads the great white plague. These discoveries of science prompt the people to provide against these diseases that the lower tribes innocently communicate to them. There was One who lived in the world, who cured all the diseases of the body for those who came to him for remedy, and who now cures all the moral and spiritual maladies that flesh is heir to: "And Jesus went about all Galilee, teaching in their synagogues, and preaching the Gospel of the kingdom, and healing all manner of sicknesses and all manner of disease among the people." (Matt. 4:23.)

bomb, or work a chemical fire-extinguisher. Man is made with a bird nature, a soul which is capable of overcoming the pull of the flesh and the earth and the gravitation of moral evil, and flying into the altitudes of the spiritual and divine. The Holy Spirit as the motor, and the human conscience guided by God's revealed will as the steering wheel, are necessary to sail this airship safely through the upper mental and spiritual seas. Man has wings like a bird with which he flies, and also feet

The Making of the Big Guns

By FRANK G. CARPENTER

Copyright, 1918, by Frank G. Carpenter

I HAVE headed this letter "Somewhere in America." I might just as well head it "Everywhere in America," for the work of which I write is going on in two score or more of industrial centers all over the United States. That work is the making of guns, munitions and supplies for the United States Navy.

Under the promise of secrecy as to the character of the materials, the output and the details, I have been able to visit some of these factories. Everywhere the machinery is being speeded to highest tension, and tens of thousands of expert employees are at work day and night. The product goes forth in priority orders, crowding even the coal and food to the sidetracks. Many of the cargoes are secret. They may go out labeled as ordinary freight or in packages that give no idea of their character, and under names that serve as a camouflage to the spies.

In some of these places they are making big guns, in some they are turning out torpedoes for submarines, and in some they are making smokeless powders and terrible explosives, the deadly chemical compositions of which are a secret.

In one nest in the mountains more than 1,000 miles from any seaport, and in a country almost as wild as it was when Columbus discovered America, I found a dynamite plant covering acres. It was guarded by soldiers and surrounded by fences of barbed wire charged with electricity, and with watch towers at every few rods. It may be located there on account of its proximity to certain supplies.

In the south there are plants manufacturing explosives which use vast quantities of cotton, a whole bale of 500 pounds going, it is said, into one charge of a single big gun.

In every iron smelting center they are turning out shells or other projectiles, or the armor plate which protects our great ships of war. Here a little factory may make a single intricate part of some engine or munition supply, while not far away may be a mighty steel works whose furnaces are manufacturing iron ore into the huge ingots needed for the great guns of our battleships.

ALL this work is systematized and directed by the bureau of ordnance of the Navy Department at Washington. The officials know just what is going on at each plant, what supplies there are there and how they may be taken most quickly to the places where they are needed. They have vast warehouses of easy access to the sea, containing parts of every gun and piece of machinery used on the hundreds of vessels and these are so marked that they can be sent on cable orders to any part of the world.

I went through one establishment of that kind where they had 80,000 different items in the goods and supply parts on hand in the storerooms, and that factory was shipping an average of 1,000 articles every twenty-four hours.

Moreover, every one of the supply parts bears marks which show just where and when it was made and the inspectors through whose hands it has passed. If a defect occurs in any of the ordnance or munitions that go to the ships the part that fails can be easily traced back to the shop where it was made and to the very workmen who made it.

The work I have seen is remarkably efficient. Many of the plants have been built up on orders given by France and England before we entered the war, and since then they have been greatly increased. Some of them are turning out shells by the millions and small arms by the hundreds of thousands. They are making smokeless powder in vast quantities and munitions of all kinds as never before. Some of the factories cover many acres and there thousands of employees are at work night and day.

The plant described in this letter is under the direct charge of the government. It is one that makes big guns and other equipment for the navy. Its departments embrace all sorts of industries and its machinery is such that it can make anything from a brass rivet to a flying machine, from a screw, weighing a small fraction of an ounce to a gun for a dreadnought so big and so heavy that special freight cars will have to be built to carry it from one place to another.

Here we are in one of the shops. It covers more its rotary motion as the powder drives it forth to the muzzle. The machine that does this cuts the grooves at just the proper depth, width and length, and a cut too deep or too long or anyways wrong would ruin the gun. Considerably more than $100,000 worth of metal has gone into the weapon, and the importance of care and accuracy can be easily seen. The work of making the guns includes many industries and the skilled mechanics use all sorts of tools. There are something like 200 machines employed to work on each gun before its parts are made and assembled into the wonderful fighting machine of our great battleships. The machinery for loading and sighting the guns and that for firing them are wonders of mechanism. The weight of the gun is 134,000 pounds, and this huge mass must be raised and lowered and pointed this way and that with the slightest expenditure of manual effort. A single man can sight the gun and fire it, and the mount upon which the gun stands is so made that it will receive and absorb the tremendous force of the recoil without shocking or straining the turret of the vessel in which it stands. These mounts are made in another part of the gun shop and a single piece of their bronze castings sometimes weighs as much as ten or twelve tons. The construction of the mount is quite as important as that of the gun and the work of making it, on account of the great number of parts employed, requires as great a variety of tools as is to be found in the gunshop itself.

The big gun on this speeding Torpedo Boat Destroyer is ready to fire on any enemy in range, while the depth bombs almost covered with the swirl at the stern will quickly write "finis" over the career of a submerged foe than an acre and the vast roof of glass is high overhead. The interior is a maze of machinery and the noise which comes up makes you think of the confusion of Babel. You look this way and that, and there are so many new and strange things that your eyes are dazzled as in a kaleidoscope.

About the shops in various stages of work are great logs of steel, some as big around as the largest oak tree and so long that if stood upon end they would almost touch the glass roof, which is fifty or sixty feet above where we are standing. Some of the steel logs are polished, showing the marks of the lathe which has cut them out into the mighty cylinders that form our big guns. Others are as dull as the iron when it comes from the forges, where the tubes of these mighty rifles are prepared for the lathe. Other guns are being cut by the lathes. The hard steel is shaven off as though it were cheese and it drops in great spirals of silver upon the dirt floor. The lathe for the fourteen-inch gun is more than 100 feet long, and it has a swing of eight feet. It cuts the hole in the log to a diameter of fourteen inches, forming the bore of the gun.

The outside of the tube or barrel is now cut to the right size by the lathe, and after this a steel jacket weighing many tons is put on to strengthen the gun and great hoops are added. The jacket comes to the shop in the shape of a hollow ingot as high as a table and so long that you could hardly get it into the average parlor. It is cut to the right diameter by the lathe and is shrunk onto the barrel after much the same principle that a blacksmith shrinks a tire on a wheel. This is done in such a way that when completed the whole seems to be one piece of metal. This adds enormously to the strength of the gun, and makes it so that it will withstand a pressure of fifteen to twenty tons to the square inch.

THE next process is rifling the gun for the shells. This means that spiral grooves must be cut inside the barrel in such a way that the shell will be given guns as completed and ready for shipment to a great man-of-war. It will give us some idea of the weapons Uncle Sam is now turning out for fighting the Germans. This gun is one of the largest and most effective of the world. We have many like it on our dreadnoughts and still larger guns are now being made.

We stand at the breech of the gun as it lies on the blocks. The diameter here is so great that the jacket rises high over our heads. We turn and walk along the polished barrel pacing the distance from one end of it to the other. The gun is so long that if it were stood upon end it would reach to the roof of a five-story house. We stop at the front end and look at the muzzle, from which the huge projectile flies forth. It is fourteen inches in diameter, or almost as big around as the head of a flour barrel. I could easily crawl in and have room to spare. The gun weighs sixty-seven tons. It would take 134 horses to haul it if it were put upon wheels on an ordinary road.

The projectile or shell which it uses weighs 1,400 pounds, or more than two-thirds of a ton. Stand the shell upon end and it would reach to the height of your shoulder. It is fourteen inches through, or twice as large around as the average telegraph pole. The charge for the gun is powder of the smokeless variety. It consists of many little cylinders, each of which is pierced from end to end by small holes. It takes two or three bushels of these cylinders to fire off the gun, and the weight of the powder for a single charge is about twice the weight of the heaviest man.

AND then the effectiveness of this mighty weapon. The mammoth projectile I have described is loaded by means of machinery, and the charge is fired by electric or percussion primers. There is only the touch of a button or the pulling of a lever and the huge shell flies forth from the muzzle at a speed of a half mile per second. It weighs 1,400 pounds, but it starts out like lightning. It goes so fast that we can not comprehend its velocity. The muzzle energy

Philadelphia's Moral Clean-Up Begun

THE nation will not permit its fighting men to be destroyed by vice or defrauded by professional gamblers. Several communities which sheltered various varieties of the human parasite which preys upon men have been warned to clean up. In most cases a warning was enough but Philadelphia appeared to have a very complete case of chronic debauchery. At the close of a week during which Philadelphia failed to comply with the demand of Secretary Daniels of the Navy to wipe out the vicious resorts of the city, the United States Government, as noted last week through Lieutenant Colonel Charles B. Hatch, of the Marine Corps, took the police department of that city out of the hands of Mayor Thomas B. Smith, and his appointees Director of Public Safety William H. Wilson, and Superintendent of Police James R. Robinson, and placed it in charge of Captain William B. Mills, head of the traffic squad.

Lieutenant Colonel Hatch said the government had not commandeered the police force in the full meaning of the word, but the government was determined to clean up the city if the police could not do so. Captain Mills is said to have told the Colonel that in forty-eight hours after he took control he would show that he had the situation firmly in hand. "I am acting for Secretary Daniels," said Colonel Hatch, "and he has no desire to take the control of the police out of the hands of the municipal authorities. We intend to see, however, that the young men in the service are protected and that evil resorts are wiped out."

Captain Mills, who is the first appointee of the American government to supplant the regular officials of a city in territory not at war with the United States, joined the Philadelphia police force in 1905, after having acquired a fund of experience in his army service, which included a campaign in the Philippines and the Boxer insurrection in China.

In the present condition of affairs Captain Mills is empowered to complain to Colonel Hatch about any one in the municipal service who is caught "playing politics," and the mayor will dismiss him by direction of the military authorities.

THE text of Superintendent Mills's talk to the captains and lieutenants as reported by his own stenographer was as follows:

"The problem which I have been called upon by my superiors to solve can only be met by full co-operation on the part of every man in the Police Bureau."

"I am not going to request that co-operation, but I am going to demand it by enforcing a discipline that ultimately will work out for the betterment of not only the city, but every man in the Bureau who has ability."

"Discipline of the kind that I demand can only be obtained by a complete severance of all fetters on the police, either political or personal. Get out of politics, pay no political assessments, forget your friends who want political favors done, and do police work only if you wish to hold your jobs. This is my first order, and it will not be repeated."

"To emphasize my position, let me say to you that in the future the recommendation of a politician will be a handicap rather than an aid to any policeman either seeking promotion or in trouble as a result of violation of orders."

"Responsibility for police work will reach from the patrolman on the beat all the way up the line."

"Captains and lieutenants will be free to make any changes for the betterment of the service. In the future politicians will not dictate assignments of any character."

"And remember, orders will be issued once; there will be no reminders."

"The police department is now a business house, and I have laid down our business principles. There is no camouflage about this, I mean every word I say. You can do whatever you want in your divisions and districts, as long as you tell me about it. The thing I want done in police work is nothing but police work, and each of you will be held strictly accountable to me."

Director Wilson read over a copy of Superintendent Mills's talk and said he approved every word of it. Asked if he was still in charge of the Philadelphia police force, Mr. Wilson replied that he confirmed every word of the peppery instructions of Mills, saying, "I am co-operating with Captain Mills and will back him to the limit." The Mayor said virtually the same thing.

ALL this came as the result of an unenviable notoriety which Philadelphia had gained through its police department. The city was considered too corrupt for our soldiers and sailors. These conditions were revealed to the world outside by a report made to the Secretary of the Navy by Mr. Raymond B. Fosdick.

It was claimed by the city's apologists that the charges of Mr. Fosdick were based on unsubstantial evidence. But Mr. Fosdick stood by his charges and even added that Philadelphia had grown steadily worse, and gave a list of 68 resorts, which, he said, was by no means complete and represented only a small portion of such places scattered over the city, every one of which enjoyed "protection." The Philadelphia Inquirer said: "Philadelphia is wide open. Gambling is prevalent. Viciousness is running wild. Thieves and highwaymen stalk abroad. Men and women of the classes who prey upon the public go about their business unmolested. Robberies are so frequent that they no longer provoke comment. District Attorney Rotan spoke the truth when he declared that the police were demoralized. But they have been going from bad to worse. And today Mr. Fosdick declares as the result of his inquiry that they are 'corrupt.'"

GOD'S ways are not our ways, neither are His thoughts our thoughts. We are apt to think, if we only had almighty power and the resources that have been available, how beautifully we could have directed this war to a successful outcome long since. In fact, those who believe that "not a sparrow falleth on the ground without your Father" might well believe that Providence could have prevented the war altogether.

But in His governance of human affairs, God has infinite things to provide for, involving infinite ramifications and interrelations, of which we can know but little. He takes the long, the eternal view of what is best for individuals and for nations.

The Kaiser and the German people make the frequent assertion that God is on their side; that, as their ally, the God of Germany has helped them to victory and has punished their enemies. Their enraged cry is, Gott strafe England, Gott strafe Amerika, Gott strafe everybody that dares lift up a hand to resist enslavement by God's chosen people, the Germans. On the other hand, the Allied nations believe that God's providence is working in their favor. Which is right? Let us consider for a moment a few facts:

A powerful nation, filled with the lust of conquest and robbery and a boundless lust for dominion, deliberately prepared for this war through many years. The rulers of that nation had long since cast from their hearts as a useless encumbrance the image of the God of Love, known to us in the person of the meek and lowly Nazarene, and erected in His place the horrid image of the God of War, who is the Devil and Satan.

LAYING aside for the moment all thought of German atrocities, it is plainly against the Divine order for one nation to enslave another. The Lord's management of human affairs has led from freedom to freedom for the people of the earth. Peoples and classes of people have one after another been emancipated from various forms of slavery. Women are becoming freed from ancient injustices and wrongs, children from too early labor, and everywhere we note that the spirit of liberty is in the air. Germany's ambition runs flatly counter to this manifest trend of the Divine operations.

Divine Providence in the War

By J. H. HOTSON

Again, we are taught by the whole spirit of the Bible that the Lord guards man's freedom as the apple of His eye—that He nowhere forces man to love or serve Him—man is entirely free to choose. "Choose ye this day whom ye will serve," is the spirit of both the Old Testament and the New. If God is so jealous of man's freedom in spiritual things, shall He not be respectful of man's freedom from external bondage? The question answers itself. The assumption of the Kaiser that God is helping him to force other peoples into bondage to him is a plain insult to the Deity.

But there is a third consideration which seems equally potent and which alone would lead us to the conclusion that the influence of Divine Providence has been and will be exerted in the direction of victory for the Allies—and that consideration is the welfare of the Germans themselves. We should not forget that the Lord loves the Germans. There is no partiality in His love. He sends His rain on the just and on the unjust. And because He loves these cruel Prussians, He seeks to prevent them from falling into yet greater depths of evil, by humbling their pride and diminishing their power and their opportunities to do evil. The lust for dominion grows with what it feeds on, until it waxes so great that it would challenge the Almighty. Give success to the Prussian war lovers, and their pride would tower up to heaven and their self-deification would know no bounds. It is a divine law that "Pride goeth before destruction and a haughty spirit before a fall." And with the failure of the Prussian war lords to win this war, the German people may be expected to cast out the rulers who brought their country to defeat and ruin, set up a government of the people, and begin to enjoy some of the benefits of freedom—not alone political freedom, but the freeing of their minds from the poisonous sophistries of the Prussian war doctrine.

It was obviously necessary, on the other hand, that the Allies should not snatch a too easy victory, else they, being merely human, might have become puffed up with pride in their military prowess and become difficult neighbors for other nations to live with.

To the merciful spirit of the Lord this fratricidal strife must be infinitely abhorrent. But where He cannot restrain men from deeds of wickedness, He overrules and directs the results of their actions as far as possible for good. He is preparing the ground for the orderly growth of His kingdom upon earth, which can only be established in a reign of peace. He is guiding the world into an age when wars shall be no more. The growth of the spirit of peace in the world in the last quarter century has been marvelous. Let us hope and pray that this is the last organized onslaught of the powers of hell upon the sons of peace on earth.

Those who believe in the watchful and living Providence of God over his wayward children can discern numberless evidences, great and small, that the trend of events is being irresistibly guided by the Lord to one inevitable conclusion.

Numberless examples could be cited. How often by a narrow margin have the Allies escaped disaster. From the beginning of the war the Germans time after time have reached out to grasp the fruits of victory, and the cup has been dashed from their lips. It is written in the book of fate that their power for tyranny and conquest shall be broken.

WAR is a terrible and hateful thing. But there are worse things than war. A worse thing would be the loss of human freedom. Germany offered the world the choice of but two things: slavery to Germany or war. The world chose the only alternative it could possibly accept. Peace-loving America hoped against hope that it might be spared the necessity of descending to the slaughter pit. We had no choice but to go. Built as we are, with this Godgiven instinct of freedom in us, God help us, we can do no otherwise.

Having taken up the gage of battle, we must fight German militarism with the only arguments they understand. War cannot be waged with kid gloves and rosewater. It is a grim business. The Christian in war should cast out all hatred from his soul, and instead thereof implant an iron resolution, an unshakeable determination to apply unfalteringly the knife to the world fester and cure the body of humanity of the dread war disease. The Christian loves peace so passionately that he is willing to fight for it even to the death.

Shall we fold our hands and say: "Providence will bring it right in the end. Why should I worry?" Suppose

Adventures in Neighboring

Conducted by VERA L. CONNOLLY

A Department for the Exchange of Experiences Between All Who Have High Community Ideals and Are Putting Them into Practice

"IS this Miss Connolly?"

My questioner—a quiet, forceful officer attached to the British-Canadian Recruiting Mission—appeared suddenly around the tank Britannia.

Trying to appear calm, I convinced him that I was the person privileged to ride, that morning, in the great steel monster against which the gaping New York crowds (for the tank stood in Union Square) were shoving me in their excitement.

With a brief command to his men, the officer disappeared; and there followed tense moments of preparation. While I waited, my glance strayed to the tall buildings closing us in, and on up to the serene sky above them.

It was the most peaceful of spring mornings! From every roof-top, banners of smoke waved. My glance dropped from those emblems of a nation's prosperity to the khaki-clad soldiers at work on their great war-engine. And my heart flowed to overflowing with love and gratitude. These "boys" had been in the battle of Arras, and so had the tank. Both were battle-scarred in our defense.

I knew that any expression of gratitude would only bore the men; but the tank would not mind. So I reached out my hand, where I stood, and stroked it.

It broke into violent purring. The crew had started the engine! I looked up. The young recruiting officer was mounting the Fifth Avenue bus which was to follow the tank and from which he was to address crowds all over the city.

"Ready!" one of the crew called to me.

I looked for the door. Somehow I had expected to step into the tank through a tall, narrow door, or to clamber to the top and descend inside. But instead, a horizontal slit opened under the bulging side, and through that I scrambled (with as great dignity as possible) into the warm, dusky interior of the monster.

THE crew crawled in after me, closing the door. The engine beat louder. There were excited sounds from the crowd (now invisible). We were off!

Instantly a terrific jolting set up, accompanied by a deafening clatter. Talking was almost impossible. The throat ached with the effort. I know nothing to compare the din to, unless it might be riding in a wagon, without tires, loaded with steel rails, over a rutty road.

Dazed by the racket and vibration, I sat in the rear, beside a gearsman. At the front sat the driver. The others were in their places.

The entire middle of the "steel caterpillar" was taken up by the engine; a great 150-horse-power affair, using eight gallons of gasoline for every mile. Around me, on the walls, were the cases of ammunition. Before my face were two machine-guns. Two others were on the opposite side of the tank; and there was a gun at the front and one at the rear. It was all very grim. And as I sat there, in the semi-darkness in that jolting, clattering fort, with the faint odors of stale powder and grease and gasoline in my nostrils, and those quiet khaki-clad men all about, something clutched at my heart.

"How is the recruiting going?" I shouted at the man beside me.

He made a megaphone of his hands. "Splendidly! If you've got any British and Canadian friends, tell 'em they can enlist by getting in touch with their nearest recruiting station or writing to us at 220 West Forty-second Street, New York."

I nodded.

"What do you use the tanks for, Over There?"

"To locate machine-gun emplacements; cut barbed wire; upset the morale of German troops; take small objectives; assist the morale of our own troops, or cut a pathway through the woods," he called back.

JUST then we turned a corner, one side of the great caterpillar standing still while the other was kept in motion. Now we were on cobblestones, apparently. The jolting became almost unbearable. The din, too, increased. I thought of a boiler-factory shaken by a continuous earthquake.

"Could a shell pierce this?" I asked.

"If a direct hit; not otherwise. The steel is 7-16 of an inch thick."

"How many men go in a tank, when in action?"

"Usually eight: a driver, brakesman, made my way dizzily to the nearest street car.

You, too, dear neighbors, are having patriotic adventures these days. Your letters to me overflow with them, and I have decided to fill today's page with your accounts, making this meeting of the American Community Club a patriotic one.

FIRST, however, I should like to share with you a little story of the Spanish-American War, which I chanced to hear told the other day, and begged beating down on the coffin of the American lad who would never return home.

Suddenly his reading became confused: choked. He stopped, struggling for control. But the words would not come. Turning away, he thrust the book into the hands of his captain, who had stepped forward, and the burial service proceeded.

To me there could be no more beautiful instance of the fellowship which should, and so often does, exist between our American soldiers, irrespective of rank. And I cannot help wondering if any martial honor that has since come to that officer (now Chief of Ordnance of the United States Army and one of the great men of his time) will have as much weight, with Him above, as that moment of heartfelt grief, beside an open grave, almost twenty years ago.

NOW, dear neighbors, turning over life's calendar to the present year and month, let us consider the needs of our soldier boys of 1918, finding help and inspiration from our experiences.

A "District School" Entertainment for the Red Cross

Our Red Cross chapter was out of money and in debt. What was to be done?

Some one suggested that the old folks give a program. The idea seemed to take; so we called a mass meeting of our Red Cross women. The plan was enthusiastically received by them, and volunteers were called for. Then the question came up of what kind of entertainment we'd have. An old-fashioned "district school" was proposed, and decided on.

We induced all the older people to take part. These costumed themselves as school-children, in clothes as old-fashioned as they could procure, and spoke such old pieces as "The Boy Stood on the Burning Deck," "Mary Had a Little Lamb," and so on. Some sang old-fashioned songs. One played on the Jew's harp, and others gave drills. Two or three, costumed as parents, came in to visit the "school," and gave addresses. The entertainment was a huge success! It had been well advertised, and our auditorium was packed, netting us over seventy dollars.

MRS. P. G. KIBBEY.

IN case money-raising adventure does not appeal to you, here is another plan, which resulted in the raising of an even larger sum:

Our Red Cross Fair

The Red Cross Drive was on. Everyone had been solicited; every dollar raised that could be; or so it seemed, until a man of the town suggested that we hold a Red Cross Fair. He offered to construct the booths, and did so, being assisted by our Red Cross chapter and all the boys and girls in town. The Fair was advertised to last three evenings and to offer the following entertainments: Pin Wheels, Crazy House, Athletic Show, Lunch Counter, Fortune Teller, Candy Booth, Striking Machine, Parcel Post, Big Snake, Bazaar, Wild Man, Ball Rack, Fat Man, Shooting Gallery, Feeding a Soldier, Fish Pond.

The Fair was held in a large vacant hall, booths lining the walls. In the center was a merry-go-round operated by man power. The admission to the hall was five cents; and on the right of the entrance was the bazaar, filled with aprons, dust caps, knitting bags, home made dolls, dollies, bonnets and so on! The ladies loved to linger here. The next booth was an advertisement of our town's music store, and contained a victrola with some one to operate it. Just beyond was the "Big Snake." It cost all of five cents to see him. The Parcel Post Booth was very popular. There were large packages, small ones, lean ones, fat ones: all donated and sold for ten cents each. It was hard to keep the booth supplied, so fast did the packages sell. At the Fish Pond you could find the children in crowds. This Pond was very simple. A screen was placed across a booth and two fishing poles supplied. The children threw the line over the screen, behind which were seated two little boys who hung postcards, flags, pennants, Liberty buttons or toys on the hooks, so that every one fishing caught something. This cost five cents for three fishings.

A little farther on was the Feed-a-Soldier booth: popular with the older boys. This consisted of a barrel with a muslin cover over the top. On this cover was painted the face of a soldier. The mouth was cut out, and you paid five cents for three biscuits and threw them at the opening. If you succeeded in getting all three into the barrel, you received a two gearsmen and four gunners." He added, smiling, "This tank is twenty-six feet long; seven feet, ten inches high; and nine feet broad. It weighs thirty-two tons. And when in action, even the driver's window is closed, periscope being used. At night we follow white tapes laid down for us."

I could not have listened longer. A great faintness had swept over me; and I ached in every joint. I asked to be put down. The tank stopped, one of the slit-like doors opened, and I rolled out into the sunlight of lower New York, to the huge delight of a great crowd which had instantly gathered.

We were at the Williamsburg Bridge; so the tank started on across it, toward Brooklyn, accompanied by the bus from which the recruiting officers addressed the fascinated, following crowd.

I watched until the tank had waddled out of sight, then—with a little prayer for the success of the day's recruiting and a feeling of thankfulness that I had had a small (if unseen) part in it—I permission to repeat. The incident was witnessed by Mr. Otto Koenig, now president of the Christian Herald, but then a private in the Astor Battery and one of the twenty thousand volunteers who rushed to Dewey's support after the battle of Manila Bay.

The city of Manila had not yet been quelled and policed. This had to be done. And it was to accomplish it that Dewey asked for, and was supplied with, the force of twenty thousand men.

The battle which ensued is known to history as "The Taking of the City of Manila"; and it was practically bloodless. A few of our "boys," however, were killed. Among these was a little first sergeant who was dearly beloved, especially by one of his superior officers, Lieutenant C. C. Williams; and it fell to the lot of Lieutenant Williams to have to read the burial service over the body of his first sergeant. He made the effort, beginning bravely; with the open grave before him, and the men grouped about, and the pitiless tropic sunshine

A Day of Brave Mothers

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

I WAS visiting a training-camp a few days ago. It was on the eve of a certain regiment's departure for duty overseas, and the boys were busily preparing for the first step of the long journey that ends in France. Their orders to move had come suddenly and rather unexpectedly, so suddenly and unexpectedly that there had been no time to bid friends and loved ones goodbye. Some of the boys were whistling as they packed their kit bags, but others were frankly blue. One of the boys, a stranger to me, spoke aloud as I was passing.

"We're going awful sudden," he said. "I wish we weren't!"

"But it's easier to go suddenly," I said, as consolingly as I could.

"You haven't time, when you go suddenly, to worry about anything, or to get nervous."

The boy seemed to brighten for a second. And then again his face lengthened into sober lines.

"That's right," he agreed; "but I would like to have seen my mother, once, before I left!"

As he spoke I felt my mind going back over the years to a certain little girl standing on a street corner with a broken doll clasped to her breast. She was sobbing bitterly, and there were passersby who stopped to console her.

"I've broken my doll," wailed the little girl, "and I want my mother!" "Can't I help?" questioned a kind young lady. "Isn't there anything that I can do to patch up the baby doll?"

But the certain little girl spoke with an ungrammatical firmness.

"Mother is what I want when I feel bad!" said the little girl.

THE twelfth of this month will be Mother's Day—the beautiful Sunday that is set aside in honor of all mothers. It has always been the custom to wear a white carnation on that day, a flower that signifies love and faith and purity. This year, more than ever, should Mother's Day be observed, but I think that the white flower of motherhood should be linked with the red badge of courage.

For in this year the mothers of America are proving their courage. They are giving their sons bravely to the cause of Freedom—giving them with smiling faces and souls that are proud, despite their sorrow.

I think that there is hardly a woman in this our land who is untouched by the great war that is sweeping the world. Every time one sees a company of soldiers down the avenue, one thinks instinctively of the woman who stands silently praying behind each erect form. And when one multiplies the number of men in each company by the number of troops that are marching away in different states, and then thinks of the woman hearts that are beating in time to their steady tread, well...

YES, this is the year of brave women! From all over the country they write to me; from the East and the West, the North and the South.

"Four of my sons are in training!" one mother tells me; and "My only boy is now in France!" says another. A woman, with two sons already killed in service, writes that her last child is driving an ambulance on a western front! There are so many letters, and though some of them are marked with the stain of tears, all of them are brave letters.

And it's because they know that their mothers are brave that the boys are turning to them. Friendship and love affairs are swept quite away in the overwhelming current of a something far greater. It is his mother that the boy in the trenches writes to when he has a moment to spare; it is his mother that he longs for when he is sent suddenly away; it is his mother that he asks for when he is wounded—his mother who kissed his baby bruises to make them well, and who heard his halting little prayers at evening time.

MOTHERHOOD has always been a sacred thing. That is why churches and Sunday schools have set aside a day in honor of all mothers; that is why people, the nation over, wear white carnations. But now motherhood is almost more than a sacred thing—it is a trust. It is to the living mother rather than to the mother of memory that we turn on this Mother's Day.

It is to the living mother whose task it is to keep brave the heart in her boy, to let the light of her courage shine upon his soul and the warmth of her love be his shield and buckler.

This is a war in which idealism should play a large part. And the manhood of America is going into it with the highest ideals possible. They are going into it with chivalry and gentleness, and faith in a God of Right. It is from his mother that every true man gets his first and most permanent ideals; it is the lesson learned at his mother's knee that proves the most worth while. That is why the courage of American mothers is such a necessary thing—why their high ideals and higher hopes will help us to win in the great conflict.

And so, as on the twelfth of May we pin the white carnation to our coat lapels and frocks, let us think of the new, more radiant motherhood that it stands for—the motherhood that is as unflinching as the motherhood of ancient Sparta and as tender as the love of another Mother who laid her Baby in the straw of a manger, while the angels sang a song of peace.

A YOUNG soldier wrote to me this morning. "This war," he told me, "is almost harder for the ones who are waiting at home than for any one else. And the ones who are waiting the most bravely and patiently are the mothers."

"Take my mother, for instance. I know that every time it rains she worries for fear I'll take cold. I know that she worries about everything from torn clothing to shell fire. And yet I don't think of her as constantly worrying, because she sends me such cheery letters—letters full of hope and faith and courage. Even the day that I marched away I looked back over my shoulder and saw her smiling and waving her handkerchief."

"Somehow, with that picture of her in my mind, I feel that she's being braver than I am!"

"I WOULD like to have seen my mother once before I left," the boy in the training camp told me. "I would like to have seen my mother once!"

Yes, he would like to have seen his mother, because he knew that there would be no breaking down, no flood of tears to send him downhearted on his journey! That is not the way of the American mother at this crisis. The American mother waits until she is alone to cry, and smiles into the face of her son as she gives him godspeed. Because she knows that her courage will be his courage.

So, on this Mother's Day, let us bow our heads in reverence to living mothers—mothers who are giving their sons to their country. They are bearing a cross and bearing it more than bravely. They are keeping up the morale of an army and a nation. And their prayers winging up to the Father in heaven, are the prayers of a faith and courage as high as the faith and courage that one finds on the firing line.

Borden's EAGLE BRAND

Keds

The Most Comfortable Hot-Weather Shoes

LAST year many thousands of persons who tried to buy Keds were disappointed. The enthusiastic welcome accorded these high-class, rubber-soled canvas shoes left us unable to take care of the public's huge demand.

This year more than 50,000 dealers in the United States stock Keds in a large variety of styles so that there should be no difficulty in obtaining these good-looking, durable sport-shoes.

The fine quality of Keds workmanship is beyond dispute. None but materials of unquestioned value are used in their manufacture. For style, economy and comfort, Keds are indeed without equal.

You may wear Keds on all occasions—at home, at the club, at the office, on the street, in the country. Whatever the business or pleasure, there is a style to suit you.

Keep these three grades of Keds in mind when buying. Look for the name "Keds" stamped on the sole.

Questions and Answers

BF. Dayton, Ohio. Your question, "How do Christian soldiers regard the attitude of the Church today?" is very well answered by a lieutenant in the United States Army, who writes in "Trench and Camp," one of the National Army publications: "Can't the churches do something to stop it all? Undoubtedly they can. In the first place they can refrain from diverting the thought of the country from the one great issue. America has only one task just now. That task is to stop the war by winning it; and by winning it so decisively that the monstrous thing which reared its ugly head shall remain inert to the end of time."

"Then conquer we must, for our cause it is just;

And this be our motto, 'In God is our trust.'"

Can't the church do something? Yes! It can preach the kingdom of righteousness as a forerunner to the reign of peace. Righteousness first—then peace! Now it is 'peace, peace, when there is no peace.' The most effective way for the Church to deal with the present crisis is to preach a gospel of unselfish devotion to the common cause. And if the Church would reach the ultimate in her effort, let her translate that gospel into terms of food-saving, of labor conciliation, of bond-buying—of doing."

L. E. T., Muncy, Pa. "There is one aspect of the food situation that has not received proper attention: that is, the matter of bird protection. Insects, according to the government, destroy food each year worth more than a billion dollars. I suffered severely last year from grasshoppers. I don't know how many bushels of apples and peaches I lost—a great many dollars' worth—because they had been nibbled by hoppers, thus allowing rot spores to enter the fruit and cause decay. And we suffer from the Hessian fly, which cuts down our wheat, and potato bugs, which ruin our potato vines. From the ravages of white grubs, the larvae of the June bug, I lost almost half of the value of a small planting of potatoes last year. I sold the nibbled tubers at less than half of what I got for whole potatoes, and was glad to get even that price. What I suffer on one small farm can be magnified by some millions. You see where it puts us. Beyond any question the government estimate of a billion dollars' damage is conservative. And with food so scarce as it is now, we simply don't dare lose a billion dollars of food if we can prevent it. By protecting our birds we can very largely prevent this loss. We have numerous bird laws, but they are not uniform in the various states, and there is terrible slaughter of migratory birds. We have a bird treaty with Canada, which Canada observes, and which we treat as a scrap of paper. All that is lacking to make this treaty effective is action by the House of Representatives. The Senate has already acted. If the House will give Uncle Sam power, he can make the treaty effective and stop the slaughter of migratory birds in this country. One vote in Congress will do it."

This little "Grace Before Meat," By William B. Roystone, may be found serviceable in the homes of many readers of the Christian Herald:

"Our Father!

May all that we receive, Lord, be Right in thy service used, that we May always find new strength in thee!

Amen!"

G. C., Seattle, Wash. Ten great paintings by old masters which are considered to rank as the highest are chiefly a matter of opinion. Following are among the best known paintings in the world: Raphael's "Madonna," Leonardo da Vinci's "Mona Lisa" and the "Last Supper," Michael Angelo's "Creation of Man," Botticelli's "Judith and the Head of Holofernes," Sir Joshua Reynolds' "Age of Innocent Cherubim," or "Angels' Heads," Gainsborough's "Mrs. Siddons," Van Dyke's "Charles I and Family."

A. N. A. L., Pittston, Pa. The Statue of Liberty was produced by F. Bartholdi, a distinguished French sculptor, and presented to the people of the United States by the people of France, in commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of American independence. The statue is made of bronze and was paid for by popular subscription in France. It was placed in position in 1885 and dedicated October 3, 1886.

Mrs. R. M. T., Clark, Pa. Early in the seventeenth century submarine boats were hidden and invented, and by 1727 fourteen types had been patented in England alone. The first successful and practical submarine is credited to Simon Lake, born in Pleasantville, N. J., September 4, 1866. In 1894 he built the Argonaut, Jr., at Atlantic Highlands, N. J., and in 1897 he designed the Argonaut.

Mrs. C. E. S., Homer, N. Y. asks if it would be correct for a child to take wheat bread to school on wheatless days. It would not. The Food Administration is doing its best to do without wheat bread entirely on wheatless days. By this means alone the United States can meet the Allies' needs.

C. T. M., Elizabeth, N. J. The Department of Agriculture says that a wheatless meal calls for absolutely no wheat. There are many people in doubt as to whether bran muffins should be used during the wheatless meal. The Department of Agriculture says that this can be used.

Mrs. H. M., Glenwood, Iowa. Regarding delay of mail to and from soldiers in France, the Post Office Department says that this is due to congestion in the Army Censor Board, as all letters going to boys in France are censored, and all letters coming to the United States have to pass the same censorship.

Mrs. J. N. P., Southridge, Mass. Women workers are most needed in the war as telegraph operators, telephone operators, stenographers, clerks, in munition plants, and in many other lines of service. If you wish to enroll for service, communicate with your State Chairman of the Woman's Committee of the Council of National Defense. In regard to religious work, we suggest that you communicate with a church doing work for the soldiers, or the Red Cross, or the Y. M. C. A., or that you apply to your nearest Y. W. C. A.

Mrs. S. J. F., Walden, N. Y. Regarding what kind of war work you can do at home, we suggest you could make scrap books for soldiers in the hospitals, or roll bandages for your Red Cross chapter. We also suggest that you enroll with the Woman's Section of the Council of National Defense for service. You might collect magazines and books for the soldiers, and send them through the Red Cross to the camps, or send them to the nearest recruiting station.

Miss H. M., Denton, Mich. The government is not training nurses, but desires only those who are graduates of a school which gives at least two years' training in nursing.

O. S., Los Angeles, Calif. The Department of Agriculture says that if, when cooking, you cut down the number of eggs, more baking powder must be used.

Miss H. S., Napier, W. Va. The U. S. Supreme Court has decided that it is not unconstitutional to draft men for service abroad.

Mrs. F. A., Cassville, Wis. Jerusalem is first mentioned as having been overcome by Joshua when its king, Adonibezek, made an alliance against the Jews. Later, it was captured and burned, according to the account in Judges 1:1-8. About B. C. 588 Nebuchadnezzar took the city after a three years' siege and, razing its walls, destroyed its temple and palaces with fire. In A. D. 70 it was captured by the Romans, who demolished the whole city, the temple included, except three towers and a part of the western wall; since that time it has undergone many sieges and its defenses have been repeatedly cast down, but never to the same terrible extent as in the disaster in the Roman era.

A. H. W., Greenland, N. H. The ways of the Lord are past finding out, and in his mercy, goodness and wisdom, he makes use of ways and means of which we know nothing. We cannot say what means he has of saving those who have never heard of Christ, but are certain that he will not let any one suffer for the lack of not having heard of him. Christ came to save all the world.

John H. S., California. The only explanation we know of is that, since Jesus loved John best, he wanted to give the care of Mary the mother to him with whom, he felt assured, she would be best taken care of.

S. E. M., Lost Nation, Iowa. 1. The object of Christ saying (John 13:15) that we should keep his commandments is to point out by what conditions alone the communion between the Saviour and his disciples can be preserved, and its greatest blessings—the presence of the Advocate—be enjoyed, namely, through love. This love consists also in a loving surrender of ourselves to the sole object, says a commentator: of glorifying the Father, analogous to the loving self-surrender of Jesus. "My commandments" are not merely commandments which he gives, but which he has himself first received and made his own. 2. Please read Matt. 28:19; John 3:5-6; Acts. 2:39; Mark 10:14; Mark 18:10-11; Acts. 16:15, 33; 1 Cor. 1:16. 3. We choose sound Gospel sermons as they are submitted and approved by us and do not prefer any denomination over another.

H. R. H., Philadelphia, Pa. The last eight chapters of Ezekiel refer to the period of final restoration. Ezekiel was one of the earliest exiles, who were carried away with the king and chief nobles before the destruction of Jerusalem. The latter chapters read as if they were written soon after the news of the capture and destruction of the city reached him in Babylon. He had already pointed out the cause of the national troubles in the desertion by the people of their God. He proclaimed forgiveness to the penitent. He predicted in detail the retribution which should fall on their enemies. Then, his mind oppressed by the national humiliation, he looks far ahead and sees a future glory surpassing all that had gone before, when the ancient theocracy should be restored and God himself would reign over them.

Reader, North Dakota. 1. The man in question was very foolish, to say the least. 2. We are not to judge others.

A. J. P., Elsmere, Neb. Evolution is a threadbare subject and discussion of it would lead nowhere.

The Fly Is Your Worst Enemy

THIS is no mere sensational utterance; it is a cold statement of fact.

Listen to one of the most eminent scientists of the country, a man trained to weigh every word he says:

"Flies are conceived in iniquity, bred in filth and lead a life of crime. They occupy no place in the economy of man."

That is a strong indictment, but it is not a jot too strong.

The American people have come to realize the danger of the fly and are campaigning strenuously against him.

Flies must be fought, and fought in the right way. To fight them is the duty of every community to its members, and of every individual to the community.

Send your name and address, enclosing a two-cent stamp for return postage to the Christian Herald Information Bureau, Frederic J. Haskin, Director, Washington, D. C., and you will receive, free of charge, a manual specially prepared to help you swat the fly while he is still a maggot.

Palestine's Fight With Famine

WHILE the American Red Cross Palestine Expedition continues on its way to Jerusalem, the plight of the people of the Holy City, and of many thousands all up and down the coasts of Palestine, continues to be most distressing. A cablegram received on April 15 by the American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief in New York, from Missionary Trowbridge, through our State Department in Washington, says:

"Fifteen hundred Armenian survivors of many thousands exiled from Adana, Kharne, Marash, Aintab, Ourfa, and Kessab, two and one half years ago to the wilderness east of the Jordan, have been found trekking to Jericho. For months they have been compelled by the Turks to break stone on the roads. They have been brought to Jerusalem in British motor trucks. Although weary and hungry, their faces lighted up at the first glimpse of the Mount of Olives. Six thousand Syrian refugees are expected this week. We will equip expeditions to meet the exiles, and will provide industrial relief if additional funds can be sent."

More than 100 pages of carefully prepared reports have lately been received from Palestine and other centers of suffering. Only now is the world beginning to realize all that the unfortunate people of the Christ-land have endured under Turkish oppression, and especially during the four years since the beginning of the war.

A record of the present situation in Jerusalem says: "The need for food here is becoming imperative and the suffering is growing intense. When camels and donkeys employed in the transport columns become exhausted and likely to die, the hungry people who are hanging along the borders of the caravan rush in immediately when they see an animal fall. The neck is cut in a moment, and within ten minutes not a bit of flesh is left on the bones." Scenes of this character have been witnessed again and again by the chaplains. They have seen women scratching at each other in their desperate efforts to grasp a bit of the flesh. Famished women have been found lying in the road between Bethlehem and Jerusalem. Bread in the Holy City costs about ten times what it did before the war, and fuel is unprocurable; 4,600 persons are being fed from a single soup kitchen.

FROM Jaffa, which has now but 5,000 population out of a former population of 60,000, comes this note of conditions: "There is much suffering among the people here for lack of food, although things are not so bad as in Jerusalem. Today I saw some of the British soldiers offer some porridge in a bowl to a few boys, and it was amazing to witness the way they rushed at and devoured the food to the last particle. Most of the suffering is among poor children and old people. They go about with a dazed expression of helplessness, and many seem to have gotten beyond caring whether they live or die. It is reported that there is great need in Hebron, also, but what can we do?"

An orphanage which was lately opened has spread its fame through the neighboring villages. Officers send in foundlings from all the surrounding country. Nearly every day soldiers bring in little children. One soldier brought a baby he had found. He had been caring for it himself, feeding it with condensed milk for several days. Another was brought in on a stretcher, who had been found in an old deserted building. Every morning groups of people clamor at the orphanage gate. One widow came with her seven children. Her husband had been killed and she was absolutely without means.

BLINDNESS, total or partial, is frequent in the Orient. Miss Lovell, who has a school for the blind, has had a hard battle to keep her charges alive. With a little borrowed money they procured a very small quantity of lentils and olives and a little wheat, and then the matron and the girls prayed earnestly that God would send some one to help them. The Turkish paper money, which they had in hand when the Moslems evacuated Jerusalem, is now good for nothing. When help came, the scene was touching. The girls started to sing, but their song, which was at first one of pure joy, was soon broken by tears, also of joy, and the relief officers were so touched that they wept with them for sympathy. Finally, one of the girls began a Hallelujah anthem, about those who had been brought out through "great tribulation."

Eleven hundred children are being cared for in the various orphanages, and plans are well under way to greatly increase this number.

Women and children in Jerusalem are now being employed wherever possible in industrial work. There is, however, a serious shortage of sewing thread, which hinders the plan. The Relief Committee is investigating the development of industries, trades to be taught, plants required, staff for management, and funds required to begin. Thus a good deal of helpful preparatory work will be done in anticipation of the arrival of the Red Cross Commission.

A Syrian in New York has received a letter from Jerusalem lately, from a native of Beirut, formerly a student of the Syrian Protestant College, but who managed to escape during the troubles and reached Jerusalem. He writes: "I am surprised today that I am still living to write this letter to my friends and relatives. I am sorry to tell you that your wife died of typhus in April, 1917. About 15,000 died of typhus in Beirut alone. My brother Elias died of the same disease—also many other acquaintances. I wonder if after a year you would be able to find 10,000 men left in Beirut. Hunger, poverty, disease and atrocity of the Turk will hardly leave any men in the city. I am now under the English rule in Jerusalem, and am very happy that I got free."

For War Sufferers in Bible Lands

THE following donations have been received for the destitute in Armenia, Syria and other Bible Lands through the publisher of the "Sabbath School Bode" (Messenger), of Paterson, N. J. The gifts are mostly from the Sunday schools of the Christian Reformed Church of America:

Chr. Ref. Church, Crookston, Minn., $2.50; Cleveland, Ohio, $18; Kalamazoo, Mich., $16.52; Prinsburg, Minn., $75.43; Friend, Hull, Iowa, $1; Pettinga's class, 4th St. Chr. School, Paterson, N. J., $4; Girls 9th and 10th grade, Chr. H. S., Holland, Mich., $15; Chr. Ref. Ch., Eddyville, Iowa, $1.30; Galesburg, Iowa, $11.50; Tracy, Iowa, $11; Elpis, Iowa, $16.15; Lueter, Kan., $60.03; E. Saugatuck, Mich., $7; Classis Pacific, $103.66; Young People's Society, Prinsburg, Minn., $25.50; total, $368.59. Previously remitted to Armenian Committee and acknowledged in the Christian Herald of March 20, $2,766.77; total contributions from the Sabbath School Bode, $3,135.36.

Korean Sunday Schools

THE Koreans are now prepared to work their Sunday school problem in a thorough manner. Much in the way of Bible study has been accomplished during past years. They have had practically the entire congregation in their Bible school, but this fact has prevented intensive work among the children. A missionary puts the matter very directly when he says: "We have had 33 years in Korea now—just one generation. It has been an adult generation. Now comes the generation of children. You know we have always had our church Sunday schools which every one attends, from grandpa down to the babies, but we have not had Sunday schools for the children until recently. Last May we set a man to work to cover the 120 churches of our denomination in this province, and to try to organize children's Sunday schools in every possible church in addition to all we had before. I am not sure of the total that he started, but I think it is over 20. I have over half that many in my own 45 churches, and they are doing well."

Look at Your Teeth In a Week

All Statements Approved by High Dental Authorities

Give Pepsodent a Chance

This is to urge a free one-week test of a new-day dentifrice. Let it prove its own results.

Pepsodent is a scientific dentifrice, based on activated pepsin. Its object is to combat the film, the cause of nearly all tooth troubles.

Able authorities have proved its effects by four years of clinical tests. As a result, Pepsodent is fast supplanting old teeth-cleaning methods. Let a week's use show you why.

All dentists and most people know that brushing teeth in old ways does not save them. Statistics show that tooth troubles have constantly increased.

Teeth brushed twice daily still discolor and decay. Tartar accumulates. Most people over forty suffer pyorrhea.

The trouble is not with the tooth brush. It lies in a film, which the brush alone can't end. Now a way has been found to combat that film, and everyone should know it.

What That Film Does

Your teeth's chief enemy is a slimy film. You can feel it with your tongue. Dentists call it "bacterial plaque."

That film is what discolors—not your teeth. It hardens into tartar. It holds food which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth—the cause of decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea.

So nearly all tooth troubles are due to that film. It gets into crevices, hardens and stays and resists the tooth brush. And it forms a ceaseless danger.

That film is albuminous. So Pepsodent is based on pepsin, the digestant of albumin. The object is to dissolve the film, then to constantly prevent its accumulation.

Until lately, a pepsin tooth paste seemed impracticable. Pepsin must be activated else it is inert. The usual activator is an acid, harmful to the teeth.

But science has found a harmless activating method. Five governments have already granted patents. That method—used in Pepsodent—makes possible this form of film attack. So Pepsodent is fast displacing the old inefficient cleaners.

Send the coupon for a One-Week Tube. Use it like any tooth paste, and watch its effects. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Note how they whiten as the fixed film disappears. The results will not long be in doubt.

After that week, you will not return to old ways, we believe. Cut out the coupon now.

The Greatest Book of the War

"THE FIRST HUNDRED THOUSAND"

Over Half Million Already Sold

By THE JUNIOR SUB
(Ian Hay)

A war book straight from the trenches, and such a one as only a trained novelist could have written. Graphic, absorbing, full of humor, and with bits of superb character drawing that make the men at the front seem like old friends.

The "Junior Sub," who writes this account of the experiences of some of the first hundred thousand of Kitchener's army is Ian Hay Beith, author of those deservedly popular novels, "The Right Stuff," "A Man's Man," "A Safety Match," and "Happy Go Lucky."

Captain Beith, who was born in 1876 and therefore narrowly came within the age limit for military service, enlisted at the first outbreak of hostilities in the summer of 1914, and was made a sub-lieutenant in the Argyll and Sutherland Highlanders. After training throughout the fall and winter at Aldershot, he accompanied his regiment to the front in April, and, as his narrative discloses, immediately saw some very active service and rapidly rose to the rank of captain. In the offensive of September, Captain Beith's division was badly cut up and seriously reduced in numbers. He was transferred to a machine-gun division, and "for some mysterious reason"—as he characteristically puts it in a letter to his publishers—was recommended for the military cross.

The story of "The First Hundred Thousand" was originally contributed in the form of an anonymous narrative to Blackwood's Magazine. Writing to his publishers last May, Captain Beith describes the circumstances under which it was written:

"I write this from the stone floor of an outhouse, where the pig meal is first accumulated and then boiled up at a particularly smelly French farm, which is saying a good deal. It is a most interesting life, and if I come through the present unpleasantness I shall have enough copy to last me twenty years. Meanwhile I am using Blackwood's Magazine as a safety-valve under a pseudonym."

It is these "safety-valve" papers that are here offered to the American public in their completeness—a picture of the great struggle uniquely rich in graphic human detail.

A perfect facsimile of the copy sold at $1.35, of which hundreds of thousands have been sold.

The Measure of a Man

By GRACE LIVINGSTON HILL LUTZ, Author of "The Witness"

CHAPTER VII

JANET dropped the letters in the pocket of her linen skirt and flew back to her post up-stairs, swift and soft as a bird in her going. The sleeper did not awake, and she sat with folded hands and wildly beating heart in the darkened room and tried to think what those letters contained. She dared not read her own lest the rattle of the paper awaken the sleeper, and perhaps arouse her to question. It was exceedingly doubtful whether the doctor would let Mrs. Bruce know of her own letter yet. Janet wondered if hers would give any light on the question. At least now she would be able to communicate with Harley and let him know of his mother's condition.

It seemed hours before the nurse returned and Janet was free to go to her own room and read her letter. She tore open the envelope with trembling fingers. The postmark on both letters was blurred. She could not tell where they had been mailed, and strangely enough there was no address at the top of the letter. It began abruptly:

DEAR JAN: When I went away I didn't know whether I would ever dare to write or see you again. I was so ashamed of the mess mother had made, and so covered with humiliation over the mess I had made of myself, that I wanted to disappear off the face of the earth.

Ever since I came home I had been finding out that I hadn't become the man I had always meant to be at all. Even before mother told me how doubtful you were of my worthiness for your friendship, I felt instinctively that I had disappointed you and it made me very unhappy.

You have always been the greatest girl on earth to me, Jan! There never has been any other! All these years we have been separated I've been waiting for the time to come when I might come home and tell you of my great love for you. When I saw you I knew that I had not half realized how wonderful you were! It made me begin to look myself over and see whether I was worthy of you. I'd never thought about myself that way before, conceited cad that I was! I'd always meant to be worthy of you, of course. It never occurred to me that I was falling short.

But I've come face to face with myself at last, and I know what a rank, rotten, lazy parasite I've been! I tell you, Jan, things looked pretty black to me that night after mother told me what she'd said to you, and what you'd said to her. I didn't blame you! Not an instant! It was just the way you ought to feel! It was the way I felt about myself then. I hated myself and all that I had ever done; and when I realized what my mother had said to you, who are the purest being in all the world, and the most wonderful,—I wanted to go and kill myself, seeing she was my mother, and a woman, and I might not punish her for the insults she had heaped upon you. I seemed crushed under the thought that my mother had done such a thing to you!

At first it seemed that there was nothing, nothing that I could do, and that I could never look you in the face again. Gradually, before morning came, I realized that there was just one thing I could do, and that was to stop living on my mother's bounty, and be no longer bound to live the idle, lazy life, among uncongenial companions of her choosing, that she insisted upon. So long as I was accepting the generous allowance she had given me since I came of age, I could not of course refuse to do as she wished. It has galled me for a long time, and my coming to Springdale this summer was a feeble attempt to throw off the yoke and be a man. But I saw that night how far I had fallen short of the true measure of a man, and I saw there was nothing to do but go away at once and try to see if I could make a man of myself.

It was almost light when I made this decision and I took my hat and slipped out of the house without anybody knowing. I walked down the street past your house, and then I couldn't stand it to leave that way so I vaulted over the hedge and went over to the hammock under the pines where it was all dark. Perhaps you will think me an awful fool, but I lifted up the pillow on your end where you used to sit when we read together, and kissed the dear old couch for good-by. I never came back you would not know. I went and stood under your window in the group of lilac bushes and looked up. I prayed that God would keep you, and make me worthy to come back and tell my love to you some day. Then I struck out across country.

I knew just where I was going. I'd had it in mind some months, ever since our country got in war, in fact; but mother made such a row about it that I weakly gave in, though I knew I was a rotten slacker for doing it. I'd been lying around living on my mother's money when God and my country had been calling me to duty! I'm a man twenty-four years old, and I've been acting like a child! I've been letting other people decide big questions for me when I ought to have been following the voice of my own conscience! I'll admit that you and Mother Gray would make pretty good consciences for any fellow, but I suddenly knew that even if you and she should try to persuade me to give up what I was going to do, that I would have to do it anyway, because an inner voice had spoken and I must follow where it led. Besides, I knew in my heart that you both would think I was doing right.

Jan, I want you to know that I haven't drawn another dollar of my allowance since I left home, and I don't intend to.

I went straight to the recruiting station when I got to the city and signed up. I didn't want to try for any snug job. I wanted to begin at the bottom and see what I had in me. Well, if I can find out anywhere in the world I guess it's here, Jan. I was examined in a few days and sent to camp; and at first it was something awful! There were all sorts! Mostly foreigners, and some of them weren't fit to have around, before they got them sorted out. I saw more of the seamy side of what life can be in the first twenty-four hours in camp than I've seen before in all my twenty-four years, and it's worse than all you read about it, Jan. But I'm glad I came. I'm up against a tough proposition, and that's what I needed. There's that about the life here that's bound to make a man think. One has to be either better or worse for coming. With God's help I mean to be better. There's every chance here to go to the devil if you choose, but I don't choose! I mean to come out of this a man or—not come out! Men talk of this being a Holy War. You don't see much of the 'holy' part in camp, I tell you; but I believe a man can make it a holy war if he will. Already I've felt the longing to try to help some of these poor guys. They're lonesome and homesick and don't know what to do with their idle time; and always before them is the black, uncertain future. Jan, I'm not going to forget God. I'm going to try to help some other fellows find him if I haven't forgotten how. Tell Mother Gray that, please!

We're in the ambulance corps, and we've got a peach of a young captain. He's a medical student, and he certainly is a prince! He tells us he thanks God every day that his work is to help men, and not to kill them. Our work will be right at the front, working from the firing-line to the trenches. I'm glad it's so. I don't want to shirk. We have things better now than at first. There are some dandy fellows in the bunch in our corner of the barracks, a bacteriologist, a theological student, a lot of medical students, two law students and a teacher. We're working hard and trying to keep cheerful; but some times, Jan, when the lights are out at half past ten and we are in our bunks and all is quiet, one thinks of home and it gets almost too much to bear, especially for a fellow who knows he hasn't been all he might have been while he was at home.

But training-camp life is almost over for me. Word has gone forth that we are to sail in a few days now; we are not sure just when. We are to go up to the camp near the city tomorrow, and be there ready for orders. After that it will be only a question of hours when we leave. That is the reason why I am writing, Jan. I want you to know where I am gone, and to ask you to pray for me that I may be a man through whatever is before me. It would be wonderful if I could have had a letter from you before I left, and could have said good-by face to face, but I've thought it all over and decided I have no right to ask that. Besides, it would be terrible to wait and hope and then not get any; and be thinking through it all that perhaps you could not forgive, and overlook what has happened. So I'm not going to send you my address now. It's better so. I deserve it. It's the first step in my own self-discipline.

If I come back I'm coming straight to you, Jan, and lay my great love at your feet and ask you to marry me; for all that I am doing is done for you and God, and I carry your beautiful image in my heart to be my guardian angel.

My darling, good-by, until I can come back a man.
Your unworthy friend,
HARLEY EVERETT BRUCE.

WITH thrilling heart and eyes that brimmed with tears Janet finished her wonderful letter. She read it over again, and then pressed it to her lips and kissed it again and again. Slipping to her knees beside her bed she knelt so with her lips on the letter and silently prayed. She knew now why her soul had been filled with anguish since Harley had gone away. She knew now why she had been so distressed at any evidence that he was not all she had hoped he was. She loved him! And, wonder of wonders, he loved her! Had loved her all the years! And now she saw that there never had been a time when she had not loved Harley Bruce, and that always her soul had been waiting for him. That nothing else but his love could have satisfied.

And over all the joy of her soul there rang a shout of gladness, like a grand sweet song, that Harley was a man! He was worthy, of her deepest love! He had proved it by this step which he had taken! Nothing could now shake that conviction. Separation, War, Peril, even Death might come. She saw their shadows hovering near. She knew that the pain of their approach was only held in abeyance by the sweetness of this first wonder of Harley's love. Yet, come what might, they could never take this from her, that he whom she loved was a man, and had cast everything else aside to answer the call of God; to go to prove himself against the foe of freedom.

By-and-by she heard the gate click and roused to action. There were things to be done, and she must not linger here now. There would be a long time to linger and think by-and-by, not now.

SHE glanced from the window. Her mother and the doctor were coming up the walk. She must ask the doctor about Mrs. Bruce's letter. Quickly bathing her face and smoothing her hair, she hurried down to meet them as they lingered talking in low tones in the hall.

"She will be able to go away in a week or so now, I think," said the doctor. "It is strange we do not hear from the son. But she does not seem to fret much about him."

"No," said Mrs. Grayson, "I don't think they have ever been very close to one another. You know, they have been separated for long periods at a time."

"Yes, I know," said the doctor, "Seems strange, doesn't it? He's a fine fellow. I should think she would be proud of him. But a woman like that is not fit to bring up a boy. I guess you've been more than half mother to Harley."

Janet stepped up to her mother with the letter.

"Mother," she said, "what shall we do about this? Here is a letter from Harley to Mrs. Bruce. It came this afternoon. Shall we give it to her?"

The doctor took it and looked speculatively at the postmark:

"H'm!" he said significantly.

"That's what I thought! That's the Y. M. C. A. envelope. He's enlisted! Well, he's got more pep than I thought he had! Good for him! I guess you'll have to let her have it, Jan. She's out of danger, and it can't do her much harm. She may take it hard at first, but I doubt it. And anyhow, we can't take the responsibility of opening it, she is so near well. You can't tell how soon he may be going over. She'll have to know. Take it up, Jan, and offer to read it to her if she's awake. I'll hover around the door and see how she takes it."

WITH cheeks like roses and eyes like stars Janet went swiftly up to the guest room. She could hear the sick woman's voice in querulous complaint. She was awake. Lightly she stepped inside the door and stood beside the bed. Her voice was very gentle when she spoke.

Across the Seas They Call

Across the seas from every war-torn nation in the Allied cause there comes the call for Red Cross help.

It comes from soldiers who have grimly faced the gleaming bayonet steel and poison gas and screaming shells, and who now lie with parching throats and throbbing wounds.

It comes from soldiers sick with fever, pneumonia, tuberculosis.

It comes from soldiers crippled, mutilated, blinded, who can no longer fight and must be taught and trained for useful occupations.

It comes from the unfed, shivering, helpless prisoners in the German prison camps.

It comes from little children, orphaned, homeless, slowly starving day by day, by tens and tens of thousands, in the hell-blasted, German-conquered districts where Hohenzollern ruthlessness has spread the blackest pall of human desolation the world has ever witnessed.

It comes from mothers in the pillaged zones of war whose hearts and souls have been made numb with horror.

From all these millions of suffering human beings, not only in Belgium and France but also in Serbia and Roumania and Armenia, in Italy and Greece, there comes across the seas the call for help—help that because of the frightful burdens placed upon our Allies can not be given unless it be provided by the American Red Cross.

To you, to every patriotic home, to every loyal heart in all America, an appeal will soon be made for funds to carry on this work, to carry succor to the stricken “over there,” and to stand behind our own brave boys.

And when that appeal is made, every loyal, generous-hearted man and woman and child who breathes the air of freedom in America will be ready—ready to sacrifice petty comforts and luxuries, ready to sacrifice even the necessities of life, in order to have a worthy share in this most merciful of causes.

Every dollar, and ALL of every dollar, contributed to the Red Cross War Funds is spent for WAR RELIEF, and spent under the careful supervision of experienced, capable business men. All administration expense of Red Cross work for other than War purposes (such as the Halifax and Guatemala disasters) are taken care of out of membership dues, and the interest which accrues from the banking of the War Fund has made actually available for War Relief at least one dollar and two cents for every dollar contributed.

"Mrs. Bruce, a letter has come with Harley's handwriting. Would you like me to read it to you, or would you rather wait until you are allowed to read it for yourself?"

Mrs. Bruce caught her breath in the midst of another plaint and seemed to fix her attention from beneath her compressed with the curious habit of the blind.

"You may read it!" she said briefly.

Janet opened it and read, her voice trembling just the slightest as she voiced Harley's words to his mother:

DEAR MOTHER: I know that you will not be pleased with the news that I have for you, and I am very sorry to annoy you: but the time has come when I must do what I think is right. I have enlisted in the Ambulance Corps and am about to be sent to France. We shall be here for a few days yet, probably not more than three or four, and if you wish to send me any word you can do so at the address below. I shall endeavor to do honor to my father's name, and hope you will not have cause to be ashamed of me. YOUR SON,
HARLEY EVERETT BRUCE.

There was silence in the room for a space after Janet had finished reading the letter and folded it with tender trembling fingers. Then the mother's voice spoke from the bandages with querulous contempt:

"Poor fool!"

Janet's lips shut hard in a thin angry line, and the lights in her sweet eyes fairly blazed. To say this of her own son, who was so nobly rising to his country's call! And she had been pitying the mother a moment since that she had merited but this brief note from her only child! Janet hesitated before she spoke. It would not do to argue with a woman who had just escaped from death.

"Mrs. Bruce," she asked gently, "do you want us to send for your son before he sails? They will probably give him a furlough to see his mother when they know how ill you have been."

THERE was a long silence. At last the woman answered:

"No, I believe not. Harley and I never agreed! We shouldn't agree any more now that he has done this absurd thing! I hate uniforms! They make me shudder; they are so gruesome! No, I don't think I should care to see him in one. It is so unnecessary! And besides, I wouldn't want him to see me such a fright all done up like a mummy!"

Janet stood aghast before such a state of mind. She hesitated.

"But, wouldn't you like to send him a message?" she asked gently. There were tears in her eyes. Tears for the motherless son whom she loved.

"Oh, yes!" answered the woman carelessly. "Tell him his allowance will go on just the same, and be put in the bank. When he gets over his romantic escapade and wants to come back it will be there!"

Janet, wordless with indignation, walked quietly from the room. Down stairs she told the doctor and her mother what had occurred.

"H'm!" said the old doctor, putting back a bottle into his case. "I fancy this won't be needed. I rather suspected as much. Didn't do much good for her to be tried by fire! Didn't leave enough pure metal even to silver-plate her poor little soul! I don't know why such women are in the world!"

When the doctor was gone Janet drew her mother into her own room and handed her Harley's letter.

"I've had a letter from Harley, too, mother," she said tensely; "and, mother, I've got to go and bid him goodbye!"

Her mother looked in her eyes understandingly, and with a light of utmost sympathy in her face began to read the letter.

JANET waited, looking out the window, until her mother had finished the last page. Then she turned swiftly and went over to her.

"Mother!" she said earnestly, "I must go!"

Mrs. Grayson looked up through a beautiful mist that had suffused her eyes, and smiled.

"Of course, dear!" she assented at once. "We will start on the early train in the morning. The full address was in Mrs. Bruce's letter, was it not? Then we shall have no trouble in finding him."

Suddenly she stood up, put her arms about the girl and kissed her:

"My darling!" she whispered; "to think joy and sorrow should have come to you together so!"

"It is all joy, mother!" said Janet, lifting her head high.

"That's right, dear! I'm proud of you. Now run down and telephone Aunt Nan and see if she and your uncle can arrange to come over in the morning and stay till our return. Ask Hannah to press out your blue crepe de chine. I noticed it was wrinkled the last time you had it on. And then you'd better pack the suitcase. I'll have all I can to do to get ready to leave the house."

"You dear mother!" exclaimed Janet ecstatically. "You never fail me, do you?" And with a hug and a kiss she was off to prepare for the journey.

Late that evening, when everything was done and no one about to notice her, Janet slipped silently from the house and stole to the hammock underneath the pines. Softly she lifted the pillow at one end and put her lips shyly down on the old canvas cushion. Then she slipped quietly back to her room again with an exalted look upon her face.

The Bible in Our Greatest Port

WHEN it is remembered that the sales of the Bible far exceed those of the "six best sellers," and that its distribution is pushed by all sorts of agencies, from the churches to incorporated societies and private individuals, it seems strange that there should be such a thing as a home without a Bible. In New York City especially many newly arrived immigrants had never seen a Bible until they met the agent of the New York Bible Society at Ellis Island. What is done for these immigrants and for our soldiers who will carry the Bible with them will influence multitudes not only in our country but throughout the world. To perform this work the first New York Bible Society was founded in 1809.

During the war of 1812 this Bible Society performed the same patriotic service in distributing Bibles to the United States troops as is performed today by the society which succeeded it, and which bears the same name. This is attested by the annual report of 1814, in which it is recorded that Bibles were given to "troops at Harlem, at Staten Island and on armed vessels," and were also "sent on board ships for gratuitous distribution among their crews." During the Civil War the society distributed to the soldiers 273,194 copies of the Scriptures.

In the Spanish-American War more than 11,000 Books were distributed to New York troops. In 1916 more than 12,000 Scriptures were given to the men who went from New York to the Mexican border.

In the present war the society has thus far distributed 150,000 volumes to the soldiers, and 300,000 portions are being printed. These are bound in khaki-colored cloth, are lettered on the outside, "Active Service Testament," and contain a message to the soldiers from Colonel Roosevelt and one from General Pershing.

The regular work of the society, under the secretaryship of Rev. George William Carter, has three departments—City, Immigration and Marine. The distribution the past year totals 469,317 volumes. Of this number the City Department distributed to the poor in all languages 433,235; to the immigrants were given 19,857; and to the sailors 16,225. These numbers include Bibles, Testaments and Gospel portions.

The Pictorial Life of Christ

EIGHTY magnificent sculptural illustrations by the famous Italian master-sculptor, Domenico Mastroianni, who has "imbibed the very spirit of the Holy Land." In his scenes, every figure stands out with vivid distinctness and almost startling clearness of detail. The characters, postures, and surroundings are those of Nazareth and Jerusalem. We see the Saviour himself—a commanding figure of royal dignity blended with divine pity, yet withal intensely human—"in all things as we are."

In simple, attractive language, the story of the life of Jesus is told by the Rev. Ira S. Dodd, who has adhered faithfully to the narrative in the Gospels.

Marion Harland's Corner

Concerning Certain Cereals

AS might have been anticipated, the first queries brought to my desk, after the Corner was opened officially, have to do with what one distraught housewife calls a "glut of cereals," consequent upon the "hold up" in wheaten flour. A woman, whose work among the poor and in settlement-houses has won for her a national reputation, thus stated the case in a personal interview:

The cupboard shelves of these poor souls literally groan under the weight of packages of what one described to me as "dry stuffs." They must buy with every pound of flour one of rice, barley, oatmeal or cornmeal. Most of them do not know how to cook these properly, and look upon them as hardly better than rubbish. Now, every educated person knows that they are highly nutritious, and that they may be made palatable in skilful hands. You will be doing hundreds of women a real kindness by telling them of different ways of preparing these "dry stuffs," which will make them acceptable at family meals. Why, nine-tenths of them do not know how to boil rice properly! They serve it up as a sort of grayish paste, unpleasant alike to the eye and taste. One told me that she "thought rice was only fit for sick folks and babies, and poor stuff at that." Can you help them to clear their shelves and nourish their families?

Fellow housewives who know the value of rice as a vegetable and a sweet; how relishful are combinations of this our most useful cereal, with meat, tomatoes, cheese, etc., will not find fault with me for devoting a share of our allotted space today to answering our settlement worker's request. She speaks within bounds in saying that an immense percentage of cooks do not know how to boil rice. Who of us has not shuddered away from the gluey paste she describes? Will readers bear with me while I tell, as briefly as is compatible with the importance of the case, of the one and only right way of cooking rice plain as a breakfast cereal, or a toothsome vegetable to accompany a meat course at dinner?

Plain Boiled Rice

Bring a quart and a pint of water, slightly salted, to a fast boil and drop into it half a cupful of raw rice already picked over, washed and drained. Boil hard for twenty minutes before taking out a grain and biting it to make sure it is tender. If it be soft, drain off every drop of water and set the pot, uncovered, at the back of the range for two minutes to dry off; then turn out carefully into a heated vegetable dish. No spoon should touch the rice while in cooking. Every grain should be whole and separate from the rest. Shake the saucepan up and down three times while the rice is boiling, to loosen the grains from the side of the vessel. Eat hot, seasoning with salt and pepper. It is delicious eaten with cream for breakfast, or with a simple custard as a plain dessert and with gravy in the meat course.

Take pains to prepare rice in this way once, and you will never speak slightly of it again.

Rice and Cheese Pudding

This is a good substitute for meat on days when flesh foods are forbidden.

Boil a cupful of rice as directed in last recipe, using a quart and a pint of boiling salted water, then proceeding as with the plainer dish. Drain well, and stir into it with a fork, so as not to break the grains, a tablespoonful of butter (or a substitute for butter), the yolk of one egg beaten into six tablespoonfuls of milk, and three tablespoonfuls of grated cheese. Turn into a well-greased mold and set in a bakepan of hot water to cook, covered closely for an hour. Then uncover, and brown lightly. Dip the mold into cold water to loosen the contents, and turn out upon a hot dish. It is particularly nice if served with a rich tomato sauce, poured like gravy upon each portion after cutting the pudding into slices.

This is a dish which every "plain cook" flatters herself that she can make. It is not ten years since the mistress of one household, where "good living" was established a half-century back, learned of a refining touch that lends daintiness to a homely sweet.

Eggless Rice Pudding as a Dessert

Wash, pick over and drain a scant cupful of raw rice, and turn into a rather deep pudding dish. Scatter over it four tablespoonfuls of sugar and a salt-spoonful of salt, together with one of mixed ground spices. Lastly, pour over all a quart and a cupful of sweet milk, and set in a shallow pan of cold water. Cover the pudding and put into the oven. See to it that the water in outer pan does not boil away. At the end of half-an-hour, peep at the pudding, and should it be hot, stir up from the bottom with half-a-dozen strokes of the big spoon. Repeat this at the end of an hour, and again fifteen minutes before the pudding is fully done. Serve hot or cold, as you may prefer. If cold, set on the ice until needed.

The triple stirring from the bottom of the dish adds far more to the excellence of the dish than one might suppose.

The "glut of cereals" may be further abated by making up your mind from the first that you will use them, and to advantage. For—and this should lead the resolutions in force—you are serving your country and your fellow-creatures by doing this. Every American woman who is not incorrigibly stupid and wilfully "set" in her ignorance, knows by now that each barrel of wheaten flour we can save in this country goes overseas to feed the men who are fighting for our rights, our liberty and our lives. Cornmeal does not bear transportation so well, and there are other reasons why the armies must have wheaten flour. Says the Best of Books: "If the iron be blunt a man must lay to it more strength." If your stock of provisions has been curtailed in quantity and deteriorated in quality, you must bring culinary skill to bear upon the duty of feeding your family. Study what to do with "left-overs," after resigning yourself to the "left-outs."

Make it a point of honor no less than of duty, to abstain from the use of whatever you can do without, and to bring conscience and ingenuity to bear upon what is hardly less obligatory upon conscience—to reconcile John and the children to what you have done.

We hope to give you many illustrations of this new line of duty. For the present we content ourselves with one.

In planning meals for today, you have come upon a cupful of boiled rice left over from yesterday and, of course, carefully set aside in the refrigerator. You had arranged to have creamed chipped beef for supper—or by whatever name you dignify the heaviest meal of the day. With baked potatoes and a cup of coffee, and for dessert, canned peaches, husband and boys must be satisfied. With brown bread and butter as a filler, of course. You would like to surprise them by tickling their appetites with something really "nice."

Try this recipe, warranted good by those who have brought it into active use once and again, when confronted by the cold boiled cereal:

Rice and Cornmeal Muffins

Half-cupful of cold boiled rice (or hominy); half-cup of cornmeal; three-quarters of a cup of milk; half tablespoonful of shortening; one egg; one teaspoonful of baking-powder; a pinch of salt, and a level teaspoonful of fine sugar.

Beat the melted shortening into the rice with a fork; next stir in the milk; add the meal sifted twice with the salt, the sugar and baking-powder. Last of all, add the egg whipped very light. Bake in greased muffin-tins and eat while hot. They are very good, eaten with syrup or honey.

The "more strength" comes in here, as in all kinds of cookery, in strict observance of rules. The egg must be whipped very light; the mixing of all the ingredients must be thorough. Don't fall into the fatal blunder of tossing together second-best materials in a slap-dash, slovenly way because they are cheap.

Puffed Rice Dishes for Lilac Time

About lilac time the demand for Puffed Rice reaches zenith. Don't miss it for a day.

Every dish of berries calls for these crisp, flaky bubbles. Without them it's like shortcake minus crust.

Mix With Berries

Every bowl of milk, at noon or night, needs these airy, toasted globules. Nothing else has half of their delights.

Just Grain Puffs—Nothing Added

Puffed Grains are so savory, so enticing, that they hardly seem like grain foods. But they are.

Puffed Rice is simply whole rice steam-exploded—puffed to eight times normal size. Its flavor is due to a fearful heat—its flimsiness to puffing.

It means a whole-grain food, easily digestible. Every food cell is exploded.

No riceless meals or riceless days are called for. So Puffed Rice—also Corn Puffs—can be daily delights.

Let children and grown-ups enjoy them to the full. It's the ideal form of grain food and the form which they prefer.

In summer-time serve them in abundance.

Nut-Like Uses

Crisp and lightly butter for eating between meals—like confections. Some do this, also, before adding sugar and cream. It makes a nut-like dish.

Garnish ice cream with Puffed Grains. Use them in candy making. They taste like bubbled nut meats.

Use them as wafers in soups.

They are more than breakfast dainties — more than milk-dish crispies. Enjoy all their delights.

Miserable Corns— How to end them

Touchy corns make thousands suffer—on pleasure trips—in business—at home—everywhere.

Until they once try Blue-jay. Then they are corn-free forever.

Painful corns are utterly needless. Science has brought relief. The medicated spot of wax on a Blue-jay Plaster stops pain instantly.

Then in 48 hours the corn painlessly comes out.

Harsh liquids are dangerous and messy. Paring may bring infection.

No corn can resist Blue-jay. Yet this way is most gentle.

The chemist of a concern known the world over for its surgical dressings discovered Blue-jay. He studied corns for 25 years.

So with Science's way at your command, no touchy corn need ever bother you again.

Jesus Exercising Kingly Authority

International Sunday School Lesson for May 19

Mark 11:1-33

Christ the Lord of Our Lives

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph.D.

THE Triumphal Entry is a scene dear to Christian hearts because for once at least the Christ we have learned to love was welcomed and honored. For one short afternoon he was the center of an enthusiasm that his character and services had fully justified. Just for once he allowed the homage due a king to be paid to him. He not only permitted but actually encouraged the proclamation of his Messiahship.

He encourages the formation of the little procession with its symbolic fulfillment of Zechariah's prediction of the lowly and peaceful king. He allows the cheering Galileans to escort him with the honors reserved for royalty. He declares his Messiahship openly—but he still holds to its purely spiritual meaning. He knows himself able to withstand any attempt to give it political and national meaning. He sees clearly that in this way he can leave the strongest possible impression of the nature of his Kingdom.

The People Who Watched the King

A close study of the Gospels convinces us that it was chiefly "the multitude of the disciples" who made up the triumphal procession. With them were other pilgrims from Galilee going up to the feast. The Orient loves pageantry and excitement, and we read that "all the city was stirred." Few of the people of Jerusalem knew much about him. But now they heard, "This is Jesus, the prophet of Nazareth." The angry priests and scribes knew well who it was, and the present enthusiasm was just the sort of thing they had feared. They made known their objections, they announced their disapproval.

All this reminds us that "this thing was not done in a corner." The incidents of Palm Sunday were productive of much publicity and furnished the basis for Peter's Pentecost appeal later. It was necessary for all the people to be brought face to face with the Son of Man. The Gospel with all its messages of universal importance needed then, and needs still, to be brought out and advertised before the world.

The Searching Glance of the Christ

There seems to have been something piercing and unforgettable in the Master's look. On several pages of the Gospel we see its potency, and its effects are recorded. Before that glance the temple police flinched and fell back. At a look from Jesus' eyes Peter remembered his professions of loyalty and wept bitterly. With what heavenly compassion he viewed the needy multitudes. Here we read that he entered the city and the temple and "looked around about upon all things." We wonder what things they were that impressed him most.

What would he most carefully notice with approval or disapproval in our cities? What would he think of the vile drinking-places that still disfigure most of them? We can but wonder how he would view our factories and stores, our stock-exchanges and our courts. Surely it is a proper and worthy study for Christian men and women to seek to estimate from Christ's point of view our complex centers of population. The City Mission Society, the Welfare League, and all the other agencies of municipal well-being are rightly within the view of the Church, whose Master's eyes searched Jerusalem.

And what of our temples too? For he seems to have sought eagerly in the Church of his day to find, if he could, some adequate conception of her task, some evidence of her power in the doing of her appointed work. He seems to have been greatly disappointed then. We wonder if he is disappointed still. Ask yourself, ask your class of boys and girls, men and women, to look around about on all things in your church and see what Jesus would censure or commend. What are we doing for God and for man?

The Barren Fig Tree

THE tree without fruit came under that searching glance the very next day. It was in full leaf, the fig-tree's sign of fruitage, but in spite of its outward show it had produced nothing. To Jesus it was the veritable emblem of that temple he had visited and of that religious system with which he had already clashed. So he speaks before his friends of the curse of God upon hypocrisy and false pretense by dooming the tree to continued fruitlessness. It is an acted parable. Its application to the priesthood was patent to them all.

What a sad and dreadful emblem for a church! A barren fig-tree! For Jesus applied to institutions as well as to individuals the pragmatic test: "By their fruits ye shall know them." The test of a church is the kind of people it is producing. Our Christian churches are barren fig-trees unless they are increasing the sum of human goodness in the world. Their proper fruits are Christ-like men and women, who shall be as lights in the world. If they produce insincere or unhelpful people they have failed. If they produce nothing, have no effect whatever on the masses, they have more than failed. The question has been raised, What think ye?

It seems to us that with all their shortcomings the churches have not failed, because they have sent forth into the world men of the missionary spirit, they have furnished the inspiration of manifold good works, they furnish at this crisis the men and women for the Red Cross, the Young Men's Christian Association and all the multitude of unselfish organized agencies of helpfulness to a needy and distressed generation. Without the Church, would not the dark hour of international strife and hatred be blacker and more hopeless than now?

Christ the Reformer

In the cleansing of the temple we see Christ as the typical reformer, remedying abuses in the conduct of the house of God. He was very angry to see the courts open to money-making and questionable practices which should have been the place of a pure worship, free from any taint of selfishness, and a real invitation to the seeking souls of men. All nations were to be welcome here for contact with the Divine Spirit. Instead was an atmosphere of the marketplace, that put each visitor on his guard against petty exactions. No wonder he was indignant. He felt as his follower, Luther, felt fifteen centuries later, when the priests made the Christian doctrine of forgiveness a source of revenue to a corrupt hierarchy. Each saw the sin of trafficking in holy things, in making merchandise of the hunger of souls for peace with God. Surely there can be nothing more offensive to God than the commercializing of religion.

Such was the majesty of His presence, or the guilt of his adversaries, that they fled before him. The multitudes must have been profoundly impressed. Then it was that the chief priests sought how they might destroy him. Their vested interests were at stake, their profits from this wretched business were menaced. They had only murmured at his scathing indictments so long as they were confined to speeches. When they saw he really intended to do something they plotted to kill him.

The men of Christ's own heart, who have cried out against religious tyranny, who have declared plainly against priestcraft, against formalism, have ever met with the same venomous hatred, the same determination to put them to death. But whenever conditions have degenerated into anything resembling what Christ then saw, there have not been wanting the reformers, the lovers of truth and right, to dare to challenge the false leaders and to speak fearlessly for God. We need them still, these Christians who cannot be silent where little children are abused, where religion is travestied, or where the doctrine that might makes right is preached once more.

God gave us angry men in every age. Men with indignant hearts at sight of wrong.

Christ's Authority

So at length these chief priests and scribes venture to challenge him in the very temple courts and ask by what right, by what authority he has done these things. Like all externalists, they were always looking for credentials. Besides he seemed so confident, that they were a bit afraid that he might have some authorization unknown to them. "Who gave thee this authority?"

Now, Jesus well knew how they would scoff at any assertion of direct authority from the Almighty. They did not recognize the authority of truth and right. What they recognized was the laying on of hands. The issuance of royal edicts, and the declarations of earthly courts. So Jesus did not answer directly but asked them what they thought of the baptism of John—whether it was divinely authorized or was it human arrogance and folly on his part. Of course, he was prepared to say that if they acknowledged John, his own authority was from the same unseen and spiritual source. But they had refused to believe John. On the other hand, they were afraid to deny John's ministry, because the people held him to be a prophet. So they pretended that they did not know. Jesus replied that since they did not know how to decide, he certainly could not submit his authority to their incompetent tribunal. "Neither tell I you." They had confessed their inability to deal with the question.

O Lord and Master of us all,
Whate'er our name or sign;
We own thy sway, we hear thy call,
We test our lives by thine.

Like the pilgrims on the Jerusalem road, we have acclaimed Jesus as our Lord, the fulfilment of God's promises to our fathers, the ideal of our souls. We acknowledge his divine authority, the authority of perfect righteousness and purity. Shall we not see to it, now, that we place all that we have and all that we are at his disposal? Shall we make ready the temple for his coming, seeing to it that at least his Church is holy and void of offense in his sight? Shall we not take our message out into the city, the nation and the world, that he who is Lord of our lives may speedily become Lord of all lives, that the kingdoms of this world may become the Kingdom of our God and of his Christ?

How a Class of Sixteen-Year-Olds Succeeded

IN the Bushwick Avenue Central M. E. Sunday School of Brooklyn, the sixteen-year-old scholars are given special attention. Two large groups are made of these, one of boys and one of girls, in the last year of the Intermediate Departments. They are called the "Advanced Inter M. Class."

The teacher of the class, Miss Maybelle Bosse is a comparatively young woman. She has one associate, Miss Ethel Cochrane, and in the class are forty girls of that impulsive, altruistic age when the dangers are so great and the possibilities just as great.

To promote good attendance the class was divided for a time into two sides—the Reds and the Blues—each side selecting a Captain, the idea being to see which side for, say six months, should have the best attendance record, the winning side to be entertained in some manner. Everyone takes part in the lessons. Instead of using the graded lesson, the class has been making a general study of the New Testament. They started with the Book of Matthew, taking sometimes one, sometimes two, sometimes three chapters a week. They learned to know in what Chapter to look for the Beatitudes, Lord's Prayer, Baptism of Christ, Birth of Christ, Temptations, etc., and after completing the twenty-eight Chapters, a test was given on the following questions; covering also a few outside items.

1. Quote five verses from the Book of Matthew.
2. (a) Name the twelve disciples.
(b) In what Chapter are these found?
3. (a) How many books in the Bible?
How many books in the Old Testament?
How many books in the New Testament?
4. (a) How many Chapters in the Book of Matthew?
(b) Name the books of the New Testament.
- (b) Quote key verse of Matthew and tell where found.
5. Quote the Apostles' Creed.
6. Where are the Ten Commandments found in the Old Testament?
7. (a) How many times did Satan tempt Christ?
(b) In what Chapter is this found?
(c) Name the temptations.
8. In what Chapter does the Lord's Prayer appear?
9. Quote the Beatitudes in order. Tell where found.
10. What are the last two verses in the Book of Matthew?

On the first Sunday of the year, the teacher asked the girls to make two New Year resolutions. One of them was to bow the head every time a prayer was announced, and to keep it bowed and to follow the prayer, not simply in Sunday school, but everywhere. And now on Sunday, when the Superintendent mentions the prayer, every head goes down immediately.

Then a resolution was made to be real "Pollyannas" this year—to try to find something to be glad about, no matter what happened. And later this class took as their name "The Pollyannas," and trying to live up to it in every sense of the word. The class is organized and meets monthly. Absentees are visited by the Membership Committee and the Mercy and Help Committee has visited the sick and distributed flowers. They also have a "Book a Month Club," in charge of a class librarian. Each girl brought a book at the start, and at the monthly meeting, books are exchanged. At the end, the books will be returned to their owners.

The new plans include a "Mothers' Social," a plan to get the mothers all acquainted; a "Sunshine Tea," and the making of homemade candy for an Easter Sale to provide funds for the department. A Bible Alphabetical Verse Contest has been started, the first Sunday being a verse beginning with the letter A, and going on Sunday by Sunday until W is reached.

Young people do not drop out of the Sunday school under such a program. They are held so well that two hundred are annually added to the membership of this Church from the Sunday school.

Among the Workers

THE Committee of Reference and Counsel, representing the Foreign Missions Conference of North America, has invited Mr. E. P. Turner to act as its secretary. This arrangement does not alter Mr. Turner's relation to the Student Volunteer Movement, of which he is general secretary.

DID any one ever hear of a poor farm or a correctional farm that practically paid its way? Of course they exist, but nearly always the farming seems a sort of side issue that is almost never profitable, and the inmates, left largely to their own devices, seem to rust into fixed positions from which it is difficult if not impossible to dislodge them. The Kansas City Municipal Farm, for misdeameants, is one of the most interesting exceptions to the rule of non-profitable correctional farms. With an average population of 300 last year, it cost the public only $2 per inmate to operate. There are 201 acres, from which last year $12,000 worth of products were harvested.

THE National Conference of Social Work meets in Kansas City, Mo., under the presidency of Robert A. Woods, head of South End House, Boston, May 15-23. Prominent social workers will take up such subjects as the problem of Society in Its Relation to Children, Delinquency and Correction, Health, Public Agencies and Institutions, The Family, Industrial and Economic Problems, The Local Community, Mental Hygiene (with a paper on War Neuroses from Shell Shock after the War), Organization of Social Forces, Social Problems of the War and Reconstruction. The Conference sermon this year will be in the nature of a symposium on the Relation of the Church to Social Work, and the speakers will be representatives of the Protestant, Catholic and Jewish faiths. William T. Cross, 315 Plymouth Court, Chicago, is the secretary of the Conference.

Kelsey Health Heat

Its Effect on Church Coal Bills

IF we could come before your Committee and sit down to an unhurried talk on the Kelsey Health Heat, and what it is doing in reducing coal bills, you would only be doing what is due your church.

Due your church, because any money spent not only needlessly, but uselessly, is not only bad business, but worse stewardship.

The fact that carefully kept church records of coal consumption prove that Kelseys pay for themselves in five years by the coal they save, should arouse you to action.

One thing you could do right now, is to send for some economy facts on Church Heating, and a request for our Saving Sense Booklet.

The War Side of the Red Cross

THE Military Affairs Department of the American Red Cross had, up to January 1, served in its canteens at its front 700,000 rations, and was then giving, at 15 cents, hearty hot meals to 20,000 men each day. It controls three and subsidizes ten metropolitan canteens, at which 2,983,277 meals were served to soldiers in the last four months of 1917. It is expected that the work will be doubled in the next six months.

The Medical Division of the Department has three hospitals. One at Neuilly has between 500 and 600 beds, a dental clinic, an ambulance system which serves all the hospitals in Paris, and a train which runs to the front and brings back the wounded, and which is equipped with hospital cars for emergency operations. A second hospital, with 300 beds, contains a research laboratory, where are made valuable records for the benefit of the medical profession. Hospital No. 3 was formerly known as the Reid Hospital and was given to the Red Cross by Mrs. Whitelaw Reid, who now pays practically all the expense. It is a small hospital of eighty beds, and is used for the U. S. Army officers and Red Cross personnel. The department also assists five other hospitals in other cities.

A dispensary service has been created by the Red Cross at Neufchateau, which ministers to the French civil population, who would otherwise be left without medical attention, as the French doctors are mostly in the army. There are more than forty dispensaries in this system, which are served by ambulance routes.

Miss Ruth Morgan has been active in the development of diet kitchens, which have been established at various points in France. These kitchens furnish delicacies not found on the hospital bill of fare, but necessary in the feeding of patients needing a special kind of food.

Men of varied experience in army medical and surgical practice have given their services to the Red Cross in the organization of a Research Society, which at regular meetings discusses such subjects as trench fever, shell shock, etc. The Red Cross has also established a research laboratory at its Military Hospital in Evreux. In the natural course of its work this service must collect data of great scientific importance.

A Monthly Bulletin publishing digests of the most important French and English articles is widely circulated among the army doctors. Various medical manuals are also published. Two central medical libraries are planned besides circulating libraries for doctors in the field.

The Nursing Service supplies nurses to the Red Cross hospitals. The Surgical Dressings Service keeps the hospitals supplied with about 183,870 dressings a week.

Rest stations have been established along the line of communication of the American army in France, at which soldiers will be supplied with comfortable places to rest between trains, write letters, read, or eat. This is considered not only the soldiers' due, but a powerful means in sustaining their morale. A canteen for the Air Service is serving 1,280 men a day with meals. One of the small services which alleviate army life was the donation of a printing press to the aviation camp for the printing of the weekly paper, the Plane News.

One important part of the work of the Red Cross is the Recreation and Welfare Service, which supplies the soldiers in the hospitals with games, books, and other means of recreation. To each base hospital were sent every month 300 books, 400 magazines and 2,500 newspapers, besides a proportionate amount to the camp hospitals. One phonograph is sent to each ward of a base hospital, and one moving picture machine to each hospital, besides similar supplies to the huts of the Y. M. C. A. Truck gardens have been established for the hospitals, in which the convalescents can be employed and entertained.

The Red Cross has in the last four months preceding to date of the report supplied 454 legs, arms and armchairs to French cripples.

A Casualty Information Service undertakes to obtain facts about the men killed, missing and captured, which will be sent to the men's relatives.

On Christmas Santa Claus brought 105,551 pairs of socks full of shoe-laces and candy to American soldiers, and 12,000 comfort kits, 144,000 mirrors and 5,000 handkerchiefs were distributed among the French soldiers. At Chalons two Christmas trees were set up, soldiers sang and recited, the women workers sang the Star-Spangled Banner, and the poilus lifted their hats and cheered, while the American boys showed clearly their appreciation of this bit of America brought to them in a foreign land.

The Making of the Big Guns

is more than 70,000 foot tons; that is, it is strong enough to raise a weight of 70,000 tons to a height of one foot in one second. It will carry the shells a distance of more than twelve miles at one shot, and it will make them go through more than two feet of solid nickel or Harveyized steel.

The projectiles used by the navy are different from those of the army. They have to be constructed so they will not break upon striking. They are so hard and so tough that they will pass through heavy steel plates which form the armor of a battleship and explode inside, thus doing great damage, wrecking the machinery or disabling the boiler. They may break the propeller or set the magazine of munitions on fire. Such projectiles must be of the finest of steel and the alloys which form their points are so hard that no tool will cut them. A point contains a large amount of carbon, and its hardness is somewhat like that of the diamond, which will cut almost anything. The diamond is crystallized carbon.

The gun and the shells must be made so that they fit to a wonderful degree of accuracy. The shell for the 14-inch gun is exactly fourteen inches in diameter. It is so formed that, when it goes forth, it whirls around with its point always in the direct line of its course. This whirling motion is made by the rifling of the gun and the way the shell fits into it. This is of such a nature that the greatest of mechanical skill is required to make both guns and shells. In many respects both may be said to be built like a watch.

The powder used in firing the guns is made from a by-product of coal tar which under ordinary conditions is perfectly harmless. You can light it and it will burn with a flame or if left out in the open it may be struck with a hammer. But if it is confined in the gun and detonated it bursts forth with a force greater than dynamite, and this force gradually increases until it gives the enormous power which I have described.

Scrapbooks

ONE work done by the Daughters of the American Revolution is making scrapbooks for the Army and Navy. These books are greatly appreciated by the jackies, who put them in their jumper jackets, and also by the men in contagious wards of the hospitals at our cantonments.

The book consists of three or four sheets of light-colored manila paper, twice the size of an ordinary magazine. The pages are folded in the middle. On the outside cover and each inside page is a bright-colored picture, the pictures on the inside being surrounded by jokes cut from newspapers. The jokes on each page pertain to the picture on that page. "This feature brings the family together in war work and has a value from this viewpoint. The children cut the pictures, the old people watch for clean, fine jokes in the paper and together the family make the scrapbooks around the fireside during the family hour," says Mrs. William H. Wait, of Michigan.

Adventures in Neighboring dime. The barrel was placed at an angle of 45 degrees and a hole cut in the bottom to get the biscuits out.

The Fair offered fun to everyone, old and young; and it was a great success. It netted our Red Cross chapter two hundred and eighty-six dollars.
ELIZABETH B. CORTNER.

The jollity of that Red Cross Fair appeals to me, fellow adventurers; and I wish some of you would try it out this month. Let us not forget that another Red Cross "money drive" is under way, and that every penny we can spare should find its way into the coffers of that great world-wide "organization of mercy," without which this war-torn world of ours would be even a little sadder than it is. Do give, give, give, dear neighbors, knowing that every penny will be put to the very best use, and that your ten dollars may save the life of your own wounded son or brother or friend.

Twelve months of the year, give service; the work of your busy fingers. But this month—the month of May—give also of your money. The Red Cross needs money; now;—every nickel that we (the American people) can do without.

MEANTIME, however, we must not neglect our own local chapter; but must continually devise means to keep it supplied with the necessary funds. For that, the following is a splendid suggestion:

A Melting-Pot for War Service

Since the beginning of the war, our little club has been working hard and fast for our soldiers and sailors. Last week I saw that our funds were getting rather low, and thought maybe we might make a little money by having a "melting-pot."

We duly advertised the fact that we would like contributions of any old pieces of gold or silver and jewelry, even though broken, and that on a certain evening there would be a "melting-pot" awaiting any contributions our friends could give us.

I was fortunate in securing some talented friends, to brighten up our evening with songs, recitations and so on; while the pot we secured was in itself a curiosity, being nearly two hundred years old, and a three-legged, black pot at that!

We placed the pot on a table in a conspicuous place, tying on the handle a big bow of our club colors. Then we awaited results. Our friends came in and deposited all sorts of old gold and silver articles: old-fashioned brooches, bracelets, earrings, snuff-boxes, gold pens, broken spoons, forks, necklaces, umbrella tops, pocketbook clasps, button hooks, shoe-horns, rings, gold caps from teeth! A greater conglomeration I never beheld! But the best part of it all was that the articles were good, and could be sold for the much-desired coin.

I sold this old gold and silver to a friend of mine, who is a jeweler, for about $85, with which I was able to go to the Patriotic Yarn Association and buy a great quantity of excellent wool. This the girls of the club are now knitting into the socks, wristlets, sweaters and other garments so sorely needed by our soldiers and sailors. MARTHA J. JOHNSTON.

AND here, dear adventurers, is a commentary on Red Cross work so inspiring that I think every community should read it:

Red Cross Work Betters a Community

The Red Cross work for "our boys" has done more to draw this little town together than anything else could ever have done.

Ours is a prairie town, four years old, situated in northwestern North Dakota, forty miles from a town of any size. All denominations and many foreign nationalities are represented here; and business, as well as personal, rivalries have always made the town difficult to live in, as there never was any neighborhood spirit here.

Now, however, everything is very different; and we owe it all to our Red Cross sewing and knitting. Now we meet one afternoon every week for sewing, and one evening for knitting, each time in a different home—the hostess serving a lunch of one kind of cookie and one cupful of coffee. At these meetings the very friendliest spirit is shown: all differences about religion, business and so on being laid aside. The knitting needles fly, the sewing goes forward quickly; and often our women say: "It seems so good to have a reason for getting out and meeting with folks."

MRS. A. H. ROGERS.

So much for the Red Cross workers. Besides, there are thousands of busy workers along other lines. There are women working at farm labor; girls making scrap-books for convalescent soldiers; college students sending money and other aid to their representatives "over there"; great-hearted neighbors comforting bereaved or lonely "parents of soldier boys"; children writing letters to men in khaki; women serving in "hostess houses" at the big camps; and so on. The avenues are endless. Here, for instance, is a pretty custom being followed by one community:

Farewells to Departing Soldiers

As a little token of affection and esteem for the young men of our community who have been called into military service, the young people here give a "farewell surprise party" to every group that departs. A jolly good time together is the idea, and this is always had accompanied by plenty of "Hooverized" refreshments. The parents of the boys seem greatly touched and pleased; and this little farewell party makes the boys themselves feel that their loyal service is truly appreciated. To the young men who are sacrificing and risking so much for all of us at home, we certainly owe as many good times as we can provide. And I know that the memory of these good times has helped many a soldier from our community to face lonely or discouraging hours "over there."
JANIE L. WILKIN.

This brings us, dear neighbors, to the end of today's visit; and again our Forum will have to be omitted. Next time, however, it shall appear and be packed with good things. For our next meeting is going to be concerned chiefly with the problems of rural mothers, teachers and little folks; for which some of you have sent me beautiful material.

Just a word: before I bid you good-speed—two Southern communities and one Western one are founding local community clubs; branches of the American Community Club. About these we shall hear more later. In the meanwhile, dear Adventurers, may He be with you and give you the light to see the needs of your neighborhood and the wisdom and strength to supply them!

Rural Church Reading Clubs

ONE of the best agencies for community social service is the Rural Church Reading Club. Not only does it render immediate service in securing intellectual development and social intercourse among the persons composing the club, but it also lays the foundation for future social service in other lines of community activities.

The Rural Church Reading Club is a community project, and no person is better fit to organize and guide its destiny than a minister of a community church. This is one of the social functions that the community has a right to expect of him.

As its name denotes, the Rural Church Reading Club is an association of individuals in a country district or rural town for the purpose of pursuing a definite course of reading. Let it be emphasized that there should be a definite aim in planning a reading course. There are many proper aims, but the wise rural leader will select one that shall lend to both personal and community improvement. The two purposes are not inimical, but complementary.

The meetings of the club should not be too infrequent. Weekly or bi-weekly meetings have been found acceptable. Meetings should begin promptly on time and should also terminate at a given hour. In the open country the calendar should be consulted and meetings arranged in the light of the moon. Evening meetings will invariably be found the most popular.

The programs of the various evenings may be varied in a great number of ways which any committee with members of originality and reading may devise. Written reports, round-table discussions, debates, reading in turn with occasional comments, teacher and class plan, dramatization of occasional subject-matter by groups of the clubs, and an occasional address by a specialist from some college—these are a few of the many ways to secure variety and to keep the club in a healthy condition. The program for the year may be printed and a sub-topic of the general topic may be assigned to each meeting.

which lay on the crest of the ridge overlooking the Somme. At Hangard, the Germans succeeded in entering the eastern outskirts of the village on the 24th, taking it, on the day following, losing it again, and retaking it, although they were unable to advance beyond the town, the French holding securely all of the ground immediately around it. The British, on April 25, counter-attacked at Villers-Bretonneux, supported by tanks. The Germans also were using tanks in attempting to increase their gains.

The British retook the village, the woods north and south of it and drove the Germans back almost to the position from which they had started, taking prisoner some 600 Germans.

On the front around Mont Kemmel, the Germans were able to make progress on the 25th. The fighting was furious from Wytsehaete to Bailloul, being especially severe at Dranoutre, at Kemmel, half a mile northeast of the summit, and at Vierstraat, a mile and a half north-east of Kemmel. Of this sector General Haig reported at the end of the day that the British and French had been "compelled to withdraw from the positions they held this morning, but the fight is still going on."

The French front in the neighborhood of Hangard was referred to in the Paris reports as Franco-American, indicating that American troops were fighting with the French against the enemy at this point. Dispatches of April 25 said that 128 wounded Americans had been sent back from the fighting front to the base hospitals.

Members of the Military Affairs Committee of the House were quoted, on April 28, as saying that plans were forming for the rushing of 3,000,000 men to France. Andre Tardieu, French High Commissioner to the United States stated at a Liberty Loan meeting in New York, on April 28, that France was ready with artillery to equip 540,000 American troops and that those sent over in excess of that number would be backed by American made guns. He also gave the French losses in the war as 2,600,000 out of 9,000,000 mobilized of whom 1,300,000 have been killed. Germany's losses in killed are estimated in excess of 3,000,000.

FRIDAY April 26, Liberty day in America, was Allied day on the Somme and perhaps, too, on the Flanders front, although Germany claimed the decision by taking the rugged height, Mont Kemmel, about which her men had surged for more than a week in futile attacks. On Thursday and Friday 120,000 troops, nine divisions, were thrown into the fighting between Bailloul and Wytsehaete. At first repulsed, the enemy at last pressed through the Allied lines north of Mont Kemmel and finally swung southward and surrounded the height. A French regiment defending the mountain repelled all frontal assaults and fought to the death against the overwhelming waves of the enemy. With the height of Kemmel the Germans took the villages of Dranoutre and Kemmel. Friday morning the British counter-attacked and made some progress which they lost again later in the day. The battle was fought in a fog which, as always, favored the side making the attack. The German artillery kept the battleground and the back areas under a wild and indiscriminate fury of fire in an attempt to prevent reinforcement of the battered troops whose gallant resistance he found so difficult to overcome, but the Allied line was strengthened nevertheless holding firm just west of Mont Kemmel at and between the villages of La Clytte and Scherpenberg.

The enemy made progress on both sides of the canal from Comines to Ypres, taking St. Eloi.

South of the Somme the French attacking from Villers-Bretonneux to Hangard retook the major portions of the positions lost to the enemy earlier in the week. They penetrated the woods of Hangard and at the end of the day held firmly the western portion of Hangard itself, which changed hands several times during the day.

A German raid near Rogneville, on the sector of the front in Lorraine adjoining the American trenches, was completely repulsed on the 26th, and the Allied positions into which the enemy had penetrated were all retaken.

On Saturday and Sunday, April 27 and 28, the fighting on the western front was reduced to artillery exchanges and occasional raids, except in the neighborhood of Ypres where the Germans made desperate efforts to extend their gains west and north of Mont Kemmel. One German division, recently at Verdun, appeared in the fighting. Driving west of Kemmel the Germans took from the French the village of Loere, while driving north along a spur of the ridge they drove the British from Voormezele but failed to take the ridge southwest of the town. North of Kemmel village they were unable to make progress. South of Kemmel the French troops counter-attacked and recaptured Loere, only to lose it again, the village changing hands five times during the two days, while Voormezele was the scene of house-to-house fighting, which culminated on Sunday night with the Germans holding the eastern edge of the village, the village itself being in British hands, and the fighting still continuing. The Germans also succeeded in crossing the canal at St. Eloi, and capturing Hill 60 on the western side.

Along the most of the line, however, furious German attacks broke against the defensive positions of the Allies. The ruined city of Ypres was again under terrific shell fire. While the course of the battle in the last week would indicate a necessity for the withdrawal of the British and Belgians from the salient of which Ypres was the center, the British official reports as yet gave no evidence of the withdrawal, although Berlin reported the British as withdrawing to the line which they held in the second battle of Ypres in April of 1915.

To those who were disquieted by the advance of the German hosts and the failure of Gen. Foch to deliver the long awaited counterblow, a French officer, as quoted by a correspondent of the New York Times, declared that there was no immediate necessity for Gen. Foch to take the initiative which he must take sooner or later, that at present both the British and French armies were busy killing Germans and killing them at a very satisfactory rate, which was their immediate object. The officer was quoted as follows: "Don't make any mistake. We have the enemy where we want him to be and we have no doubt that we can keep him there a great deal longer than it will be healthy for him. There is no reason for any anxiety as to the present situation, none whatever. The best thing that I can tell you to do is what Gen. Foch told Clemenceau nearly a month ago and that was simply 'Wait'."

The Turks on April 28 reported the capture by their forces of the Russian fortress of Kars with 860 guns.

THE RETURN OF RUSSIA. Although Germany was reported, on April 23, to have achieved a slight advantage in numbers in the west by the transfer of 40 new divisions from the Russian front, there were evidences that she would not be able to disregard that front indefinitely. British and French troops landed at one of Russia's Arctic ports, were reported to have defeated the Finnish White Guard troops in northern Finland. Korniloff and his Don Kossacks were also reported to have renewed fighting with the Soviet troops. Other reports told of an appeal by the Siberian republic to the Entente nations for support and protection, while on April 23, M. Tchitcherine, the Bolshevik Foreign Minister of Russia, was reported to have protested to Germany against the action of German and Ukrainian troops in crossing into the Crimea, which he declared a violation of the peace treaty. The Russians also protested against German outrages on the inhabitants of these parts of Russia adjoining the Ukraine, where whole villages have been wiped out because of local resistance to German measures. The German authorities replied that they could not stop military operations until the Russian government disarmed bands of armed men which were creating disorder in the Ukraine. Berlin reported on April 24 that troops under General von der Goltz had established communication with the Finnish army, and that General Kosech's troops in the Crimea had reached Simferopol, thus cutting the railway from the mainland to the fortress of Sebastopol.

RUMANIA ACCEPTS. Bessarabia having proposed to unite itself with Rumania, the Rumanian King and Queen received on April 12 the homage of the Bessarabian delegates, and the union was celebrated in a Te Deum sung at the Cathedral in the presence of the Royal family, the members of the government and the Bessarabian delegates.

FRAGMENTS OF NEWS. The bill which had previously passed the Senate providing for the melting down of $350,000 in silver in order to gain bullion to be used in India and elsewhere in the east for the payment of credit balances against the United States, passed the House on April 22. . . . It was announced, on April 23, that the War Industries Board and the Fuel Administration planned to restrict the manufacture of passenger automobiles to 25 per cent. of the normal output after July

1, which output had already been reduced by 30 per cent. . . . Guatemala declared war on Germany on April 22. . . . The Irish labor unions on April 22 voted a general strike throughout Ireland for one day, April 23. The strike stopped street railway cars, railroads and all manufacturing activities within the island, and was planned as a protest against conscription. . . . Viscount Motono resigned, on April 23, as Japanese Minister for Foreign Affairs, being succeeded by Baron Goto. . . . The House, on April 25, passed with slight amendment the bill already passed by the Senate providing for the placing in the selective draft of men who have become 21 years of age since June 5, 1917. . . . President Wilson, on April 22, declared himself opposed to a bill pending in the Senate providing for the trial by Court Martial all spies and disloyalists, taking their cases away from the civil courts. The President characterized the measure as unnecessary, uncalled for and unconstitutional.

nine were men who had never made a start before in the Christian life, and were not members of any church. The names of all who sign the War Roll cards are to be sent to Headquarters in New York City, and a personal letter is to be sent to the homes of the young men, and the Camp pastors will be notified so that they may call on these young men and bid them welcome to the church of their choice.

In addition to the work done by the Y. M. C. A. force, there were fourteen chaplains in Camp Taylor, representing the following churches: one Lutheran, one Disciple, one Episcopalian, three Catholics, three Methodists and five Baptists, who are to take care of the Sunday morning services. These services are to be conducted in the Y. M. C. A. buildings, and the Catholic services in the K. of C. buildings.

The secretaries all agree that "after all, nothing grips men like the old Gospel of Jesus Christ and the Bible." Not only in public speaking but in personal interviews with the soldiers can men of large human sympathy lead the men to know Christ.

I fairly lived among the men. I took meals with the soldiers and with the officers, and had all I wanted to eat, never suffering from indigestion, but complimented the cooks on the good meals, especially the cherry pie. On Friday night we had a graduation exercise for ten soldiers who had completed a course of study, for which they receive their diplomas. I was asked to address them on the occasion, after our religious service. After all was over we were treated to brick ice cream, cookies and mint candy, and had enough left for the large band of about twenty men. The army had done for those soldiers what could not have been done for them otherwise. Besides, many a young man who entered the army all stooped over now walks erect, and it may add years of usefulness to his life, if he survives the war.

AS I watched the thousands of soldiers from day to day, I saw but one intoxicated, and that was in the city of Louisville, near the camp. For the most part they were fine specimens of soldiers. The churches in the city of Louisville are open to the soldiers, and special programs are often arranged for their benefit, not only in a religious but in a social way as well. Everything is intended to cheer the soldiers and make them feel welcome, so as to drive the blues from them. Even the space between the big wings of the base hospital, covering many acres, is being beautified with flower beds, plants and truck gardens, to cheer the sick boys. During the weeks of evangelism I was deeply impressed as follows: (1) The soldiers feel the need of a Christ and will respond to the right kind of Gospel. The chance offered in the army camp is the greatest opportunity for soul-winning in this generation. (2) The secretaries in the army Y. M. C. A. camps are a true type of earnest Christian workers, who bid welcome to men, who can help them, if they know how, to point men to Christ. (3) The hindrances to religious work at times indicated is not apparent, but full freedom was granted, and people may without fear write their friends in the camps and urge them to take a stand for Christ.

What Are You Going to Do?

the pastor of the great Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church of New York City said that he had more power for God over the people of that metropolitan city than all the pastors combined, and whose death brought endless streams of people, rich and poor, to pile flowers on his coffin so high that they hid the pulpit, and beneath that pyramid of flowers slept Jerry McAuley.

He takes a rough and godless safe-blower, with a kit of burglar tools wrapped up in a piece of carpet, and transforms him into a Harry Monroe. He takes a poor drunken barber, who had left his wife with her dead baby in the hovel he had made for them, while he rolled in the gutter on a beastly drunk, and by the working of his mighty spirit he makes him over into a winner of souls. He took Saul the persecutor and bigot, and made him into Paul the mighty apostle, and the greatest preacher the world has ever known. He took Augustine, a young libertine of Rome, and made him a St. Augustine, the greatest theologian of his age. He took John Bunyan, the drunken, swearing tinker, touched his heart and mind, and John Bunyan wrote for us the "Pilgrim's Progress."

Try to explain such marvelous transformations of human character apart from the mighty miracle-working power of the Lord Jesus Christ, and you do violence to reason, insult the memory of all these godly men and pour contempt upon the name of the Christ who saved them.

WHEN a student in Princeton University, I went down into the lower part of New York City and worked in the old Jerry McAuley Mission. I there met that marvelous man, Samuel Hopkins Hadley, and learned from him the story of his wonderful conversion. How I used to like to sit and hear him tell it. He said, "I was a bad man and I wanted to be good. I wanted to be honest, but I was crooked. I wanted to pray, but I was always swearing. I wanted to be truthful, but I was a liar. I wanted to be sober, but I couldn't stay on the water-wagon. And I said, 'What am I to do?' My ideals are all right, but I can't reach them. What must I do to be saved?" Yes, that's the great question. If you have never asked it, I pray God you may ask it tonight. Yes, it takes One who is more than a man to redeem humanity like that.

Men and women, has he ever touched your life? Do you want a Saviour like that—a Christ who is omnipotent, one who, being "in the form of God, took upon himself the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of man? And being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross. Wherefore God also hath highly exalted him and given him a name which is above every name; that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, and things in heaven and things in earth and things under the earth; and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father."

There is a verse of Scripture which says, "What shall the end be to them that obey not the Gospel of the Lord Jesus?" But now, right here in this life, you can't afford to live without him. What are you going to do when your conscience walks out in front of you and points its accusing finger at you? What are you going to do when misfortune and the waves of adversity overwhelm you? What are you going to do in the night of despair when the stars are dead? The end is coming, and what are you going to do then?

I HAVE looked, as if in a dream, through the gates of heaven. I stood, as it were, by an angel's side, who was there to guard the way. And as I stood there, the spirit of a rich man came and tried to get admission. He told the angel of his wealth and the vast treasures he had gathered on earth. But the angel pointed to his gold and said, "We pave our streets with that stuff; you have not got enough to buy even a glimpse into the celestial city." And then a moral man came and told the angel who he was; told him of his morality and talked of the good works he had done. But the angel said, "Not of works, lest any man should boast; you can't come in." Then came the spirit of another man and laid before the angel his respectability, his

Success with Lawns and Shrubbery

Flowers are Nature's most beautiful gift to Mankind. Like the rays of sunshine they are made to brighten the life of every one—whether rich or poor, meek or mighty. The millionaire's mansion looks bare and gloomy without the softening effect of beautiful plants, flowers and foliage, and the workingman's cottage can be enhanced in value hundreds of dollars by the addition of beautiful climbing vines, window boxes, lawn vases and shrubbery.

Red Snapper Plant Food

Is the ideal fertilizer for this purpose; with its use success can be obtained with absolute certainty. It gives to plants and foliage a wonderful growth and color, and keeps them in bloom until frost. It is the richest and most nutritious, yet harmless, plant food ever placed on the market.

Sold in two pound cans, including free package of Red Snapper Plant Tonic, Price 50 cts; also in twelve and a half pound paper lined burlap sacks, price $1.50. Ask your florist, druggist or grocer. If they have not got it, send us their name and 25c for a liberal trial package sent by parcel post paid.

We have an exceptional attractive proposition for dealers and traveling salesmen. Write us for introductory offer.

DOING NICE THINGS FOR FOLKS

In one of her "Friendship Village" stories, Zona Gale tells about a club that did "nice things for folks." Every one belonged and all contributed as generously as their means and time permitted.

The CHRISTIAN HERALD is like the "Friendship Village Club." We like to "do nice things for folks."

This, too, is the spirit of our advertisers. They do not want your money only. They want, besides, your co-operation and your confidence. They want to "do nice things for folks" and want you to look upon them as neighbors.

"Doing nice things for folks" is a community service from which you, our advertisers and the CHRISTIAN HERALD benefit equally.

Why Germany Cannot Rule the World

Dr. Gray Shows what Prophecy Clearly Fore-shadows on This Subject

Prof. JAMES M. GRAY, D.D.
Dean of the Moody Bible Institute

THE further along we get in Dr. Gray's latest series of contributions on Prophecy, now running in the Christian Herald, the more interesting they become. Every article leaves a deep impression upon the mind of the careful reader and brings a flood of light on topics which to him have been wholly unexplained till now. In his article on "How the Kingdom and the Church Differ," he makes clear as noon-day the distinction with which comparatively few Bible readers are familiar. Another of his articles, published elsewhere in this issue of the Christian Herald, deals with the "Age and Its Apostasy"—another extremely difficult topic which he illuminates so that all may understand. The next article to come, which will appear one week hence, is still more vital to the moment, the title being "Why Germany Cannot Rule the World." A little later will come another contribution showing the bearing of prophetic fulfillment on the events of today, the title being "Prophecy Changing the Map of Europe."

Another article for the near future is a "Glossary of Prophetic Words" which is a complete cade mecum or guide-book for the student of the Bible, and which will prove a wonderful help over the "hard places." Can you, who read this, define the prophetic meaning of "Age," "Antichrist," "Armageddon," "Beast," "The Coming," "The Parousia," "The Times of the Gentiles," "The Dispensations"? Who are "Gog and Magog"? What is the "Remnant"? What is understood by "Restitution"? What does a "Week" signify in prophetic time? All of these are vital to the student of God's Word.

"FORTY PROPHETIC WONDERS"

By Rev. MICHAEL BAXTER

WE have ready for delivery that remarkable volume written, many years ago, by the Rev. Michael Baxter, entitled "Forty Prophetic Wonders." This book is known to very few now living, and is remarkable for many things. Dr. Baxter was an enthusiastic student of prophecy, and had collated all the best authorities of his own and preceding times, and they are set forth in his book with his own comment and interpretation. As an example of his perspicacity, it can be stated that among the conclusions he then reached were the following:

1. 1907-1919, Great European wars, beginning 24 to 10 years before the end of the age, including probably a German war or revolution.
2. 1919, The Euphrates (or Turkish Empire) dried up. Turkish power over Judea may notably decrease about the same time.
3. 1919-1925, Great revival among Christians everywhere and preaching of the Advent.
4. 1917-1919, Formation of the Ten-Kingdomed Confederacy foretold in Dan. 2:8.
5. 1922-1929, Jerusalem to be restored and the Temple rebuilt.

Dr. Baxter's book goes much further than this, both before and after the dates indicated. It is the most complete setting forth of Scripture prophecies to be found anywhere. He himself never assumed to fix dates, but assembled the views of eminent students of the subject and gave the average of their computations. It is, in his view, a time of the unfolding of many mysteries, and the outcome of his many years of devotion to the great prophetic themes will have a wonderful fascination for all readers.

His book will be welcomed by all who love the Scriptures, and its influence will be to lead many to take a new view of the meaning of life, and of the great purposes of the Creator and Redeemer for the salvation and purification of the world.

reputation and the good name he had borne among his neighbors. But the angel shook his head and said, "There is none other name given under heaven whereby we must be saved but the name of Jesus." And then there came the spirit of another one, saying,

"Nothing in my hands I bring;
Simply to the cross I cling;

"The blood of Jesus Christ hath cleansed me from sin." And the gates of heaven rolled back on their jeweled hinges, and the angel cried, "Unto you is administered an abundant entrance into the everlasting Kingdom of Our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ." And as the gates rolled back I saw whole armies of redeemed drunkards and numberless legions of those redeemed from the vilest sinks of sin, and whole acres of redeemed men and women who once had trusted in their morality and their good name, but gave it all up for a righteousness not their own.

Will you crown him your Lord tonight?

Young People's Topics for May 19

Education a Doorway to Service. The League Institute a Training Camp for Service.

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topics. 11 Tim. 2:15; Luke 6:4. Epworth League Topic. Neh. 8:1-12.

SINCE these two topics are so similar we will treat them together. The negro pastor who boasted of his ignorance, because he said that God had promised to put into his mouth the words that he should say, was taking Scripture too literally.

God will use to his glory all of us that there is. The more of us there is, the more he can use. The more richly stored our mind is, the greater the treasure upon which he will be able to draw. The better our education, the wider will be our opportunity under grace. It is the duty of every Christian to know as much as he can of the Word of God, of secular learning, of men and of methods. It is the duty of every young Christian to get as much schooling as he can. It is little short of a crime for any boy or girl to stop school short of graduation from the High School, unless imperative necessity forces the sacrifice. A college education should be the goal of all who are not forced to forego it. The Church needs leaders, but ignorance can only lead toward failure. It is true that some unlettered men have powerfully influenced the times in which they lived. It is true that the majority of the apostles were unlettered men, yet they were schooled for their apostleship under the Master for three years, and one apostle, whose name is mentioned oftenest today next to that of Peter, the apostle Paul, was highly educated for his time. Through his epistles Paul has probably exerted a greater influence on the Church throughout the centuries than all of the other apostles put together. If for any reason our schooling has been cut short we can supplement it by night study by following well chosen reading courses, by attending lectures, and by associating with people of education.

One of the pleasantest ways and most profitable for the extension of education along with preparation for service, a way which appeals each summer to a larger number of young people, is the plan of taking their vacations at one of the summer institutes such as Silver Bay, Lake Geneva or Northfield. With the country at war, with thousands of our choicest young men in the service of their country, it is imperative that others should be trained for leadership at home. There could not be a better time, therefore, than this particular summer for those who desire to make their lives effective in the service of the King to plan for their vacation at one of these institutes.

Providence in the War

the French soldiers at the Marne had been governed by that spirit, what would have been the result? We should bear in mind that Providence works through human means. Every Frenchman in that battle acted as though the whole issue depended upon his individual efforts. When that becomes the spirit of America, only then shall we be doing our full duty.

How, then, can we help to speed the day when peace shall come to the world? There is but one way—cooperate to end the war as quickly as possible. Let not the world agony continue one unnecessary day that we can prevent. It is only by throwing in all our strength that the ravages of the war-mad Germans can be stayed. Some of us will go to the front. Some of us must stay behind. The duty of those who stay behind is to support those who go to risk their lives for the right.

To win the victory, there are two essentials: Men and things. By this time every reader knows that everything we consume beyond what is necessary for our own efficient subsistence subtracts just that much from the efficiency of the soldiers at the front. With every ounce of food, every manufactured article, that we buy beyond our bare necessities, the blood of American and Allied soldiers is on our head.

We must refrain from taking what we can do without; and we must lend the money to the Government to pay for supplies for the army. We should cut our expenses right down to the bone. We should save until it hurts, and then go on and save still more. Buy the Government's war bonds. Whether a loan campaign is in progress or not makes no difference. The invading Huns do not stop when a Liberty Loan campaign ends. Every dollar you save and invest in the nation's war bonds is a stumbling-block to the Hun advance.

Remember, the more labor, materials and workshop room are released by the people at home for the Government to command, the more completely and quickly it can equip and sustain the troops, the sooner the heaped-up misery of the world will be relieved, and the more of our precious men and boys will return alive.

Macbeth Lenses

—on the Highest Priced Cars

IT is not what they cost but what they do that makes Macbeth Lenses the choice by owners of the highest priced cars.

Incidentally Macbeth Lenses are finer looking. Their exclusive green glass visor adds a smart, attractive touch of color to a car's appearance.

Then too, there is the prestige of the name Macbeth.

These lenses are built with the same scientific accuracy and skill that has established Macbeth-Evans as world-wide lens authorities.

They give you the benefit of all your light and comply with laws.

They do not shoot blinding upward glares that menace others.

The front surface of the lens is divided into five horizontal prisms—each inclines at an angle determined with scientific accuracy.

These prisms re-direct and bend all upward rays of light down at the correct angle.

They give a strong and concentrated brilliance on the road.

The concave recesses in the back of the lens spread the light laterally, thus providing the very essential side lighting for turning corners.

It requires seventy-two hours to build one Macbeth Lens.

AN ILLUSTRATED NEWS WEEKLY FOR THE HOME

Mount Ararat, whose twin peaks welcomed the voyagers of the Flood

FROM Tiflis we rode to Erivan by automobile through some of the finest scenery that ever hid itself away from the sight of those who love such things. The car was a Blitzen Benz, which the Committee, having work in 450 villages, bought when they found it impossible to buy a Ford. The impedimenta consisted of Dr. Kennedy, whose specialty is bodies instead of motors; Captain George F. Gracey, whom Christian Herald readers supported in Urfa while he directed the industrial work in the wonderful institution of that famous heroine, Corinna Shattuck; Gregory Welch, our chauffeur, myself and Mannk, who manned the pump whenever a tire burst.

For a while we paralleled the Kura but after an hour or so we negotiated a pass and dropped into the valley of the Dzihlga. The railway goes farther around and follows that river up its valley from a point near where it empties into the Kura in the midst of a well-watered plain. By afternoon, we faced an eight-thousand-foot pass toward which the road zig-zagged in sharp hair-pin turns.

The old machine cooled her feet in the rocky bed of a small river and then started to climb. On each side of us, the mountain tops were clad in snow and we wound in and out along the slope of a hill that was covered with fine trees. Night came on as we topped the rise and slid down the steep sides of the narrow valley and rolled into Karakilisse. Just then the gas gave out but our lives were safe from the robbers who were abroad that night on the road to Dilijan. Karakilisse is a summer resort, not at its best in winter. The inn was built with the idea of ample ventilation, but with water freezing in the kitchen, our bedroom lacked that cheery warmth which writers mention in describing a winter home.

JUST beyond Karakilisse there is a steep hill and when the Benz next morning turned one of the sharp corners and saw its task, it tried the ruse of snapping the copper tube leading from the pump to the manger of the steel horse. Welch got out his gasoline torch and soon had the car in running order again. One more rise and we dashed down a fine road beside a rushing stream, with wooded slopes on each side and a snow peak at the end of the lovely valley. Motoring possibilities in the Caucasus and even amid the rugged mountains of Armenia are little known, but this interesting part of the world may yet come into its own as a tramping ground for the tourist.

Dilijan is another summer resort village, picturesquely situated near the bottom of a fine valley, at the confluence of two crystal streams. There are several good summer hotels, but the main interest to us was the large school for the Armenian refugee children. A friendly chauffeur gave us enough gasoline to enable us to finish our journey, and after a luncheon of turkey that had escaped Thanksgiving, we said good-bye to our host and climbed another lovely pass by means of a dozen or so long zig-zags, and jumped over the horizon to look down on the clear waters of one of the most picturesque lakes in the world.

Lake Sevan is more than six thousand feet above the sea and the clarity of its waters rivals that of Lake Tahoe. On all sides rise mountain peaks of ten to eleven thousand feet. On a small island near the western shore of this forty-mile expanse of indigo is the oldest Armenian monastery in existence. As a lonely retreat in the midst of the majesty of Nature, it would be difficult to find a finer spot.

AFTER leaving the lake, it is a fairly direct drive straight at the glistening sides of Great Ararat and his little brother, whose shape and height are almost exactly the same as those of Fujiyama. As the sun sets behind the Turkish boundary line of mountains to the west of Ararat, the massive, isolated form of the latter rises like an opalescent jewel above the hazy valley of the Arax.

Erivan is described by the members of the Committee as a lovely place. I dare not dispute them, but it is only fair to say that the American Committee and the American people have done more to make it lovely than Dame Nature did. The saving feature of Erivan is the superb view of the two Ararats, forty miles away. Beyond that mighty mass lies Armenia, and across the notch to the right of the higher mountain flowed the foot-sore flood of refugees who retreated from Van, Arjesh, Bitlis, and hundreds of smaller villages to seek refuge in the big Armenian village of Erivan. Here it was that the messengers of American love and charity found them and gave them a task to do, clothing to protect them and money with which to buy food until that happy day when they can surge back across the pass beside Ararat and begin life anew in the land they love. Ararat is a few hundred feet higher than the highest of the Alps and stands head and shoulders above any other mountains near at hand.

From Erivan, we went over to the base of Ararat at Igdir, where the relief work established by the Lord Mayor of London's Fund has its center. It was pitiful to see the number of women who came in asking for spinning wheels so that they could earn something to keep themselves fed and clothed, and who had to be put off until more wheels could be made. An interesting item in the work is the fact that for spinning a pound and a half of cotton, the women are allowed to receive a pound and a half of cotton cloth, so that the committee is giving the raw material and the labor of weaving to the women who spin the cotton into thread. But each woman is allowed to receive only three pounds of this cloth instead of the money. This scheme has been worked out so as to allow the workers to receive part of the reward they earn in materials, instead of roubles which will buy practically no materials, since there are none to be had except those produced by the relief committees and some home industry.

So great is the need for even the roughest cotton and wool cloth in Russia that there are some relief workers who advocate introducing power looms in order to help bring conditions to normal and to keep the people from suffering. The Moscow looms are utterly unable to turn out sufficient material, and even when the war is over and imported materials appear, few of them will filter through to the Caucasus. The question of clothing is becoming more acute daily, with little promise of betterment.

TWO weeks after reaching Erivan, we set out for Van. To make this trip it was necessary to loop the loop around Ararat, going first to the southeast, then across the southern side to a point only a few miles from Igdir, but on the other side of the pass. The Ararat Kurds were responsible for the detour since the Russians have deserted the military post at Orgoff.

The morning of our start was very cold, but as the sun got a little higher the ride became a real delight. It seemed as though the Ararats had never shown up clearer. Below Erivan, the plain on both sides of the Arax is well-watered and fertile, at least as far as Garmeloo, where the American Committee has spinning and weaving and where a wider work is being started. Seven new workers for the Caucasus branch have just arrived from America after five months of hard travel and tedious waiting.

On the road we met great numbers of Persians, very dirty of face and slow of foot, and many deserting Russian soldiers, who could not trust the infrequent and overcrowded trains to get them home fast enough. As we neared Shatakhteh, the machine tried a little glacier climbing without the aid of chains. The glacier won the argument and drove the auto into the fields and irrigation ditches before it rounded the ice floe that had taken possession of the road. Shatakhteh is in Russia by virtue of being on the left bank of the Arax instead of the right; but the Russians have driven their military railway across this corner of Persia with no compunctions. Persian sentiment is pro-German and the Persians allowed the Turkish army free passage across their country for a flank blow at Russia.

THE station at Shatakhteh was absolutely full of dirty Russian soldiers—deserters from the Persian and Van fronts. They were not an admirable lot but were comparatively harmless.

Persian neutrality has been one of the drawbacks to the Russian campaign, and the Russians assert that there is no way that a Persian can be induced to fight. The latter are too homesick to fight; and though they know that the larder at home is as empty as Mother Hubbard's cupboard, they want to see their children once more before the youngsters have retreated behind the matted beard with which the Russian muzhik keeps his chest warm.

From Igdir, Little Ararat—which is the model of the church domes and the priests' hats for Armenia—is hid behind the larger peak; but from Shatakhteh, the condition is reversed and Little Ararat shuts off the view of all but the peak of the more massive mountain. Shatakhteh is a mere string of railway buildings and sheds. Russian railways are broad gauge and the Shatakhteh military line to Savaleh is narrow gauge, so that it seemed like a toy line. But much of the success of the war depends upon that one life line between the Caucasus and the Van and Bitlis regions. It is being overworked at present carrying Russian soldiers away from their duties.

We had barely time to complete a very simple supper before an officer came from the hut belonging to the Zuyuz Gorodoff (or Union of Cities) to invite Captain Gracey and the rest of us to warm ourselves and eat there. There were eight or nine officers and two officers' wives around the table and we ate and drank tea and munched white bread until the time came for us to entrain. A private car had been placed at our disposal through the influence of friends of Captain Gracey, whom they knew and honored for his work in clothing distribution and repatriation for the Armenians, in addition to his supervision of the second retreat from Van. The car was small and crowded with soldiers, mostly officers who had not yet caught deserters' fever. But they had reserved three berths for us, and we had little to complain of except the heat in the evening and the cold in the morning when we moved out at four-thirty, seven hours later than the hour we had originally planned.

A clear, frosty morning found us at Maku, as picturesque a city as one can find anywhere. It is the home of many rich men who own villages in Persia, but who choose to live together here in a city that climbs a steep hill to the base of some towering cliffs which are dotted with caves that are used as fortresses by the warlike inhabitants. The people of Maku are thoroughly civilized, use electric lights and read "La Vie Parisienne." But almost every man on the streets carries an automatic revolver or high-power rifle as a part of his toilet set. The Maku men have no great liking for the Russians or the Armenians, and sedition has been incubated in more than one of the palatial homes at the base of the rock-fortress; but so far no one has had the nerve to walk up to them and take their favorite playthings. Maku is a veritable arsenal and a lot of people are kept guessing as to who is to be the victim.

Our leisurely train did not stop long at Maku, and most of the day we rolled on up through cold mountain scenery till we slipped across the Turkish frontier and stopped at the station at Bayazid. Bayazid is composed of three parts. There is the Turkish city, which was the first Turkish position to be taken by the Russians, and which is situated about half-way up the craggy peaks that separate Turkey from Persia at this point. Below it, at the edge of the plain, is a great Persian fortress or caravanserai, with a considerable group of buildings around it. A mile or so farther into the great plain that stretches across to Ararat is the conglomeration of sheds, shacks, huts and hovels that constitute the Russian military town. From Bayazid across the pass to Igdir is an easy day by carriage, but the drivers have a healthy respect for the lawless Kurds, now that the intrepid Russian tavarische have abandoned the

A snow peak at the end of a lovely valley

Russian post at Orgoff, near the top of the pass and have left the travelers to their tender mercy.

THE loveliness of the view of the Ararats from Bayazid station cannot be described. Not a tree nor a house stands between the group of station buildings and the mighty mass. From here, Little Ararat is to the right and has already begun to hide behind the wide hoop-skirts of Mother Ararat. As the sun sets behind the lower mountains beyond Bayazid, the great white mass of Ararat, not as thickly covered as the side toward Erivan, stood majestic and compelling in its isolation.

We spent the night in our private car and most of the morning as well. At eleven, I asked what time the train would leave and the station-master replied that it would go at two. Whereupon the Captain and I started the long climb to the Turkish city, blissfully unconscious of the fact that the train unexpectedly came in fifteen minutes later and left after a short halt. But the Captain's secretary, Agha Beg, who was formerly a member of the Supreme Court of Van, kidnapped our private car and prevented the train from depriving us of our happy home.

Bayazid is a typical Turkish city, with narrow streets, badly paved and lined with open-faced shops tended by close-faced merchants. At the top of the city there is a large citadel with a needle minaret puncturing the blue sky above every other object except the tawny hills that form the background for the tawny village. The streets have all been renamed with Russian names and every ill-smelling alley that crawls between two mud-houses is given a high-sounding title. The Turks in Bayazid seem happy, in spite of the Russian nomenclature of their municipal highways. The road to the station has an evil reputation for hold-ups, but we did not know it until we were safe back in our car.

In the hospital belonging to the Union of Cities—which is four months behind in its appropriations—we met a doctor who had served in Manchuria and who remembered with pleasure the American correspondent, McCormick. When I asked him his opinion of the Japanese army, his reply gave a clue to the reason why the Russians now fear that Japan will take Siberia. "They have discipline and patriotism," he said. What a sentence for a Russian officer to have to utter, when the greatest indignity of all has come with the news that Chinese troops have seized Harbin so as to preserve order in that city which has been an inferno of disorder since last July, at which time I visited it. When Chinese troops can defeat Russians, the bear that once threatened every nation to the south of her is shown to be pretty sick. And when Chinese troops uphold order, a new day is dawning in the Celestial Republic. "They have discipline and patriotism!" So the Russians had once!

The demoralization of the Russian army is not so much an individual as a group movement. Starting without moral standards in any large sense, the Russian army has woefully failed. Possibly if these men are segregated they will reveal as much honor and self-respect as ever. Group decay rather than individual degradation has made Russia a disgrace. One young fellow not only gave up his chair to Captain Gracey, but sought out another for me when chairs in that station were as scarce as airplanes.

AT the station, I had a long talk with a young German-Russian whose family has had no connection with Germany since 1754. He says that all the German-Russians are on the Caucasus fronts and that most of them are anxious to see the fight carried on to the end. German is a common language in Bayazid. According to this young fellow, who had been in New York two years and a half and in Glasgow and Liverpool for several years, German-Russians can now become commissioned officers, although that right was denied them before the revolution. When I inquired which way he was going, he said, "Back to Saratov," and when I asked how that showed hatred of German methods, he smiled and said, "What can one man do when the current leads homeward?"

An Armenian who had worked for four years in Illinois, came up to speak to me. He is returning to his home in Mush, which has become a No Man's Land. Thousands of Armenians are living in homes in advance of the Russian positions, and have been for years. He has been back from America only five months and says that Russian freedom is pretty hard to bear at times. He knows the Christian Herald and is very grateful for what the American people have done for his countrymen.

"But why they give us only money, when we want our own nation? Americans say they will fight till Belgium is free once more. But what of Armenia?"

"Do you think that the Armenians could rule themselves if they had a chance?" I asked. "The different parties are now quarreling in Tiflis, when only a united Armenia can defend her boundaries she hopes to gain."

"I think Armenians can rule themselves as well as the people of Illinois," he replied. "People say to me that America and England will send money and ammunitions to the Armenian young men, and allow them to defend Armenia against the Turk. Armenian men are very glad to do this, but what if Russia gobbles us up after we win her battles? And what will the Turks do to us if they send five men against every one we have? Armenia likes money for orphans. Much bliged. But why are we not fit to be weaned? America says to Filipinos, 'You must govern yourselves'; but what does she say to Armenians? 'Here is some bread. When this is eaten I will give you more'; but she does not try to help us to be free."

The valleys that nestle about Ararat are fertile and the sheep grow fat

With Our Boys "Over There"

By HARRY LAUDER

WHEN his son, a captain in the Argyle and Sutherland Highlanders, was shot down by the Germans, in France two years ago, Harry Lauder abandoned all engagements, and gave himself up, heart and soul, to helping to win the war. He put his entire possessions into War Bonds. He traveled about England, arousing patriotic enthusiasm. Then he went to the front and lived with the soldiers in the blood-sodden trenches, singing to them, cheering them and inspiring them to fight. Oftentimes as he sang the shells were falling on every side. Recently he toured the United States and Canada, visiting seventy-seven cities, speaking to millions about the war and raising vast sums by selling Liberty Bonds. In addition to helping the Red Cross, the Y. M. C. A. and other organizations, he is raising a fund of $5,000,000 for the relief of Scottish soldiers and sailors disabled in the war.

ON one occasion, during my stay at the front, I sang "The Wee Hoose Amang the Heather" to an audience of 15,000 Scottish soldiers at Arras.

I was watching those lads—some of them were seated, looking up into the sky, others with their elbows on their knees, others with their arms folded, all deep in thought. What were they thinking about? I will tell you. They were thinking of the folks at home and of the "hoose amang the heather." After the concert I had a chance of speaking to many of them, and I asked, "How are you getting on, boys?" They answered: "We are getting on all right, but how are the folks at home getting on?" I said "They are getting on all right, but are anxious about you out here."

The spirit of these men was shown in the message which they gave to me. "You tell the folks at home," they said, "not to be anxious about us. This is our place out here. This is where the best men in the world are. Tell them that we're going to stay here, even if it takes twenty years, because—well, just look at what the Huns have done, right and left of you, the ruin, the desolation, the indescribable barbarities."

Ay, it was true. With my own eyes I had seen the hellish work of the Hun—and no one who has not seen with his own eyes can have even a glimmer of an understanding. The boys in the trenches know that. It is because of their knowledge of Hun savagery that they are standing the hard blows and wounds that come from fighting in the bullet-swept stretches of No Man's Land. From whatever country they come—Great Britain, Ireland, France, Belgium, America, Australia—they are inspired by the same heroic spirit. They are determined to struggle and fight, not simply to break the Hun and Prussian military system—because if it is only broken it will reassemble again—but to destroy it completely.

NOW that I have been in the war-zone, I realize that my son's life was not given in vain. And then, too, there came through the gracious agency of God that other thought—came so clearly and vividly that I know it is true—that out beyond I shall rejoin my boy. I spent many days in the trenches, the rest camps, the hospitals and the surrounding towns, and the most lasting impression that I carried away was one concerning the spiritual atmosphere which surrounds the French and British soldiers in France. All these men possess a calm, clear conviction that if they fall—no matter what manner of lives they may have lived before—they will pass into the life beyond.

"That is why we take such chances," one man told me simply. "Do you think for a moment that if life held nothing for us but the earthly body we possess, we would fight with such a confidence and eagerness? It would be impossible, because we would be doing everything in our power to preserve this life of ours. But, seeing men die as I have seen them, I know better than not to believe in a future life. And because we have no fear of death, we fling ourselves over the trenches and on to the Huns with a fierce, almost savage joy. Because that spirit is sweeping among our men, we are going to win this war. We do not believe it possible that men who go into battle, knowing that they are fighting for a righteous cause and unafraid of death, can be beaten back forever."

I am often asked what sort of songs the men at the front prefer. As far as Scottish soldiers are concerned, I found that best of all they liked the old love songs, the old songs of Scotland, tender, crooning melodies that would help to carry them back in memory to their homes, and if they had them to the lassies of their dreams.

IT was no sad, lugubrious songs they wanted, but a note of wistful tenderness they liked. That was true of the sick and wounded and of the hale and hearty too; and it showed that though they were soldiers, they were just human like the rest of us, for all the great superhuman things they had done out there in France.

One of the concerts that I gave to the soldiers was in a Y. M. C. A. hut. But do not let the name "hut" deceive ye. It held an audience of two thousand men, although it was tight squeezing. And what a roaring, wild crowd that was, to be sure! They sang with me and they cheered and clapped until I thought that hut would be needing a new roof.

The Y. M. C. A. huts, I may add, are really the soldier's home. There is where he sits and talks of home. That is where he dreams in the quiet rest that he gets when he returns from the trenches. For that reason I am only too glad to help the Y. M. C. A., which is doing such grand work for the boys at the front.

What impression did I gain of America's war spirit during my recent tour from the Atlantic to the Pacific and back? I was astounded at the gigantic preparations that are being made with men, materials and money. I spoke and sang at some of the largest camps and therefore had a good opportunity to observe what is taking place. Away from the camps, however, I was impressed by the fact that there are many things which people in the United States cannot understand, because they are too far away from the war zone to comprehend all of it.

The farther I get away from the war zone I find there is more indifference about the war, until I think that vast numbers of people need to be inoculated with the serum of service and sacrifice. For that reason I say to people in this country who are indifferent: Wake up and have a thought of the war and its responsibilities. Those men out there are fighting for you and deserve the best from you. They are fighting for liberty, the best word in any language on the face of the earth. Collectively you have done wonderful things, but what have some of you done individually? There is work for every man and woman to do. Don't waste time in talking or criticizing the government, but do the work that needs to be done.

WAKE up, and remember that the men over yonder are facing an enemy whose motto is "no mercy." There is no mercy in the wake of the Hun. I often wonder if he expects to get any mercy himself when the time arrives. God tells us that we must love our enemies, but he could not expect us to love such enemies as the savage hordes who have laid waste Belgium and northern France.

The knowledge that the Allied cause, which is America's cause, is righteous in every sense of the word should be a source of comfort to American parents whose boys have been drafted for the war. I can also give them a word of comfort drawn from my own sad experience. To every mother and father who loses a son in the war, I would say: have a strong unbreakable faith in the future life, in the world beyond, where you will see your son once again. Do not give way to grief. Instead, keep your gaze and your faith strongly fixed on the world beyond and regard your boy's absence as though he had only gone on a journey. Keep your faith and you will help to win this war. Lose it, and your belief in what is right and your own personal self, will be lost.

One Town's War-Chest Campaign

By L. C. BUSCH, Secretary, Chamber of Commerce, Rome, N. Y.

IN giving to war activities Rome, N. Y., recently went "over the top."

Thus she says to the boys "over there": "We wish you the best of luck, for we have the money to help you." A War Chest Campaign was started to aid in all war activities. The sum of $300,000 per year for the duration of the war—which is one dollar per month for every man, woman and child in Rome, figuring 25,000 as the population—was the goal. This basis was arrived at by totaling demands made upon Rome for all war activities up to the present, and making liberal increase allowances. The campaign was so successful that $350,000 was raised, or $50,000 more than was given out as the maximum, and it is expected that $50,000 more will be raised from those not yet visited or out of town. It is estimated that sufficient funds will be left over from the first year's operation to offset increased demands in the future, and that new residents each succeeding year will take care of losses through removals of subscribers and those who fail to pay their subscriptions.

The Rome War Chest Association was formed for the following purposes: (1) to concentrate all war activities' solicitations in one drive; (2) to have one disbursing agency for all such funds; and (3) to eliminate spurious or unworthy war solicitations. The War Chest Association makes all subscriptions to the Red Cross, the Y. M. C. A., and all other worthy activities during the war.

THE Association was incorporated under the laws of the State of New York, with sixteen directors. An educational campaign of mass meetings, theater gatherings, factory assemblages, etc., with newspaper publicity, was planned. A commander-in-chief, two generals, with nine captains each, and ten "enlisted" men assigned to each captain, were appointed. The city was divided into eighteen districts, with a captain and ten enlisted men in charge of each district. Canvassing blanks were printed and distributed to the "enlisted" men. Blanks showing name, address, place of employment and solicitor's idea of ability to give were filled in, then the blanks were assorted according to their occupational status. Factory employees were assigned to a Factory Committee; the retail district to a Retail Merchants' Committee; corporations to a Corporation Committee; wealthy residents to a Special Committee; and the balance of the blanks to a General Committee; this preliminary work was done in one week.

These committees then made actual solicitation of the parties assigned to them, using a specially prepared card for that purpose. The basis for subscriptions was as follows: Incomes to $1,200, $1 per month; to $1,500, $1.50 a month; to $2,000, $2 a month; to $2,500, $3 a month; to $3,000, $5 a month; to $4,000, $10 a month; to $5,000, $20 a month. Above $5,000 the proportion increased, so that incomes to $10,000 and upwards should take membership equivalent to ten per cent. or more. As subscriptions were made, a United States Government bronze pin, inscribed with the words, "Enlisted for the War," and initialed "R. W. C. A.," was given to the subscriber to indicate to other solicitors that the subscriptions had been taken. Home cards to be placed in home windows where subscriptions were taken read as follows: "We helped fill the Rome War Chest. Have You?" All subscriptions are payable at the Rome Trust Company. A "hold-over" committee was designated to see and secure subscriptions from all those citizens who for any reason were not seen in the general canvass of the city. A large iron-bond chest, located on the top of the Trust Company Building and illuminated at night, showed the result of each of the campaign days. Four Canadian soldiers talked at the meetings, in addition to Captain A. P. Simmons, detailed by the War Department, Congressman Snyder, Mr. Chandler of New York City, with others.

AN investigating committee of five leading citizens hears all requests for war activities aid, and reports to a disbursing committee of sixteen, a majority of which decides finally upon such requests. Any citizen who subscribes to the War Chest is automatically released from making subscriptions to any other war activities, Liberty Bonds, of course, not included.

The plan is one that may be used anywhere. It is an amplification of similar ones used in Canada and other American cities.

What Sad Gethsemane Means to Us

TEXT—Mark 14: 32-42. "And they came to a place which was called Gethsemane."

THE Redeemer of mankind was suffering the most heart-breaking moments of his life. He was "sore amazed," "exceedingly sorrowful even unto death." His most trusted disciples, Peter and James and John, were not sufficiently alive to the situation even to keep awake. Three times he found them asleep while he was in agony unspeakable. Even God had apparently forsaken his well-beloved Son, and answered not his prayer.

What meaning have these verses for us for whom the agony of the garden was endured? The most obvious lesson, perhaps, is found in the Saviour's words, "Watch and pray that ye enter not into temptation." Let us not spend all our thought upon the delinquencies of Peter and James and John, and see in them, as so many do, only a type of the modern church, asleep while its Master suffers.

It is well indeed for us to make the application to ourselves, and to ask, "Am I asleep at my post? Am I recreant to my trust? When the Saviour's cause is suffering fearful assaults, am I drowsy and careless?" But to berate the church and belabor other Christians over the shoulders of Peter and John is usually as useless as it is unfair, unless done with the loving spirit of Jesus who sought excuses for his disciples even while he was suffering the tortures of Gethsemane.

Three great teachings seem to me to stand forth from these verses: 1st, the real humanity of our Lord, shown by his mortal agony and his need of earthly companionship; 2nd, the strength and consolation he found in prayer; 3rd, his courtesy and gentleness toward human weakness.

1st. Jesus' humanity was never more plainly shown in all the three and thirty years he lived on earth, than during those few hours in Gethsemane. He was "sore amazed." We are often inclined to think that he was never perplexed, never in doubt about the future, never uncertain about his father's will and purpose.

Our perplexities are among our greatest tribulations. We are amazed at the prevalence of evil in the world, at the sufferings of good people, at the enormous waste of life in war and pestilence, and we cry out in our amazement, "How long, O Lord, how long?"

IT is comforting to us to know that in such matters, too, our Lord was tempted in all points like as we. He, too, was "very heavy," and "exceeding sorrowful," and in our sad hours, when our burdens seem too heavy to be borne, and our griefs beyond endurance, we can turn to this episode in the Master's life and say to ourselves "He knoweth our frame, for he suffered a man's perplexities and griefs."

Not that there was nothing more than mere human sorrow and suffering in the garden; there was that and we know not how much more. The sin of the world was pressed into his cup until it was full to overflowing. "It could have been no mere dread of pain," writes Dean Farrar, "no mere shrinking from death which thus agitated to its inmost center the pure and innocent soul of the Son of Man. . . . It was something far deadlier than death. It was the burden and mystery of the world's sin which lay heavy on his heart; it was the tasting in the divine humanity of a sinless life, the bitter cup which sin had poisoned. It was the sense, too, of how virulent, how frightful, must have been the force of evil in the universe of God which could render necessary so infinite a sacrifice."

HIS longing for human companionship also declares our Lord's real humanity. One might think that the Father's presence would be enough in such an hour. But no, the human Christ needed human companionship. As we need a friend to halve our sorrows and double our joys, so it was with him. He taketh with him Peter (poor, inconstant, sleepy Peter) and James and John (no less drowsy, and no more able to understand the awful agony of the hour), and he said to them, "Tarry ye here and watch with me."

To the Mount of Transfiguration, we remember, the Master took with him the same three disciples. Though he was to commune with the glorified spirits of Moses and Elijah, he did not wish to forego the earthly companionship of Peter and James and John. So now, though his visit to Gethsemane was for communion with his Father, though prayer and converse with God seem to be his sole object in going thither, yet he would not leave them behind, but bade them share his vigil.

How characteristic is this of the best in humanity,—the love of sympathetic companionship. It is not good for man to be alone. When in joyous mood our first and best impulse is to share our joy with someone else. When affliction's sorest darts pierce him to the heart, a man's impulse is not like the beast's,—to crawl away into a solitary jungle to nurse his wounds, but to seek a loving friend to whom he can open his heart and tell his grief.

IT was not otherwise with Jesus. His reliance on God did not lead him to ignore men. He went from Peter and James and John only a "little farther" when he prayed—only "about a stone's cast." Yet, the genuine humanity of our divine Lord was shown not only in his amazement, his heaviness, his agony, but in his craving for human companionship, even such company as the uncomprehending, heavy-lidded, disciples could offer.

Is it stretching the thought unduly to believe that he still craves our companionship as well as desires our love? If he is the same yesterday, today and forever; if he is still the Son of Man, with us "always, even unto the end of the world," is it too much to believe that he needs our companionship in only a less degree than we need his?

This thought puts a new meaning into prayer, and irradiates the Quiet Hour with a new life. When we commune with our Master we are not coming to one who has everything to give and nothing to get. It is not going to a confessional to whisper something into the ear of a high priest whose duty, but not whose pleasure, it is to listen to us. We are coming to one who is not bored by our presence; who loves to have us approach him; who (can we say it reverently?) enjoys our society.

We may be stupid and sleepy and comprehend very little of his character or mission; yet he says, "Tarry ye here and watch with me for I need you." We rightly dwell on our infinite need of him, on the blessedness of his friendship, on the joy of his presence; but friendship demands two people at least, joy cannot be shared without a companion, and unshared joy is not joy, even for the Saviour of mankind.

Let us not think that, with angels and archangels and the spirits of just men made perfect, our Lord does not need our affectionate companionship. Let us not make an excuse of our dull and unresponsive hearts for not communing with him. Few could be more dull-witted than Peter and James and John at this period of their career. They could sleep, even in Gethsemane. Yet he took them with him there, as well as to the Mount of Transfiguration.

IN the second place, while we recognize the human comfort which Jesus found in the presence of his disciples, a still profounder lesson is the strength he found in prayer to his Father in heaven. The scene in Gethsemane may be called the Tragedy of Prayer. "He kneeled down, fell on his face to the ground, and prayed." Again and again he did the same thing. It was no mumbled petition, no easy-chair devotion, but a soul agony of prayer that brought to his forehead the sweat "as it were great drops of blood falling down to the ground."

Note, too, that it was a real petition that Jesus offered. He asked for something definite and immediate. "If it be possible, if thou be willing, take away this cup from me." A danger of present-day praying is that it may be resolved into mere meditation, a lazy, hazy thing which we call communion with God, in which there is no petition, no intercession. Jesus never taught us thus to pray. In the prayer that his disciples asked him to teach them are no less than six distinct petitions; even a prayer for daily bread is not omitted.

SO in Gethsemane Jesus actually asked for something,—something that had in it for him the issues of life or death. Yet every time was the saving clause without which there can be no true prayer,—"Nevertheless, not my will but thine be done," "thy will be done," and he "prayed the third time, saying the same words."

In the familiar Lord's Prayer Jesus gave us the words of our petitions; in Gethsemane he shows the spirit in which all true prayer must be offered. It took the agony of the Garden to show the world the one condition without which praying is not prayer. It is as though no other event in the world's history were impressive enough to teach us that prayer is submission, as well as petition; it is asking the Father for something definite, with but one proviso, namely: that it is his infinite will to grant it.

And here is an amazing fact! The petition of Jesus at this supreme moment was not granted. The cup did not pass from him. He drank it to the dregs. And yet we complain when in our careless morning prayer we ask for fair weather or health or personal success, because we do not get just what we ask for, and when we ask for it.

What a flood of light does this throw upon the whole subject of prayer. Jesus was denied his petition, for, if it had been granted and the cup of suffering—not only suffering on the Cross, but the deeper agony he was enduring for the sins of the world—had passed from him, the religion of the Cross could not have been established, Judaism and heathenism would still be triumphant, and the glorious centuries of Christianity would be unwritten.

YET his prayer was answered, for his Father's will was done, and that, too, was as much our Lord's prayer as that the cup might pass from him. So with us and our prayers. They never can be unanswered, if offered in Jesus' way and with Jesus' spirit.

But let no one say, "What is the use of praying, then? God's will will be done whether we pray or not. We are wasting our breath and deceiving ourselves with finespun casuistry when we offer a double prayer, first that we may have our own way, and if not, then God's way, which may be exactly the reverse of our own."

Again the great Teacher shows us the way out of this perplexity, for his prayer, though unanswered in the exact form he uttered it, was answered in reality, because strength and courage were given him to drink the cup. What mattered it whether the agony was taken away, or strength given him to endure it? Was not this answer a far more blessed and noble one than escape from the cross would have been? Thus, too, are our prayers often answered, and far more and far better is given than we asked for, had we not added, "Thy will be done."

ONCE more, we must not miss our Lord's consideration toward his sleepy, slow-witted disciples. How gentle his reproof! "Could ye not watch with me one hour?" He even finds excuses for them which they dared not plead for themselves, for they "knew not what to answer him." He was in the darkest hour of his life, but he was not unmindful of their tired bodies. "The spirit indeed is willing but the flesh is weak," was his apology for their drowsiness. His own agony did not prevent him from considering their need of rest. Though they had not kept vigil with him, "Sleep on now, and take your rest," he said, when he came back the third time and found them sleeping. But even as he spoke, Judas was at the garden gate, and the Son of man was betrayed into the hands of sinners.

However, let us not take too much comfort to ourselves because of Christ's treatment of his sleepy disciples. To us, as to them, comes the command, "Watch and pray that ye enter not into temptation." The fact that Jesus dealt compassionately with their weariness after the night of excitement and anxiety and sorrow, is no warrant for stupidity or carelessness in our spiritual warfare. The sentinel who sleeps at his post is guilty of a crime that justly condemns him to death, for he may endanger ten thousand lives as well as his own. He may be spared by the clemency of his commander, as were some of our soldiers in the Civil War by the great-hearted Lincoln, but his sin is none the less.

THE watchman, someone has said, when he sees the enemy coming, is not to rush single-handed into battle; his duty is to report at once to his captain who will provide against the assault of the foe. Our duty, when temptation assails us, is to report to the Captain of our Salvation, to seek his strength and the legions which he is ready to provide.

This lesson from Gethsemane tells us how kindly considerate our Captain is, how ready to forgive, and, above all, that he himself has stood a solitary sentinel at the very gates of hell, and there found almighty strength, for in the hour of direst agony there appeared unto him "an angel from heaven strengthening him." We need no other messenger from heaven, for the divine Sufferer of Gethsemane is with us always. He knows our suffering. He craves our companionship. He tells us to watch, not alone, but with Him, and he has shown us how to get strength and courage from prayer, and that the Father will enable us, as he enabled him, to bear any cross that he does not take away.

The Worst and the Best

SUNDAY, May 19. John 2:25. "He knew what was in man." Our Lord has always known what is in every man. Everything is transparent. The rose-bush does not hide the refuse-heap. The stage-play of piety does not conceal the life behind the scenes. We have no secret chambers. He knows all about our most private rooms. Here, at any rate, all camouflage is useless. He sees the thought that has never yet found words. He sees the ugly purpose which is hiding like a snake in the grass. He sees the desire that will not die, but which will not show its face in the street. The Lord knows all about us. We are glass houses, and everything is manifest. And this should fill us with holy fear. "Thou, God, seest me!"

But there is another way of looking at the apostle's word, and this other way is full of inspiration. The Lord certainly knows my worst, and yet he it is who has the best hopes for me. That is to me one of the most wonderful of all wonderful things. He who knows my worst has more hope for me than they who know my best. My best is only very blind and lame, and it does not offer much promise of anything very splendid that is coming. And so it is that they who are allowed to see my best, my parade days, my prepared moments, are not very enthusiastic in their predictions of the marvelous conquests that await me. But the Saviour sees my very worst. He has turned it all over. Not a thing in all the sad heritage of my past has escaped him. And he amazes me when he seeks my intimate companionship, "that where I am there ye may be also." Yes, he who sees my worst has invincible hopes of the best.

This wonderfully hopeful way of looking at the worst is born of his unspeakable love. For it is one of the crowning distinctions of love that her sight is not only clear insight but radiant foresight. Love is Omega as well as Alpha, and she sees the shining end from the dull beginning. But better than all else is this: he who sees my worst is ready to become incorporated with me in all the vital intimacy of his redeeming sacrifice. At Calvary he becomes one with the shame of my worst that I may be enfolded in the grace and glory of his best. I am bound up in the same bundle of life with the Lord my God. J. H. J.

Why Live Inferiorly?

MONDAY, May 20. Gal. 2:20. "The life which I now live in the flesh I live by the faith of the Son of God." Regeneration is the emergence in us of a new self, a superior self. The Christian life is superior in that it is serene. "Great peace have they that love thy law, and nothing shall offend them." It is superior in that it is guided. "I will guide thee with mine eye." It is superior, because it is victorious. "In all these things we are more than conquerors."

Why should we be satisfied with a life which is inferior—with anything less than the best? We demand the best literature, the best art, why not the best life? Multitudes seem to be content with a quality of life which in their sanest moments they must know is less rational and less satisfying than the life offered them freely in the Gospel.

A soldier in a Southern camp who confessed he had not attended church since he was fourteen years of age, was much impressed with the appeal of a visiting minister and sought an interview with him after the service. He accepted the terms of salvation, and went back to his tent a happy man. As he took the minister's hand and thanked him for the message he said, "I do not know what made me content so long without this joy and hope, but I must have been bewitched." Sin does cast a spell over us. The prodigal at last "came to himself" in the far-off country. He had not been himself, that is, his best self, until he yielded to the impulse to return to the father's house. C. C. A.

The Self-Condemning Heart

TUESDAY, May 21. I John 3:20. "If our heart condemn us, God is greater than our heart, and knoweth all things." The trials of a believer embrace misgivings inspired by the believer's own heart, whether he is really accepted with God, whether he can really regard God as his loving Father and himself as a child of God. In a review of his life the believer may come upon incidents which his memory has retained and which spell guilt to him. The heart lays hold of such matters and declares that they argue against the Christian's belief that he is in the relationship of a child to God. The believer's sonship with God is disavowed by his own heart. This is a very grievous trial, causing great disquietude, fear and trembling.

Against this state of uncertainty and unrest the apostle proposes this remedy: that the believer disregard his disavowing heart and take refuge with God, who will sustain the believer against the accusations of his conscience. What a paradox! The heart is to get away from itself. How is this possible? Through the agency of the divine promises of grace laid down in the Gospel. The Gospel declares that God has been reconciled by the sacrifice of Christ. All our guilt has been canceled. No one shall be able to lay anything to the charge of God's elect. There is no condemnation to them that are in Christ. Through these assuring statements God again and again speaks to the Christian in moments when his faith is become pusillanamous, and tells him to believe the record of God's redeeming love in Christ rather than the record which his own heart holds up to him. The believer is here taught to rest his assurance, not on the sensations of peace and joy which he experiences in his inner life, not on any subjective ground which will ever be shifting, but on the objective ground of what God has done for him and is telling him to believe in his Word.

God is greater in justifying us than our heart can be in condemning us. He has said that his grace abounds over all sins. We are to be saved, not by believing that we are believers and strong in faith, but by believing God's promise of salvation.

Giving Up Treasures

WEDNESDAY, May 22. Gen. 22:12. "Now I know that thou fearest God, seeing thou hast not withheld thy son, thine only son, from me." A multitude of homes have been giving up their dearest treasures since the European war began. Not only among the soldiers in the battle front, but among the children banished from ruined homes, little wanderers in hunger, desolation and anguish, falling by the roadside or lost in the wilderness. Mothers and fathers have been giving their children back to Christ from their arms of love and can say to a sorrowing world, "I, too, am alone, without my loved ones, but, in my desolation, God is blessing me with multiplied service and showing me that 'Earth has no sorrow that heaven cannot heal.'"

All classes of society are surrendering their dear ones to the call of the nation. A physician once exclaimed, in bitter sorrow, "I cannot cure my boy." So a millionaire might cry, "My gold is unable to save my son from facing the deadly engine of war." A wife cannot keep her husband nor a sister her brother. How many soon will be like Rachel, weeping for her children, depending upon the comfort of the everlasting arms. The children are still yours, though surrendered; if not given back soon, like Isaac, they will greet you in the home of the soul, where all are safe with God. You may, therefore, exclaim, "The Lord gave and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord."

Jesus wept, and so may you; he knows when the weeping time will be over, when we shall see that all the dark things have worked together for our good. So we may now say, "Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him." Let us remember that Jesus has room for the parents, as well as the lambs, in his infinite bosom.

"Yieldingness"

THURSDAY, May 23. Phil. 4:5. "Let your moderation be known to all men." Paul was a man with a stout will. He had all the force of character called for in a great political leader or a great warrior. Wherever he was, his personality struck the dominant note. He was strongly gifted with that magnetism and forcefulness which are the endowment of the born conqueror. To bring such a will into subjection, into submission, into habitual control, is the most difficult task imaginable. We can imprison a strong man; we can even torture him into submission; but to obtain the consent of his will to live a life totally different from that which he had marked out for himself—that is a different thing.

Behold a slow but certain change in all Paul's processes of thinking, choice and action. It is a slow process, but not so slow that it can not be perceived early in his Christian experience. He submits to be led by an obscure disciple named Ananias. He sits at the feet of people who know much less than himself, but who know more of the Thing that he wants to know more about. Here begins a career which is as wonderful for its meekness as it was of old for its strength. In admonishing the Philippians, "Let your moderation be known unto all men," he uses a term having a significance much more than mere temperance, mere self-control. Indeed we render it almost literally, when we read it, "Let your yieldingness be known unto all men."

John Wesley was a powerful personality. He had a regal will. We can not look at his picture without recognizing the inflexible commander. It was that will which sustained him in the most laborious life any modern apostle ever lived. The lesson Paul learned, John Wesley also learned, and he too subdued the lion in himself by generous participation in the grace of God. John Wesley had been wronged, and he confronted the man who had injured him with the demand for an apology. It was refused. "Will you not apologize?" at last Wesley said. His antagonist replied, "I will not." Said Wesley, "Then I will." There was Christian yieldingness. C. C. A.

The Trinity

FRIDAY, May 24. I John 5:7. "There are three that bear record in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost: and these three are one." The Trinity in Unity and Unity in Trinity is here set forth in a most practical manner, viz., as related to our salvation. Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, all bear witness that Jesus is the Christ and whosoever believeth in him is begotten of him. The Father loved us and gave his only begotten Son to save us from perdition. The Son loved us, and gave himself for us. The Holy Spirit loves us and fashions our hearts into temples of the triune God, in which this great incomprehensible God deigns to dwell in the majesty of his condescending love and mercy.

This is a happy and blessed way of studying the mystery of the Three in One. Our brains grow dizzy when we begin to reason out the mathematical incongruities implied in the teaching of the Trinity, when we attempt to fathom the eternal generation of the Son out of the essence of the Father, and the going forth of the Spirit from the Father and the Son. This God is so inscrutable that our little reason cannot penetrate the riddle of his being; he is so great that our small intellect does not encompass him with its present faculties. Some day everything that relates to his essence and his persons will be clearly understood, for we shall see him as he is. When the light of glory shall have been diffused through our whole being, we shall study him adoringly and join enraptured with angels and archangels in the Thrice Holy, which Isaiah heard. Until then we subdue the skeptical spirit within us and defer also the eager questionings of our longing hearts of faith by wrapping ourselves up entirely in that view of the Trinity which represents Father, Son, and Spirit as a triple chain of love by which we are to be drawn from earth to heaven.

Victory Through Defeat

SATURDAY, May 25. Isa. 53:11. "He shall see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied." The mightiest victories have often followed the greatest defeats. Hannibal was at last conquered by the Fabian policy of carefully retreating before the Carthaginian army. George Washington, crossing the East River after the disastrous battle of Long Island and then retreating through New Jersey and to Valley Forge, insured the final Revolutionary victory.

It is not how a man comports himself after his victory, but how he bears defeats, that reveals his genius and nobility of manhood. Unyielding allegiance to the truth and no compromise with the enemy wins in the end.

General Grant replied to the question, "Do you think you are going to take Richmond?" by saying "No, I don't think—I know we will take Richmond." General Garfield exclaimed to the New York City mob, "Fellow citizens, clouds and darkness are round about him; justice and judgment are the habitation of his throne. God reigns and the government at Washington still lives." The vast multitude was transformed by such absolute faith in Almighty God when Abraham Lincoln, our leader, lay in his coffin.

Savonarola once said, "Do you ask me in general what will be the end of the conflict? I answer, Victory. But if you ask me in particular, I answer, death." Today reformers receive the jeers, tomorrow the cheers of mankind. Canonized today; canonized tomorrow. It was so on Calvary. Jesus exclaimed to his disciples, "Be of good cheer; I have overcome the world. I see the travail of my soul and am satisfied." And yet Gethsemane was at his feet; the mob on their way, the trial being prepared, the cross on the horizon, the sepulcher opening. Did he not behold that he was Victor over death, hell and the grave? Let the ages answer and tell what his blood bought, what his wounds paid, what his rising meant to humanity. He overcame the world while falling in apparent defeat on Calvary.

Seventeen Millions Buy Liberty Bonds

THE campaign for the Third Liberty Loan entered the final week with $2,283,301,850, 76 per cent. of the offering, subscribed. Liberty Loan committees all over the country, even in those states and towns where the quota was far exceeded, started out for a whirlwind finish that would not only pull up the total but would pile up an oversubscription that would be visible across the ocean. Almost at once the daily totals began to show a steady increase. On May 1 President Wilson, recognizing both the energy with which the campaign was being waged and the necessity for a new slogan, purchased an additional $50 bond, and the word was telegraphed from end to end of the nation that the Commander-in-Chief had bought another bond. In a little while a telegram came back from a little girl telling the President that she had "matched him." All over the nation "Match the President" clubs sprang up, not mushroom growths, but real enthusiastic clubs of people who had done and were still doing. By Friday morning, May 3, the Loan was over 90 per cent. subscribed, with the Chicago, Boston, San Francisco and Dallas Federal Reserve Districts running a neck-and-neck race to be the fourth to complete their quotas. Chicago won with Boston a close second. The city of St. Louis on May 3 became the first city of more than 500,000 population, rated according to the 1910 census, to reach its quota. In New York City the big banks, trust companies, and insurance companies, which had not been largely heard from, began to put in subscriptions of five, ten and fifteen million dollars apiece, some of them doubling subscriptions already made, while all the various committees took on renewed vigor as the city passed the 75 per cent. line.

At one o'clock on May 3 the Liberty Ball which started from Buffalo on April 6, completed its trip at the New York City Hall, being escorted from Yonkers by Boy Scouts, bands, soldiers, marines, and the cheering populace. In one office building of Manhattan an Italian boot-black sold more than $3,000 worth of bonds. With every $50 bond he gave away a shine. For, as he said, "We gotta backa de boys." Asked what was his commission, he replied, "No commish. Buy-a de Liberty Bond, I shine 'em free." Long before midday of May 3 it was evident that the $3,000,000,000 of the third Liberty Loan had been sold, and efforts of bond salesmen everywhere were concentrated on the oversubscription. The partial total announced on May 5 was $3,203,655,400, the subscription in the Federal Reserve Districts reaching the following percentages of their quotas: Minneapolis 133, St. Louis, 133, Kansas City 125, Chicago 110, Boston 125, San Francisco 102, Dallas 105, Philadelphia 110, Cleveland 94, Richmond 98, New York 101, and Atlanta 80. Later reports indicated that all the Federal Reserve districts had reached 100 per cent. of their quotas.

Ahmed Mirza, Shah of Persia, through the United States Minister at Teheran, applied for $100,000 worth of Liberty Bonds. The offer was taken to indicate both the wisdom of the Persian ruler and his friendly disposition toward the United States and its allies.

The final hours of the closing day of the Third Liberty Loan were marked by a tremendous upward move in subscriptions all over the country. Before the close of business the totals, including all districts throughout the country, showed subscriptions of $3,316,628,250. Yet these represented only the returns actually in the hands of incorporated banks and trust companies, whereas the fuller returns on Monday brought the total to $4,500,000,000. New York City went far beyond its $900,000,000 quota. There were seventeen million individual buyers in the Third Liberty Loan, being seven million more than in the second, thus setting a new record. Wide distribution of subscriptions among the farmers, the workers and the industrial classes generally, is a feature that gives immense satisfaction to the government, showing how heartily and generously the people are supporting our policy in the great war.

A Week in the World's News

AN ARMY OF 3,000,000. Following the cabinet meeting on April 30, it was announced that Secretary Baker would within a day or two lay before the Military Affairs Committee of the House plans for increasing the army to keep pace with the accelerated movements of troops to France. It was indi-

1,600,000 men, which would give a total of 3,200,000 men under arms. Secretary Baker, on May 2, transmitted to Congress a request of the President for authority to draft into service as many men as could be trained, equipped and transported to France; $15,000,000,000 was asked for to pay and equip the great Army which America must raise. The Secretary also requested that future draft quotas be based on the number of men in Class 1 in each district without regard to voluntary enlistments. For the present all available British and American transports are being used to carry men to France.

The Liberty Ball, somewhat battered but still rolling on like the bond sales, near the end of its journey, in New York on May 3 cated that the total strength of the army would be increased to 3,000,000 men, of whom 2,000,000 would be in France by January 1, 1919. On the same day Senator Smith offered a resolution, calling upon the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate to prepare a bill to provide 5,000,000 more men for the national army, while Senator Reed introduced a bill for the training of an additional 3,000,000 men, and Senator Poindexter presented a bill for the training of 1,500,000 in addition to those already provided for. Senator Reed declared that the present Selective Draft Law would not provide more than 2,500,000 men, and that this army was far short of the army America should have to make her part in the war effective. It was announced on May 1 that the War Department was now ready to equip an additional

On May 3 it was announced that the nation then had under arms, in training camps and in the field, 1,765,000 enlisted men and 120,000 officers; that the plans of the department contemplated an increase of these numbers to a total of 2,298,000 by July 1, 1918, and an army of 3,000,000 in the field by July 1, 1919. All the training camps will be greatly enlarged.

The total casualties reported for the week ending May 6th were: killed in action 70, died of wounds 16, died of disease 43, killed by accident, or other causes 23, wounded 499, missing 23. Marine losses were 1 killed, 3 dead of wounds, and 5 wounded.

RED TRIANGLE TORPEDOED. A party of fifty-seven Y. M. C. A. workers en route from New York to England on their way to France were landed in a British port in April 29, without their baggage. The vessel on which they sailed, the British liner Orissa, had been torpedoed on the preceding night. The ship sank in twelve minutes, but all of her passengers and crew, numbering about 250, were saved except three, two members of the crew who were caught below decks, and the ship's baker, who went back for his money belt.

MORE POWER TO THE PRESIDENT. The Senate, on April 29, passed by a vote of 63 to 13 the Overman bill, giving the President the power until six months after the end of the war to consolidate and co-ordinate executive bureaus and agencies of the Government.

KEEL TO AFLOAT IN 27 DAYS. The New York Shipbuilding Company's yard at Camden, N. J., on May 4, had 85 per cent. completed and ready for launching the 5500 ton steel cargo ship, the Tuckahoe. The time from keel to launching was 27 days, 2 hours and 55 minutes. The best previous record was 55 days made on an 8800 ton ship by Skinner & Eddy, at Seattle. The Tuckahoe was promised ready for cargo in 15 days after launching.

EQUAL FRANCHISE IN PRUSSIA. The process of franchise reform initiated in Prussia by the Kaiser last July reached a crisis on May 1, when the Prussian Diet took up for passage the new franchise bill based on the principle of one man, one vote. The preliminary voting indicated that the conservative elements in the Diet would adhere to their announced program and would defeat the measure, or amend it to provide for plural voting. It was announced that this would be followed by the election of the new Diet, since the Kaiser was determined to keep faith with the electors of the Empire.

SEBASTOPOL IN GERMAN HANDS. Berlin announced on May 2 that in the Ukraine they had broken enemy resistance before Sebastopol and had occupied the town on May 1 without fighting. Later reports told of penetration by German armies into the Donetz River coal basin. It was also rumored that the Germans had succeeded in capturing the Russian Black Sea fleet which escaped at Odessa. Other dispatches also showed the German military authorities ruling with a high hand in the Ukraine, where, on May 2, they had established military rule in Kiev, and had arrested a number of the members of the government, including the Minister of War, the official explanation being, "Our efforts to restore order met with insufficient support from the government, which moreover took no measures regarding the spring sowing to meet its treaty obligations." There was every evidence of a gathering of storm of rebellion in the Ukraine against her German guests turned masters.

GERMAN-FINNISH TROOPS DEFEAT RED GUARDS. Berlin reported, on May 3, that in southwestern Finland a five-day battle near Lakhti and Tavasthus had resulted in an overwhelming defeat of the Bolshevik Red Guard and the capture of 20,000 prisoners. This battle practically clears the former grand duchy of Bolshevik rebel troops, but apparently leaves Finland as completely in the grip of German military force as is the Ukraine.

OUR NAVY ABROAD. Franklin D. Roosevelt, Secretary of the Navy, in an address on May 3 said that America had then in European waters 150 warships, manned by between 40,000 and 50,000 sailors and marines, and that the fleet was being increased at the rate of almost one ship a day.

BRITAIN MAY BUY LIQUOR TRADE. English, Scotch and Irish committees appointed to investigate the purchasing by the state of the liquor traffic were reported on May 3 to have declared in

War in the Holy Places

THE Turk goes to war with much ceremony. His passage through Jerusalem on the way to his attack on Egypt was a memorable pageant which will be portrayed for us next week by an eyewitness, Professor Kemper Fullerton of Oberlin.

Next week also comes the first of the summer's short stories, in which McCrea, "Only a Snipe," becomes a hero.

Frank Carpenter's nose caught the trail of the cook's galley on a man-of-war, and he followed the scent until he got a lot of inside information about the navy. He tells it next week.

And next week also Rev. Paul Rader, who dared succeed Moody in his Chicago pulpit, spreads before us in an evangelistic sermon the Banquet of Redeeming Love.

Germany's Best Troops Meet Defeat

The battle line in Flanders, against which German assaults were broken

GERMANY'S furious drive, begun in the closing days of April and which threatened to encircle Ypres, and possibly even to penetrate to the coast, spent itself before any really vital results had been accomplished. The furthest advance made by Von Arnim's offensive had carried the Teutons to the eastern slopes of Monts Rouge and Scherpenberg. On Monday, April 29, the tide of battle turned. Von Arnim's advance was halted at almost every point. The German's were driven back from before Mont Rouge; Voormezele and Loere were completely recaptured by the Allies, and the forces that had threatened Ypres were thoroughly routed out of their lately captured positions by counter-attacks in which the British and French united. A line of wooded heights and villages which the Germans had held for a few days only, were again in Allied hands. It is believed that Gen. Foch who personally directed the movement, had heavily reinforced the British at the critical moment when the German drive had spent its force. The fighting during the combined counter-attacks is described as terrific, the Germans being heavily punished almost simultaneously in engagements along La Bassée Canal east of Bethune on the Belgian front, at Villers-Bretonneux and along the Bailleul-Ypres front. There is little doubt, however, that the lull will be followed by a renewed attempt in force to carry through the delayed German program, but whether in the sector which includes Ypres and Mont Kemmel, or on the salient of the Somme east of Amiens, is uncertain.

Prisoners taken by the Allies say that the Germans are running short of man power and are mustering in the 1920 class. Some of these boy troops are already at the front, although not used in the fighting.

The encounter at Villers-Bretonneux on April 30, when an American force repulsed a heavy German attack, capturing prisoners and causing considerable losses to the enemy in killed and wounded, is said to have been the first occasion in which our national army, in any considerable force, have had a part in the big battle which has raged since March 21 almost without intermission. The Americans were supported by French troops, but themselves bore the brunt of the attack, handling the Huns with the promptness and vigor of veterans. In this encounter the Germans were compelled to abandon their dead and wounded on the field.

The Story of the Fighting

GEN. VON ARNIM in command of the German 4th army met a disastrous defeat, on April 29, so disastrous that the following day saw such infantry actions as occurred initiated largely by the British and French. Along the front of about fifteen miles from Meteren west of Bailleul north to Zillebeke, two miles southeast of Ypres the Germans used in a desperate effort, repeated in constantly continuing assaults, to develop the success gained by the capture of Mont Kemmel, to envelop the Ypres and to drive the French and British from the three remaining heights west of Kemmel, Scherpenberg, Mont Noir and Mont Rouge. The village of Loere, lying at the entrance of the valley between Rouge and Scherpenberg had been captured by the Germans on Sunday and was in the partial possession of both sides on Monday morning. During the day it changed hands several times, the Germans being finally expelled from the village in the afternoon after a temporary penetration of the French line had permitted a few of their storm troops to set foot on the slopes of Scherpenberg and Rouge. French reserves quickly restored the situation and the French and British along the whole line fought the enemy to a standstill, carpeting the ground before their trenches with the gray eld bodies of his dead, and driving him back with a fierceness of fire that shattered his columns and decimated his ranks. The top of Kemmel was held under a concentrated artillery fire, making it useless to the enemy.

On Tuesday the Allies attacked and rectified their line in a number of places, pushing ahead nearly a mile east of Loere in the direction of Dranoutre. At the wood of Voormezele there was a fiercely contested battle throughout all of Monday, in which the German effort only resulted in a terrible slaughter. Further south along the highway from Kemmel to Laelytte, where British and French units joined hands, a desperate effort to drive a wedge between the lines of different tongues resulted only in the shattering of the wedge. The artillery exchange during the whole day was at an intensity equal to anything yet known in the war, the Germans also keeping under fire the British lines from the Searpe north to the neighborhood of Lens. An attack was also made on the Belgians north of Ypres, meeting with the same results as those further south. The artillery battle was also moderately intense along the whole front of the Flanders wedge, from Arras all away around to Noyon, at which latter place a German attack won some ground from the French which was regained by an immediate counter-attack.

The British report of casualties in April showed a total of 52,475, of whom 1,621 officers and 7,723 men were killed or died of wounds. The losses in March were 14,090. The British alone captured 1,061 Germans in March and 5,241 in April. Germany claims captures in excess of 6,000 in the Flanders fighting but the figures are not verified. What Germany's losses have been since the fight began on March 21 is not known, although some French observers estimate the total in the neighborhood of 500,000, a very close estimate based on losses of 2,200 each by 186 divisions placed the losses at 352,000. That Germany was feeling a shortage of manpower was evidenced by an ultimatum presented to the Russian Soviet Government, demanding that Russia return to Germany all German prisoners, except those incapacitated from wounds or illness in return for incapacitated Russian prisoners, Germany retaining all those Russian prisoners able to work whose labor is in part making possible her grand offensive.

American troops were officially reported in position on the Amiens front, on April 28. The part of the line taken over by the Americans was under heavy artillery fire as the exchange of troops was made, the American artillery first relieved their French compatriots, taking up, gun by gun, the duel of steel and explosives. When their artillery was in place, the infantry marched in with the bands playing and took over from the French the designated trenches which run within from 300 to 400 yards of the German line, the high ground being about evenly divided. The Americans were acting under the French High Command in which they have complete confidence.

Escaped prisoners and neutrals coming out of Germany were quoted by a correspondent of the New York Times, on April 29, to show that Germany was treating American prisoners more harshly than those of her other enemies; feeding them on starvation fare and exhibiting them throughout the country as a show for the civilians.

ALTHOUGH the fusing into one of the French, British and American armies in France has changed the nature of the front, so that it is all Allied and none of it distinctly British, French or American, certain portions of the fighting naturally fall more or less exclusively to the troops of one of the Allies. On May 1 the Germans attacked heavily the sector in the vicinity of Villers-Bretonneux, where for the two preceding days the British and their Allies had been gradually pushing back the enemy. The sector under attack was held by American troops. The bombardment opened at 5 o'clock in the afternoon, continuing for two hours at great intensity, being directed particularly against the Americans, who were supported on both flanks by the French. When the bombardment ceased three battalions of German infantry were thrust forward coming to hand to hand fighting all along the line. The enemy was, however, thrust back with no gain of territory, leaving many dead and wounded lying on the ground, the Americans taking five prisoners. The American losses were reported severe. All the positions occupied by American troops have been kept under intense artillery fire throughout the week hut, except on this one sector, no infantry activity beyond the usual clashes of patrols has been reported.

May 1 saw little activity on the Flanders battle ground. The Germans were busy burying their dead and removing their wounded, while the Allies were equally busy preparing for the next thrust which military men insisted the mathematics of the situation indicated must be expected. Local attacks enabled the British to improve their posi-

The Testing Time

HUMAN character is on trial in these eventful days that are now passing. It is a testing-time for nations, for communities, for individuals—a time which reveals whatever there is in each of us that is noble and enduring and worth while. It is a time when we can sit in judgment upon ourselves and estimate whether we stand for those things that are worth living and striving and suffering for; or for those that are base and ignoble. Conceal the verdict as we may from others, we cannot hide it from our own hearts. In that secret tribunal we must face approval or condemnation.

In a very special sense, this testing process has been suddenly quickened into life by the gigantic struggle of the nations. It involves the basic principle of Christianity, which is sacrifice. We have seen during the past year multitudes of our citizens responding to the call of the national defense. We have seen during these recent weeks millions of Americans pouring their wealth into the national treasury to help win a war against the spirit of world domination, which, if it were to triumph, would mean poverty, oppression and slavery, the destruction of humanity's noblest ideals, and the reversion of human progress to the days of barbarism, spiritual darkness and cruelty.

Little wonder is it, therefore, that Americans have responded universally to the call of the Liberty Loan. With our army of brave boys heroically facing death at the front, that the peoples of the world might have freedom, any other attitude was unthinkable. Our people, looking at the splendid courage of our sons and brothers over there, could not but be vividly reminded of the words of Him who said: "Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends."

Men are giving their lives for a great cause—the cause of righteousness and justice, the saving of the world from a tyranny that would make life in it intolerable. Nor is even one life given in vain; for every life lost has been given that we here in peaceful America may rest secure. Greater love we cannot ask. How can we repay it? We can never repay it directly, any more than we can repay the one great Sacrifice made for humanity long ago.

Yet though we cannot adequately repay the great love shown for us by these heroic souls, who laid down their lives with a smile, we can honor them by remembering their requests and seeing that others do not forget them. Often with their last breath they have pleaded that more ambulances, more hospital supplies be sent for those who remain to fight, and if necessary to die. We cannot ignore the sacrifices that have been made, and we cannot pay for them with a contribution of money, which involves no sacrifice on our part; yet we can show how glorious and noble we hold these sacrifices by aiding the government in its struggle for the cause for which our dear ones died—aiding it until we know that we are making a very real sacrifice, worthy of their example and of the high purpose in view. And we must work to induce others to do the same, even at the sacrifice of business or social interests.

When all has been done, no matter how much we may have given, we shall still feel that we have fallen far short of what we ought to have done. For our heroes who have gone gave their lives—their all—for our sake, leaving with us the example of love and loyalty and the fadeless remembrance of the courage that marched to battle with a song and faced death with a smile.

Restricting Public Information

A POSTAL "zone" system was abolished by Abraham Lincoln in 1863.

The principle has been condemned by United States Postal Commissions and postal experts.

Such a law was denounced by President Wilson when he was governor of New Jersey.

George Washington set the stamp of his condemnation upon it. In his fifth annual message to Congress Washington said:

"But here I cannot forbear to recommend a repeal of the tax on the transportation of public prints. There is no resource so firm for the government of the United States as the affections of the people, guided by an enlightened policy, and to this primary good nothing can conduce more than a faithful representation of public proceedings, diffused without restraint throughout the United States."

Despite these notable opinions, Congress has passed a law to hamper periodical reading during the war and after it by a postal "zone" system and a 50 to 900 per cent. postage increase!

The newspapers and magazines of this country are the chief educational agencies of our nation, and as such of supreme importance in our principles of government. The widest possible circulation of publications ought to be facilitated as a wise public policy.

This postal "zone" law would kill magazines and restrict their circulation in the greatest crisis that has ever confronted this nation since the American Revolution.

Woman's Great Task in the War

IN this great hour of the world's history, it is necessary that all women live greatly. At the battle-front they have performed prodigies of bravery, and some have even been decorated with the Cross of War for heroism under fire. You, too, would like to drive an ambulance and bring out the wounded under shell fire; but the work behind the lines is even more important. It is not the single act of heroism that will win the fight, but the steady sticking to the task in hand.

This is the message of the Food Administration to the women of America: Do not be confused; let nothing turn you aside. It is not a new task to which you are called, but the age-old task of feeding the family. Like the tribal women of old, we have sent forth our men children to war, and it falls to us to take up the great first task of feeding for the family. But unlike that tribal woman whose horizon was bounded by the tribal hunting-ground, our horizon is the world. Our family that must be fed is made up of the great nations whose armies, united under a single leader, are facing the enemy. For those women who have eyes to see, this is the coming back into a lost kingdom.

This year's campaign is a struggle of reserve against reserve; America is the last reserve; in overwhelming numbers our forces are being moved to the front; and behind the lines the women are asked to bring up their last reserves of energy and intelligence in the practical carrying out of food orders.

The food situation must steadily degenerate as long as the war lasts. It is therefore of prime importance to add every item to the total production. No woman with a foot of growing space at her disposal can afford to be merely a destroyer of rations, a dependent on the food supplies of a starving world. The Allied nations look to America for food. One object of the Food Administration is to bring as much food as possible under control and distribute these supplies where they are most needed.

America is today the careful guardian of the needs of the world. As the Food Administration anxiously counts the dwindling bushels of wheat, it asks of every woman, "To what extent can you make your home independent of this common store?" To make the home as independent as possible of the common food pool, from which the hungry world must be fed, is woman's great task. This one thing you must do, dropping every other. The real work of woman since we entered the war has been conservation. We must hold every position we took last year, and go forward to new ground this year. A food survey to determine the year's needs will help. Back up your gardening plan with a cellar and pantry plan. How many potatoes and how many beans will you need? How many jars of tomatoes; how many of peaches? Sit down with pencil and paper and make a definite plan, remembering that every woman's real war work is to make the home pantry as independent as possible of the world pantry. Take stock of what you used during the winter and what you have left on hand. Make an estimate of your grocery orders for the past winter, and plan this year to reduce these to a minimum by substituting your own products.

Here is a practical illustration which may help you:

Last fall, one clear-headed woman, who made a survey of a five-mile circuit, found she could get cornmeal, buckwheat and whole wheat flour from a neighboring mill. She canvassed the farmers and contracted for a winter supply of chickens, ducks, turkeys, guineas and rabbits, also some bacon and sausage, fresh fish and eels. When neighboring farmers killed a beef she bought a quarter, treated the family to fresh beef, canning and corning the rest. The sugar supply of her family of six she cut down to ten pounds a month, piecing out this allowance with sorghum and honey. During the long hard winter her only call on the overburdened railroad was for a little sugar, coffee, vegetable fats and seasonings. This was practical conservation, and her family was fed even better than usual.

The kind of patriotism that is most needed today is not the blare of trumpets, so much as the steady, day-by-day work which springs from intelligent insight and a lofty spirit.

The Infinite Love

WHO can fathom the depths of infinite love or describe the romance of the soul with Christ? The Bible gives comparisons of this ineffable union of the soul of man with Christ and the Father God, saying, "Like as a father loveth his children." "As one whom his mother comforteth." "How much more will your heavenly Father love and comfort you?" "Like as a bridegroom rejoiceth over his bride, so will thy God rejoice over thee." "Call me Ishi (that is, husband,) and I will betroth thee unto me forever." Human attachments are only little circles compared with the wide circumference of Almighty love.

To have Christ for your unchanging Friend, to be knit together in seamless union with him, is bliss beyond words to tell. It is to have the soul made a fit dwelling place for the King, a secret place of the Most High, where communions are enjoyed, prayers answered, sorrows soothed, sins cleansed away—a sacred sanctuary of seclusion where the Trinity dwells with man's soul. Can it be that a poor human becomes so exalted? Can we become like him in love, joy and peace, having our Lord's sympathy for humanity's needs, which are wide as the sea, deep as hell, and high as heaven?

At the marriage supper of the Lamb our union will be celebrated and Christ's last prayer answered, "Father, I will that they whom thou hast given me be with me where I am, that they may behold my glory and be one with us, as thou, Father, art in me and I in thee."

To Be on the Lord's Side

IT is well today to remember the words of Abraham Lincoln when he said, "I do not ask the Lord to be on our side, but I do pray that we may be on the Lord's side." Both sides may pray in war, but only one side can be right. The side that begins a war of aggression is in the wrong and must confess that wrong before it can stand on the side of right. When all are willing to be on the Lord's side, the war will cease. Right, instead of might, will prevail, and the spirit of brotherhood will be born on the ruins of the great conflict.

Men ask for victory amiss when they would consume the triumph upon their own lusts of gain and pride. Prayer must be according to the will of God, not prompted by our own selfish desires. God's will is right; his ways and thoughts are higher than ours. Christ came to do the will of Him that sent him, not to please himself nor to seek his own glory, but the glory of the Father God.

Unholy ambition wrecks instead of saving the world, seeking to make its own kingdom supreme rather than the kingdom of God. Our Lord came to bear witness to the truth, to save a race from the deadly disease of sin. Rulers of empire often rise upon the ruins of weaker peoples, building a throne on the foundation of human skulls. They turn an Eden of peace into a wilderness of war.

It is said that there are only two great beings in the universe, God and the soul. When trouble comes, the soul seeks shelter under the shadow of the wings of the Almighty, and there, offering up his prayers, rests in perfect security. To be on the Lord's side is to be in the ark of safety.

Swift Increase of Shipping

A TOTAL output of 240,000 tons of new shipping for the month of April was reported to the Shipping Board by Commissioner of Navigation Chamberlain. Two-thirds of the tonnage was constructed in the last half of the month.

At that rate the output of the year would approach three million tons, but Shipping Board officials are looking forward to much higher monthly totals as building gets under way.

A statement by the Board making public Mr. Chamberlain's report said:

"This total means that during the twenty-six working days in the month there were turned out on an average 9,000 tons of ship construction a day."

Such showing as this meets the highest calculations. The cry for "Ships, ships, more ships," is being answered. The increased tonnage necessary to carry our troops and provisions for them and the Allies is being supplied. American energy and efficiency prove up to expectations.

More and more shipping, coming fast and faster, will be the real and sure master of the destructive submarine.

Why Germany Can Not Rule the World

By REV. JAMES M. GRAY, D.D., Dean of the Moody Bible Institute of Chicago

I
FOR nearly one hundred years there lived in England a Bible teacher, seer and student of prophecy, named Benjamin Wills Newton. He died just prior to the present war at the ripe age of ninety. In 1855, during the progress of the Crimean War, he published a tractate to show, from the Scriptures, that the struggle between the Western Powers and Russia must result in the triumph of the former—a prophecy he saw fulfilled. The German Empire was not then in evidence, and indeed, the name of Germany is mentioned only once in the tractate; but if it were now re-written, and "Germany" substituted for "Russia" throughout its pages, few other changes would be needed to make it fit as perfectly into present conditions as it did into those of sixty odd years ago. In other words, the reason, fundamentally, why Russia could not control the world then, is the reason why Germany cannot control it now. The present article, though original in that its author is alone responsible for it, is nevertheless, in essence, the re-writing, though in much abridgment, of Mr. Newton's work.

II
EUROPE for a long while has been minus a controlling center, a balance of power. Prior to the present period, the will of Great Britain and France, unitedly expressed, was determinative of most European questions. But when the strength of France was impaired—as at the time of the Franco-Prussian war—no such controlling force remained. Gradually, however, France has been regaining her former position with England, and at the bottom of the present war is Germany's purpose to offset the results certain to follow in that case. But she cannot finally and permanently achieve her aim, not because she lacks the force, or the organization, or the advantage of temporary success, but because a higher Power than she or any other nation has decreed otherwise.

III
IT is the Divine prophecy recorded in Daniel 2 that enables one to speak thus confidently. It was given him of God at a time when controlling power was being withdrawn from his nation of Israel and committed by God to certain nations of the Gentiles. This power had been given to Israel away back in the days of Solomon, the son of David, but because of her transgressions it was now being transferred for the time being. This transfer, be it noted, was not to the other nations of the world indiscriminately, not to others who through their own strength might be able to grasp and retain it, but to certain and particular nations which God himself indicated and to which he gave, and would continue to give, the power to execute his will. These nations were symbolized in a colossal metal image seen in a dream by Nebuchadnezzar, the King of Babylon, and which Daniel the prophet was enlightened and empowered to interpret. Scripture itself identifies the nations that are meant—or rather empires, as we now call them—as being in succession, Babylon, Persia, Greece and Rome. For the supreme power of the first, compare Dan. 2:37, the second, Ezra 1:2, the third, Dan. 11:3, and the fourth, Luke 2:1.

Quoting Newton: "The sovereign controlling power of earth which was first vested in Nebuchadnezzar, King of Babylon, next in Cyrus of Persia, afterward in Alexander of Greece, descended at last to the emperors of Rome; and within the territory once ruled by them, that sovereign power resides, and there its home will be until the Gentile Image comes to an end and forgiven Jerusalem becomes the 'City of the Great King.'"

By the "Gentile Image," he means that image which Nebuchadnezzar saw in his dream, and the interpretation of which afforded the occasion of Daniel's prophecy. By "forgiven Jerusalem," he means the ancient city of Palestine, restored to Israel and occupied by her when she shall at length have become reconciled to God through the acceptance of the crucified Jesus as her Messiah.

"Accordingly," he goes on to say, "during all the rude shocks which the Roman Empire has received, the supreme determining power of earth has never left its boundary. Invading tribes have never succeeded in removing the seat of power outside its limits. Such tribes have either lost the authority they temporarily possessed, or else, in order to retain it, they have abandoned their primeval seats and sought a new home within the divinely prescribed area." This the Turks did when they left their primeval seats for Constantinople.

We may be pardoned a digression here to say that, while some Biblical scholars question the application of the fourth empire to Rome, nevertheless such has been the orthodox application from the beginning. It was early expressed by Josephus in his Jewish Antiquities, by a majority of the church fathers, by all the expositors of the Middle Ages, and by a majority of the moderns. Among these last some of the best known are Lange, Hengstenberg, Havernick, Hofmann, Keil, Gaussen, Auberlen, Kliefoth, Pusey, Barnes, Faussett and Tregelles. (Otto Zockler). The great Joseph Mede, an English theologian of the seventeenth century, first of his countrymen to attempt an explanation of the book of Revelation, places the application of the fourth empire to Rome as among the axioms of prophetic interpretation. "Having so good ground in Scripture," he says, "it is with me little less than an article of faith."

IV
NOW the point is that Germany, if we except the southwestern corner of her land, was not represented in Nebuchadnezzar's image; in other words, she never became a part of the Roman Empire. Hence the impossibility, as commentators hold, that she should be finally and permanently victorious over those nations which are so represented. That is not to say that she may not for a time be permitted, as a scourge, to successfully assail them, or even temporarily to occupy or control a portion of their territory as at the present moment; but this is something different from becoming the mistress of those nations, and holding through them the determinative power of the earth. There may be a long and difficult conflict still ahead, for the progress of events in the Divine calendar is sometimes hindered by things beyond our ken; but so far as the end is concerned, we can say with the inspired prophet, "The dream is certain and the interpretation thereof sure" (Dan. 2:45).

Speaking of the "things beyond our ken" recalls the mysterious tenth chapter of Daniel, where it is revealed that centuries ago, when, in the providence of God, the time had come for the Persian Empire to succeed the Babylonian in the place of power, the angel of God was sent to confirm and strengthen Persia, but was resisted and hindered by the powers of darkness for the space of twenty-one days. The representative of the powers of darkness in this case was called "the prince of the kingdom of Persia." It is true, in other words, that not only in an individual sense, but nationally as well, "we wrestle not against flesh and blood (merely), but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in heavenly places" (Eph. 6:12). These "heavenly places" are not those of which we conceive as the dwelling-place of the unveiled presence of God, of his holy angels, and the "spirits of just men made perfect," but those which for the time being are possessed by the evil angels and Satan who is at their head.

In the crisis of the Persian succession, Michael the chief prince, or the archangel, as we are told, came to help the angel of God against the spiritual "prince of the kingdom of Persia," and success followed; or, as the angel of God himself said to Daniel, "I remained there with the kings of Persia" (Dan. 10:13). There is an intimation in the same chapter that a similar spiritual conflict ensued in the region of the heavens when, later, the succession was about to pass from the Persian to the Grecian Empire; for Satan does not purpose that God shall have his way if he can prevent it. Little do we know, therefore, the seriousness of the warfare now raging in the "heavenly places" as well as on the battlefields of France.

Mr. Newton reminds us that just before the Roman Empire was established as the mistress of the world, it had to pass through one of its most severe and dangerous struggles with an earthly prince to whom the Kaiser may well be compared. Mithridates was his name, and his influence extended along the coast of the Black Sea to the Caspian. The prize contended for was Asia Minor and the East, the same as it is today. A terrible warfare was conducted, but he was overcome. And now, if the moment has arrived, as symbolized in the Gentile Image, when the limits of the Roman Empire are again to appear, may we not expect another struggle not unlike the first? The effectual revival of the East, and the recognized reappearance of the Roman nations there as well as in the West, would be a supreme step onward in the development of the Divine counsels, and we might well expect a tremendous political convulsion to precede it.

Another interesting point is this: that the Roman Empire and its predecessors in the Image have their historic existence in Scripture as long as they are employed in that which concerns Israel in Jerusalem. One of the objects for which they were called into power was that they might punish and "tread down" the Holy City. Therefore, as soon as Israel was dispersed after the siege of Jerusalem by Titus, A. D. 70, a long night began to fall on the Roman Empire, although the "iron" strength which was its heritage always remained somewhere within its boundaries. For this reason we may believe that when the Jews again return to Jerusalem in unbelief to reestablish their Holy City—and are not events pointing that way just now?—we shall once more behold the Roman nations in the divided form of the ten tribes of the Image, assuming a definite relation to it and to its people. Is it then unlikely, in view of all this, that the Roman nations now engaged against Germany shall successfully resist her?

It is recorded of John Bright that, when he was once tempted to turn back in his great reform movements, he said: "If we can't win as fast as we wish, we know that our opponents can't, in the long run, win at all." Then he gathered new courage and went on to victory. "Let us in our conflict," says another, "look up, cheer up, and go forward. Doing this, as surely as Christ has all authority in heaven and on earth, we shall finally and gloriously triumph."

A MOMENT OF POETRY

TWO GRAVES

WITH loving care his grave was made,
My lad who died so long ago,
And gently was his body laid
Where now the roses grow.

The peaceful dead sleep all around;
I tend the blossoms by his head;
My feet may press the hallowed ground,
So I am comforted.

He lies among the nameless dead,
My soldier-lad, across the sea;
I may not guard that lonely bed,
But God doth comfort me!

EMILY, PARET ATWATER.

UNAWARE

POPLAR catkins swaying in the breeze,
Burning blossoms on the maple trees,
Pussy willows soft and silver gleaming—
Sweet spring gifts to you and me are these.

Blackbird crying by the riverside,
Robin blithely calling for his bride,
Bluebird in his glorious garb a-winging—
All the gates of spring are open wide.

Frogs are shrilly piping in the brook,
Violets calling you to come and look,
Butterflies on golden wing a-flying—
Spring has softly crept to every nook.

Scents of pungent perfume in the air,
Farmers plowing furrows everywhere,
Hearts with hope renewed and courage mounting,
Spring has come upon us unaware.

"BEHOLD, THIS DREAMER COMETH"

COME, oaten pipe, a prelude play!
How shall the merry noise begin?
Shall it be "Jacob's Roundelay,"
Or tune I piped to scare away
The fears of little Benjamin?

The gardens that I daily view
In lovely Hebron's home-set vale
Are not so sweet, skies not so blue
As gardens dripping with the dew
Of Dreamland's moonlit, dusky dale.

These meadows where I tend the sheep
On Shechem's wondrous fertile plain,
Hold not the joy that meadows keep
Where, watered by the river Sleep,
Grow Dreamland fields of golden grain.

Perchance the dells of Dothan throw
A fonder fragrance to the breeze;
I journey thence, but well I know
That Dreamland I would not bestow
For any one, nor all, of these.

Come, oaten pipe, here on these leaves
Let us in noontide peace repose. . . .
Again! . . . sun, moon, and stars . . . and sheaves! . . .
Why is it that my father grieves? . . .
Pit . . . Egypt . . . fame . . . what dream-wind blows! . . .

A Western Prophet Comes East

NELS THOMPSON, a Pacific Coast evangelist, housed in a "Gospel fort," mounted upon a truck, was at Seattle in April preparing for a "drive on the East," with "wicked Gotham" as his destination. He preaches "the old-fashioned Gospel" of "quit your meanness and repent," and a large number of persons in California, Oregon and Washington have been converted by his appeals.

"Billy Sunday does his work in his own way, effectively," said Mr. Thompson, at Seattle, "but I preach to more people, perhaps, and my service is the most economical. Billy must have a costly campaign and tabernacle, with a great corps of workers. He preaches to 15,000 or 20,000 upon occasions. I require no help except the help of God, and within an hour or two, in the centers of population, I reach with the Gospel from 15,000 to 25,000 persons. The number is far greater, indeed, including the thousands who read the Gospel as it is emblazoned upon the walls of my Gospel car."

There's nothing particularly new about the Gospel car, but Nels Thompson is a new kind of evangelist. He adheres to no creed, but preaches "Christ and him crucified for the sins of the world." He never asks for money, never takes up a collection, and that's his new feature of evangelistic work. On occasions in San Francisco, Portland and Seattle men have offered handfuls of money to the preacher, urging him to take it and use it for good work, but in every such case the money is refused! for the preacher said, "for I don't believe in the public financing of God's cause. I don't believe, either, that the money of sinners, acquired in sinful ways, is acceptable as an offering to God. I never accept it. Neither do I ever worry about money, for I have God's promise that he will provide for my wants, and he always does. I never give a moment's thought to the financial needs of tomorrow. 'Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof.'"

"I'M the living embodiment of the promises of God," continued the preacher. "I was never down and out, but six years ago an angel's whisper halted me in my career of sin, and I purchased a Bible. I read its record, its promises. I recognized it as the Word of God. I determined to repent, to right-about face, to serve God rather than the devil. For years I had been a gambler, always 'successful' as success is counted among men who 'follow the ponies.' My winnings were large, sometimes. But money failed to satisfy the longing of my soul. The joys of sin turned to ashes, and I found myself, in my regard, the chief of sinners. I implored God's forgiveness, through the mediation of Christ. I walked with and talked with Jesus as with a powerful Elder Brother. I humbly obeyed his loving advice. I was converted.

"God provided means and I built this Gospel fort on wheels, determined to spread the Gospel, the truth that had brought me freedom and light. From that day I have been happy, because I was increasingly useful in God's cause. I am going in the summer to the great Eastern centers, visiting Chicago and New York. I am engaged in mobilizing men and women for heaven—a heaven on earth and hereafter."

Thompson is a typical fighting man, of Danish nationality, for years an admirer and backer of "Battling" Nelson, the prizefighter. His methods of crusading resemble Nelson's system of fighting. He never gets "punishment" enough. He fights all odds and refuses to recognize "insuperable obstacles." Crossing the mountains near Roseburg, Oregon, Thompson was advised by highway workers that his 6,000 ton truck could not negotiate the steep grades in safety; that he probably would be hurled over one of the great cliffs. They told him of a fatal attempt made by a truck owned by the highway commission, a day or two before, when it went over a precipice, killing four men. Thompson's handsome young wife and two small children were in the "drawing-room" of his car. He joined them in a brief prayer. "We shall go over in safety," he said, "for Jesus is with us." Observers called out for him not to attempt such a "fool-hardy feat." But Thompson disregarded them and crossed in safety—the first big truck to perform the stunt.

"It is a miracle you weren't killed!" said an admiring observer.

"God is performing miracles every day, using me as his humble and eager servant," was the preacher's reply. "God will perform miracles in your life, if you will let him," and the man stood open-mouthed and listened to the Gospel.

In the congested centers of population Thompson stands under a sounding-board upon the rear platform of his car and halts every one within sound of his musical voice, calling sinners to repentance. He quotes the Bible with terrific intensity and dramatic effect. For example, every hearer halts and listens when the clarion voice rings out: "Behold the Lamb of God who taketh away the sin of the world!" He talks to men in a manner that compels attention and frequently warns them of the penalty of neglect. "He that is often reproved, but hardeneth his neck, shall be suddenly destroyed, and that without remedy!" he proclaims, and the crowds listen to the preacher's startling explanation of the warning.

New York has been "assaulted" by Moody, Sunday, and dozens of other religious workers, but never has seen a worker possessing greater zeal than this fiery "St. Paul of the Pacific."

"The devil is in no particular place," said Thompson, "maintains no special grand headquarters, but is everywhere and in all forms. He is the evil spirit stirring up hatred and strife and filling the world with woes. He is a weakling, however, in comparison with God. Resist him and he will flee from you. Good is many times stronger than evil. Love is all-powerful, and 'God is love.'"

Such is the preacher and his Gospel. "I appeal to the highest motives to which men will respond," he said. "I try to convince them that Jesus is the best Friend that man ever had, that he died for the ungodly. When they are convinced of the truth, they surrender. The work is easy. 'My yoke is easy and my burden is light.'"

The outstanding fact concerning Thompson is that he is not after money. He will not accept any, except from private Christian sources, and then only enough to supply his meager wants. With his family he lives in the Gospel fort. It has three "rooms," well furnished, including a library well stocked with books. The living-room has been the scene of countless special prayers and the conversion of many sinners—a scene of rejoicing each time.

ALL observers of Thompson's unique methods declare their belief that he will achieve fame and distinction in his lifework. In Tacoma, Seattle, Portland and other Pacific cities he preached in the leading churches by special invitation. He never seeks invitations, however. "My divine Master directs me in everything, every day," he said, "and will be with me always in this world and the next." His faith is simple, like that of a child, and he has a peculiarly effective talent for inspiring the same kind of faith in others.

"That man is a great preacher!" said a prominent sinner at Seattle, after listening to Thompson's soul-stirring appeal, and tears suffused his eyes as he said it. "That's the first preacher that ever got my goat—the first one that has made me listen in forty years," he added; "and, boys, he is right! Listen to him; Follow him."—G. P. NORTON.

Bible Class of the 37th Squadron, 3d Provisional Regiment A. S. S. C. Waco, Texas

REV. JAMES B. ELY, founder of the widely known Lemon Hill Evangelistic work in Philadelphia, was commissioned by the War Work Council of New York to do special service in the camps of the Southwest. His labors have included Camp McArthur at Waco, Texas, the Aviation Camp at the same place, Camp Bowie at Fort Worth, and several others. Specially valuable results have been obtained through the organization of Bible Classes. These classes are now growing in number in many of the camps, and in several there is a Bible Class for each squadron. Waco Aviation Camp has now sixty-four of these classes. Thousands of soldiers have enlisted in systematic Bible Study. Commanding officers have given a hearty approval to the work, which is raising the moral tone of the camps and adding to the efficiency of the men.

Among the Workers

THE Moody Bible Institute of Chicago announces a Special Summer Music Course for the Evangelistic Singer and Player, for the six weeks extending from June 26 to August 7. It is for the benefit of pastors, evangelists, theological students, missionaries on furlough, superintendents of Sunday schools, leaders of Young People's Societies and other Christian workers wishing to become more efficient in service.

A GREAT work of grace has been done at Berea College, Berea, Ky., under the leadership of Dr. M. B. Williams, president of the Interdenominational Association of Evangelists, and at present acting as special religious work director in Camp Zachary Taylor, Kentucky. One of the professors in the college says it was the greatest series of meetings Berea has ever had. There were over five hundred converts, and a great many Christians were awakened and set to active Christian work. The lectures and sermons by Dr. Williams have given many a new faith in God, the Bible, and the power of a living Christ.

DR. CHARLES L. GOODSELL, of New York, preached his last sermon in St. Paul's M. E. Church in that city on the evening of March 31, announcing that he would devote his efforts to religious work in the military camps for the duration of the war, and would "if necessary go to the trenches." Dr. Goodsell had already spent four months as Director of Religious Work at Camp Meade. He has spent twenty-one years in various Methodist pulpits in Greater New York and was chairman of the committee which brought Billy Sunday to New York.

THE War Work of the Salvation Army is taxing that organization's supply of men and women to the limit and they are now appealing outside their own ranks for workers. Like other organizations, the Salvation Army has had to yield its quota to the Armies of the Allies. Over 40,000 of its workers are with the military forces. In ordinary times, the chief problem of the Salvation Army is to find workers willing to toil long, with but little earthly remuneration. Now the draft of war need comes, and to stretch thin ranks to cover the wide front is a serious business. They have managed to commission 800 for service, but the problem of the supply of men and women puzzles them. It is hoped that a sufficient supply of like-minded men and women will be found to carry forward the blessed work.

THE Union Evangelical Church of Corona, Long Island, N. Y., has given its pastor, Rev. William Jay Peek, a vacation with pay until recovery from illness. He was smitten with apoplexy, February 5, and is now slowly recovering. He has been for many years a contributor to the Christian Herald, and a great traveler. He has been pastor of the Corona church for thirty-seven years and has had wide experience in mission work. He is the author of the New Protestant Catechism.

THE New Jersey Sunday School Association will conduct its summer school for the twenty-fifth consecutive session, in the high school building at Asbury Park, N. J., July 6 to 13. The school was founded in 1894 by E. Morris Ferguson, D.D., who was general secretary for New Jersey for more than seventeen years. The attendance last year reached 427, the largest number ever present.

Christian Unity Where Most Needed

By REV. ROY B. GUILD, Executive Secretary Commission on Interchurch Federations

THE truest test of the spirit of Christian unity about which we hear and read so much is the merging of two or more churches in the over-churching town into one, or the union of the communicants of many communions into a single community church.

We do well in these days to listen to the words of the Rev. Lanchlan McLean Watt, chaplain of the Gordon Highlanders and the Black Watch, who has come to be known as the "piping parson" for his ability to play the bagpipes. Speaking of the soldiers whom we wish to welcome back to the church when the war is over he said:

I tell you we soldiers are tired of your divisions at home. We are tired of your squabbles in the name of Christ. After the war we are not going to return to our old shibboleths that divided us. There is no bigotry in martial religion. . . . We buried the Baptist, Methodist, Catholic, Presbyterian side by side and let God sort them out.

Has not the time come when these can worship and work together this side of the grave and by their unity of spirit and service hasten the answer to the prayer of the Saviour "that the world may believe"?

The example of the Methodist and Congregational churches in Waterbury, Vermont, may be followed in thousands of places with profit to all concerned. These two churches federated for the duration of the war. The Congregational minister is serving in France and the Methodist minister is caring for the combined church. After several months' experience, the following laconic report is suggestive: "Results—Larger congregations than the joint congregation before. Larger Sunday schools. Enthusiasm of members. Good community spirit and the church actually serves. Thus far our experiment is working out to the advantage of the community and of both churches."

The plan which in this case is proving to be good for the period of the war has proved in other places to be good for war and peace. Some five years ago a cyclone swept through Dublin, Ohio, severely damaging two of the churches. On Sunday the people held a thanksgiving service in a third church which was left intact. Before the storm the total membership of the three churches was one hundred and twenty-three. After the storm the congregations formed one church becoming affiliated with a denomination not represented before in Dublin, so that there would be no ill will. In one single year the community church had grown to be twice as large as all three churches were before. A united church can be a soul-winning church.

THERE are three methods by which the Christians of any locality may make Christian unity a reality. The most common method is the one that is adopted in new communities when the first church is organized. The Christians band themselves together in a union church. It has no denominational name or relations. One weakness of this plan is that as the town grows this church becomes the corral where missionary secretaries "cut out" those having the denominational brand and put them into a separate lot.

A more serious weakness is well stated in the answer received in a questionnaire sent to a number of such churches. This defect does not counterbalance the advantages in a union church.

Church is growing rapidly, ninety per cent. increase last year. Income almost doubled in two years. Growing respect in the community. General satisfaction with Union Church. Hough's Neck is a part of the city of Quincy, located on a neck of land three miles from the city proper. Began as a summer resort (on harbor front) and still is, but is rapidly becoming winter residence place. Union Church apparently only solution of church problem for some time to come. No difficulty over belief, question almost never arises. Differences of opinion are not over denominational problems but local matters such as all churches meet. Quite ideal except for lack of the larger denominational connections. This, I am convinced, is the great weakness of the Union Church. People are liable to grow selfish and content themselves with their own little community. This has been partly due here to the smallness of the church, which has made the meeting of local expenses difficult. Perhaps it can be remedied as the church grows. But where there are so many denominations represented it is difficult to know where to send one's benevolence collections.

As I said before, there is no difficulty over denominational questions. Two Baptists are as apt to fall out with one another as are a Baptist and an Episcopalian.

I have learned this also: that no church has a monopoly of good Christians; there are as many good workers from one as from another. Among our Sunday school teachers are Baptists, Episcopalians, Methodists, Lutherans, Presbyterians, and Congregationalists, and from their work no one could tell which was which. Denominational lines seem to be almost entirely forgotten, though there are several who retain connection with their denominational church and help in its support. I think it would be impossible for one to belong to this church for any length of time and retain any denominational prejudice. It is very seldom that any one refuses to join on the ground that the church is a Union Church, though we have a few, an increasingly small number, who work in the church but do not join it.

THE second method by which practical Christian unity is accomplished is the formation of a federated church. This offers a way for the union of two or

A Characteristic Letter From the Daily Mail of the Commission on Interchurch Federations

THE three weak Protestant churches—Baptist, Methodist and Presbyterian—in this village are desirous to unite and form a strong union church in order to meet the social, moral and religious needs of this community.

They do not know how to effect such a union without depriving them of the responsibility and inspiration of their denominational fellowship.

Can you suggest a plan for such a union that has been tried and found practical?

Greatly appreciating a reply from you, I am more churches already organized. By this plan a church preserves its denominational entity and relationship but co-operates with one or more churches by the election of joint officers who look after the employment of a pastor and the maintenance of the local work. New members are received into the branch of the church they choose so that they may have regular ecclesiastical standing if they move to another town. Missionary contributions are sent to the missionary societies as they were sent before the churches were federated. Delegates are sent to the respective ecclesiastical gatherings. In one federated church the pastor joined the three churches in the combination that he might attend all the conventions and represent the churches. A weakness of the federated church lies in the fact that it is a sort of a trial marriage which can be annulled at any time.

The answers to two questions asked of a number of such churches make it evident, however, that it is an improvement upon the former condition. A few of the replies are very illuminating.

Most interesting are the reports of the results. In practically all cases there has been an increase in membership. Also in contributions for missionary work which are sent when designated to the missionary societies of the churches in the federation. When not designated they are usually divided between them. More encouraging still is the fact that the federated church is self-supporting, whereas one or both were often recipients of missionary aid before they were federated.

Another splendid result from the close fellowship thus established has been the influence upon the community as can be noted from such statements as these.

What the Community Gained

1. Federation saves paying two pastors and keeping two church buildings, when one is sufficient. It makes the public more willing to aid.

2. The congregation being more than doubled, there is more enthusiasm and willing to work.

3. It has silenced the criticism that the churches are competing instead of cooperating.

4. The economic and fraternal features of federation appeal to the public and bring into line people who did not patronize either church before.

The new plan has met a real need in the community and the people respond accordingly.

We combine the leadership both to the advantage of the church and the community.

Since the federation of the two churches the Union Church has been the dynamic center of the village and has been the leader in all movements for community betterment. This is a well-known fact in the community.

THE remarks made by those who are engaged in making federated churches serve the communities in which they are situated are rich in suggestion for those who are seeking light on this subject. They reveal the advantages and the disadvantages, the strength and the weakness. It should be especially noted that they indicate a tendency on the part of federated churches to blend eventually into one church.

"Good fellowship in the church. We are one church. No disposition to get the best of each other. Baptists attend Disciple conventions and Disciples attend Baptist conventions.

The outlook is good. I see no reason why the church shall not continue to grow. I notice this: there is a gradual gravitation toward absolute and permanent union. This step could be taken were it not for a few of the older members of the church who still cling to their denominational teaching. Absolute union is the ultimate solution of the problem here as it is elsewhere. Federation is only temporary.

The third method of unifying the Christian forces of a village or section of a city is the organizing of a church which is union in character but is affiliated with some one denomination. The name of Community Church is being applied increasingly to such a church to distinguish it from the ordinary union church and federated church. Such a church can more easily secure a minister; it is helped in times of need by the administrative care of some ecclesiastical body, and is vitally connected with a world-wide program. To give the greatest freedom there are two classes of members. The first are regular members as in any other denominational church. The second are affiliated members. While remaining members in the church to which they already belong, they become affiliated or associate members of this church, having all the privileges of the regular members. The one limitation is that the majority of the officers of the church must be chosen from the regular membership.

A VERY comprehensive definition of a community church has been adopted by one denominational district body, and its churches are urged to cooperate in effecting such organizations in their several communities.

A community church is a fellowship of all those in a community who are professed followers of Jesus Christ and as such, while they may retain their denominational faith, are united to furnish a medium through which they may foster his spirit and advance his purpose.

It seeks to further the Kingdom of God everywhere, and selects and commends worthy enterprises for support without primary regard to the denominational or other auspices under which they may be conducted, and engages to transmit contributions to such denominational agencies as the givers, by groups or individuals, may designate.

It usually has ecclesiastical connection with one of the established religious bodies, and when so related there are mutual engagements of fidelity to the community spirit and program.

A community church has recently been organized in Morgan Park, Minnesota, the town recently developed by the United States Steel Corporation.

Many denominations wished to secure sites and assistance for erecting churches. In accordance with a suggested plan the matter was referred to an interdenominational committee, the desire being expressed that one large church, adequately equipped and well manned, having denominational affiliation, be erected. After months of careful study and conference an officer of the United States Steel Corporation writes as follows:

The residents of Morgan Park formed a committee to take up the question of a community church. This committee consisted of two representatives of each denomination represented in the Park. At their last meeting the committee unanimously declared itself in favor of the community church organized according to the laws of the Congregational Church. Studies are being made now with a view to preparing plans for a suitable church for this purpose. These plans ought to be ready and the building operations started some time in the early spring.

At the Pittsburg Congress on the Purpose and Methods of Interchurch Federations more interest was manifested in the discussion of Christian unity than in any other subject. For many hours laymen, ministers, missionary officers and secretaries discussed the problem of the community church. The following resolution was prepared by this group and approved by the members of the Congress:

This Congress rejoices in the rapid growth of community churches and believes that to new communities and to older towns and villages where the church life has declined, this type of organization offers assurance of enlarged church membership, spiritual strength and a new social vision. Each and every evangelical denomination is urged to encourage the organization of these churches and to adjust its policies so as to admit them into its fellowship with recognition of their character as designed to serve the spiritual interests of the whole community.

THE most encouraging fact connected with the present tendency is that in a number of states the home missionary superintendents, synodical missionaries, district superintendents and others made responsible for church extension work are uniting in the forming of home missions councils patterned after the National Home Missions Council. The state officials have the greatest responsibility for the locating of new churches and relocating or closing churches already established. There have been interdenominational organizations in Maine, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Colorado and Western Washington. During the last year a very strong one has been formed in Southern California. The missionary secretaries in Vermont have recently formed a council. By the last of March there will be a strong council in Illinois. Several cities have followed the plan for city work. In New York City, Cleveland, Detroit, Chicago, Denver, new churches are located in accordance with agreement with the officials of the several denominations in the Council. Little has been known of this splendid movement, which may give wise guidance to the war-time discontent with present conditions.

THE American Red Cross has donated 5,000,000 francs (approximately $1,000,000) to the soldier families of France who have suffered most from the war. The donation will be made in allotments of 100 francs ($20) to each family. Many letters have come from generals, senators, and presidents of departmental councils; and especially hundreds from those to whom the money means the vital necessities of life show how deeply the heart of the French nation has been touched by this evidence of the friendship of the American people.

The Pink Gingham Gown

By
MARGARET E. SANGSTER

THERE goes Maisie Kent in a new pink gingham!" Mis' Thompson paused with her hand on the ironing-board and stared frankly out of the window. "That girl has more dresses! Somehow, it don't seem quite right she should come out in summer clothes so soon."

The little faded figure in the wheel-chair pulled the curtain aside with a trembling old hand.

"But it's right pretty, ain't it?" she answered. "Looks sorter spring-like—"

Mis' Thompson slapped her iron down on the towel she was pressing—slapped it down with quite unnecessary vigor. "Well, why shouldn't it look spring-like!" she questioned tartly. "Ain't it Maytime? Don't things usually look spring-like in Maytime? That don't make it any righter that she should rush the seasons—an' a war goin' on! Seems like with a trainin' camp only twelve miles away she'd be thinkin' o' more serious things!"

The little figure in the wheel-chair sighed, and ignored the last part of Mis' Thompson's speech. "It don't look very spring-like in here, Hettie," she answered the first part, "now does it!"

Gloomily Mis' Thompson surveyed the kitchen with its white table, and its orderly cupboard, and its shining stove. She kicked a stray breadcrumb into the wood-box before she answered.

"Why, no, it don't," she said, for she was ultra fair; "not but what its neat an' clean!" she added hastily.

THE figure in the wheel-chair laughed. It was a strangely young laugh for one with such a lined face.

"Land, Hettie," she chuckled softly, "you always was such a hand to have things spick and span that you never had time to have 'em beautiful. I remember when you was a little girl, an' I wanted your room done in rosebud paper, that you spoke for plastered walls—cause they'd wash off an' wouldn't fade! An' there never was enough flowers in th' house"—the old voice took on a plaintive note—"cause they cluttered up."

Mis' Thompson took her iron back to the stove. The towel she folded carefully on the table. With great care she selected another iron, paused and put it back again.

"I guess," she said slowly, "that I won't finish my ironin' today. It's only Monday. I got all week." "Why," the woman in the wheel-chair gasped, and audibly, "why, Hettie! I never knew you to leave yer ironin' over. I ain't said nothin' to hurt yer feelin's, have I? 'Cause you're always been th' best daughter to me—"

Mis' Thompson was putting aside the ironing-board. "No, mother," she answered, "you ain't said nothin' to hurt me. But you've said some truth. I ain't never had enough beauty in my life an' I reckon I kept it out of your life, too. Neatness ain't everything—" She stood the ironing-board in the corner behind the door before she went on. "Well get our bonnets an' we'll go for a drive through the country—that's what we'll do. It'll be real pretty with the trees all in blossom."

The little figure in the wheel-chair straightened almost miraculously and a faint flush played across her thin cheeks.

"Won't a hired rig cost a lot in this war times?" she questioned. "Not but what I'd love ter go!" she breathed wistfully.

"I reckon I can manage," answered her daughter; "we don't have so much!"

THE drive through the country was pretty. The dogwood trees were in bloom and the faint rose color of wild apple-blossoms brought a new life and a new romance to the roadside. The little crippled mother, her quick eyes darting from one side of the way to the other, grew momentarily younger and Mis' Thompson, holding the reins of the hired horse, seemed to enjoy the responsibility of driving. They didn't say much, but once; when they passed a bank blue with violets, the little old lady sighed with a sudden rapture.

"Don't seem," Mis' Thompson answered the sigh, "that there can be a away from it! The train won't take yer that way."

The boy's mouth dropped into sullen lines.

"I don't wanta go back!" he growled. Suddenly he put his foot on the step. "An' you're goin' ter take me t' th' station."

Mis' Thompson surveyed him with the flicker of scorn just touching her thin lips—

"My land! A deserter!" she ejaculated. "My land! What're ye desertin' fer?"

The boy settled himself savagely into the rig. He sat on the floor of it. "You drive ter the station," he muttered savagely. "an' no funny business! I'm goin' ter get out of it! I'm through!"

Mis' Thompson swung the horse

"You don't know," he told the two women, "what it's like. They're takin' us Over There ter be shot at—that's what they're doin'!"

"An' too good fer you!" It was Mis' Thompson's hard voice that broke in. "How'd you like it," the boy's tone rose shrilly, "how'd you like it—ter be shot at an' lef' ter—ter—"

It was the little crippled lady who interrupted. She spoke softly.

"Poor boy!" she said, and her frail hand touched his sleeve. "Poor boy! He's afraid!"

The boy turned fiercely until he could look in to the speaker's face. It was a very old face, and it was lined with the marks of pain and of age. The fierceness died suddenly out of the boy's eyes, and his mouth quivered.

All at once he bowed his head in his arms. "I am!" he sobbed. "I am!"

OVER the top of his military hat the little lady met the stern gaze of her daughter. With her finger on her lips she motioned for silence.

The boy's face was still in his hands.

"I'm scared," he went on brokenly, "I'm a coward. But it seemed like I couldn't go on with it. I was never the fighter the others were—an' they knew it! When they found out that they could lick me—they did—An' I don't wan' t' die!"

The little old lady spoke. Her voice was soft.

"You ain't a-goin' ter die," she told the boy, "not without a fair chance. An' yer a-goin' back, too. You don't want that they should say that they was right—that you was a coward! You go back an' show 'em that you're not. If any one tries ter hit you, you hit back! It ain't no disgrace ter be knocked out so long as you know you're a-tryin'. If they say that yer going ter get killed you say, 'Not afore I kill some o' th' enemy!'"

"My father an' my husband both went ter th' Civil War. She"—her hand pointed to her daughter, "was a baby then. I didn't cry. I said, 'You go!' They didn't come back, neither." The brave voice faltered for a minute. "You wouldn't want that I, a woman, should show more nerve'n you!"

The boy had raised his head. "I guess," he said, "yer right. I shouldn't have let them scare me. I should've acted like a man. But—I didn't. . . ." He sobbed suddenly.

The little old lady's hand was on his shoulder. "It ain't too late," she said. "It ain't too late! You get back ter camp now an' play th' game straight! Don't let those other fellers say yer yellow!"

The boy's hand reached up, touched the old fingers, "I'll try," he promised.

"But they'll miss me when 'Retreat' sounds," he said with sudden bitterness, "an' it's four-thirty now. It's near ten miles, an' I can't make it!"

Mis' Thompson spoke. Smartly she slapped the reins over the horse's back.

"We're not more'n two miles from th' camp now. That road I turned inter was a short cut."

All about them the roadside was beautiful with the pink of wild-apple blossoms and the white of dogwood!

THAT night a certain girl hung a gay-colored gingham frock carefully on a hook in her closet.

"Seems like it's early to wear gingham, they're so summery!" she told herself. And then she smiled. "But it's Maytime!" she said softly.

May Song

*First Love and Maytime and flowers in the lane
First Love and Maytime they never come again.
But still the flowers blossom, serene and calm and fair,
And softly still the sun shines that shone upon your hair.*

*First Love in gingham, do you wear satins now?
First Love with your hair blown in curls upon your brow
A kiss as light as white foam upon a smiling sea,
A kiss as fresh as springtime and given, dear, to me*

*First Love, you've gone far - the world is very wide!
But I can hear your laughter, it's flute-like at my side.
And I can hear you singing the song we used to know
A song as sweet as spring winds that murmur as they blow.*

*First Love and Maytime - the lane's a bank of flowers!
Do you still remember the golden childish hours?
Gone is the winter-time gone are fear and pain,
First Love and Maytime will you come again?*

war goin' on, does it? This here looks so peaceful like."

There was a sudden rustle in the small trees by the roadside, and a man stepped out in front of the horse. His face was white in contrast to the khaki of his coat.

"Stop, there!" he commanded.

Mis' Thompson reined in the hired horse with a certain deliberation. Although she did not formulate the thought, she could not help feeling that the man was an open answer to her challenge. She had said that the world seemed peaceful—that a war didn't seem possible. And here was a man in the mud-stained colors of war itself.

"What do you want?" she questioned.

The man—scarcely more than a boy he was—came to the side of the rig. He laid his hand on the wheel.

"I want you should take me to a station, quick," he told her, "I wanta get out of here, an' I don't know the way."

"Yer from th' trainin'-camp—yonder?" quavered the little old lady. She pointed a withered hand toward a row of hills. "Yer near onto ten miles around in silence—cut down a side road.

"Yer makin' a mistake," she said at last, and primly. "This here war's gotta be fought out. You'd oughter help!"

"It ain't my war," said the boy sullenly.

The hired horse gathered speed.

"What was yer plannin' ter do," questioned the little crippled lady, "when yer get ter th' station?"

"I'm goin' ter take a train," the boy told her, "anywhere. They won't begin ter hunt fer me till they miss me, an' they won't miss me till 'Retreat'—that's at five-thirty!"

"Yes," Mis' Thompson's voice was sharp. "Yes, you'll take a train—anywhere. But you'll never forget that yer ain't done yer part. You'll always feel yer a sneakin' slacker. You'll go through life ashamed—if they don't catch yer first!"

WAS it the sunlight that made the boy's eyes falter! Perhaps. But he was very young, and he tried to justify himself.

Questions and Answers

M. L. H., Memphis, Tenn. 1. "Thy Kingdom come" in the Lord's prayer is a petition that the kingdom of God may come unto us. This is effected when our heavenly Father gives us his Holy Spirit so that by grace we believe his holy Word and lead a godly life here below and inherit the Kingdom hereafter. In the petition there is meant chiefly that Kingdom of grace and glory in which we have redemption from our sins through the blood of Christ (Col. 1:12-14). To help in this, it is incumbent on us to take heed that the devil's kingdom be not strengthened among us by an ungodly or unbelieving life; that we exert ourselves to spread abroad the Word of God and to extend the Church, so that an increasing number of souls may be converted to God and be saved. See Luke 22:32; James 5:19, 20. 2. The universal Fatherhood of God is a basic Christian doctrine. We are all his children, because he created us, adopted us in his dear Son as his "own children," and embraces us with his paternal love and providence and supplies us with all necessities as a father does his children. There is no doubt of this. See Eph. 3:14-15; Mal. 2:10; Deut. 32:6; John 1:12.

W. C. R., Breezewood, Pa. Luke 4:2 seems to imply that the tempter had been working on our Lord during the forty days fast. Matthew's and Mark's accounts do not say as much. In Matthew 4, it is distinctly stated that the tempter came after Christ had become hungered after his long fast. He no doubt cunningly awaited the time when Jesus was feeling a degree of physical exhaustion. But, despite the strain, Jesus did not yield to the tempter. He overcame all that enslaves unaided nature, even the solicitations of the arch-enemy.

M. C., Clancey, Mont. 1. The Sabbath was not changed, but observance of Sunday was substituted for it by the apostles and other Christians of that time, for the purpose of separating themselves from the Jewish Church. They transferred to it all the honor of the Jewish Sabbath. This day was chosen to commemorate the resurrection. 2. We cannot say whether the present will be the last war, but we fervently hope so. Kinds of Meat and How to Cook Them

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will send you free a 32-page booklet which is a complete handbook for the housewife to use in buying meats.

All kinds of meat are so expensive nowadays that intelligent buying is a very necessary measure of economy.

You can't tell what meat is costing you by looking at the price per pound. You must know how much of that pound is waste, and how much nourishment there is in the remainder.

All this information is clearly given in the free booklet, "Meats; Composition and Cooking." The booklet also tells the flavor and digestibility of various cuts.

For the inexperienced housewife there are diagrams showing just what part of each animal goes into the butcher's different cuts.

This is a very useful book for the housewife. To secure a free copy, send your name and address with a 2-cent stamp for return postage, to the Christian Herald Information Bureau, Frederic J. Haskin, Director, Washington, D. C.

ALWAYS UNIFORM

The character of Havoline Oil is absolutely fixed. It never varies. It is as uniform as gold. Havoline Oil never differs, even occasionally, from its highly corrected standards of lubrication of motor cars.

We produce our own crude, pump through our own pipe-lines, ship in our own tank-cars, refine by an exact and uniform process, and distribute the finished product in the sealed Havoline container. This is your guarantee of uniformity, highest quality, full quantity, no impurities, and all-Havoline.

The unvarying uniformity of Havoline Oil explains the invariable use of Havoline by a vast majority of the better class motorists.

Havoline greases are compounded of Havoline Oil and pure, sweet tallow.

CHAPTER VIII

HARLEY BRUCE stood with folded arms and stern face in front of the barracks, watching the throng of relatives and friends coming and going. It was visitor's day, and the camp was alive with laughter and music. Bands were playing in the distance, and football and baseball games were in progress here and there. The mess hall had been cleared of tables and chairs, and a player piano that some generous, thoughtful one at home had sent down was peeling off gay music, while the feet of brave soldiers and their sweethearts and sisters were dancing as merrily and giddily as if there were no such thing as war and marching orders in the night.

But of all that gay company who were trying to forget the parting with a song and laugh, Harley Bruce seemed the only one who had no friends. Not but that he might have had part in all the merriment, for already he had become a favorite in his regiment, and many a man had said: "I want to introduce you to my mother and sister." But Harley after a few words would slip away and stand again with folded arms, looking through and beyond all this noisy festivity, with sad eyes, thinking of the people who would not come to bid farewell to him. He shut his lips in a thin firm line, and crushed back the ache that kept rising to his throat; trying to think of what was before him, ere he could hope to come back—if he might come back—and see them once more. Already there was a new look in his face, the look of a man who had faced life and braced himself for that which was required of him.

Suddenly, as he stood there looking into the far-away, a soldier stepped up and saluted:

"Comrade, there are visitors waiting to see you at the Y. M. C. A. reception room. Two ladies. No, they did not give their names."

Half annoyed, wondering who of his acquaintances had searched him out and followed him, he strode to the Y. M. C. A. room, which because of the many attractions out in the sunshine about the camp was almost deserted.

THEY were at the far end of the room, the two whom he had come to look for, watching a regiment which was drilling in the open space beyond; but when they heard his step, Janet turned—she had been only half watching. Her heart was on the alert, and she came to meet him, shyly, quietly, both hands stretched out, and her eyes lifted to his face with the whole story of her love and pride in him written there. Her mother had not noticed his coming at once, so they had that first second of meeting alone. Harley came forward with a quick stride, a great light in his face and in his voice a humble triumph:

"Jan!" he said, and then, in a whisper that only she could hear, as he took her hands and held them in both of his, "Oh, my darling!"

Janet gave a quick swift glance about the room, saw that no one was near at that moment, and no one noticing, for all eyes were out the window; then she deliberately lifted her lips to him, rose just the tiniest bit on her tiptoes, and gave him a swift shy kiss, her cheeks flaming rosily as she did it. He, so astonished and glad and humble all in one, longed to take her in his arms right then and there and forget everybody and everything else; for the orders to move were expected that night, perhaps, and the sea would soon be between them.

But Janet had retired circumspectly and instantly in sweet confusion:

"I didn't know that there would be any other chance," she explained in soft apology looking shyly up through her lashes, "and I got yours from under the hammock-pillow last night—"

"Oh, you dear!" he breathed softly, squeezing her fingers most unmercifully, and almost devouring her face with his eyes.

Then Mrs. Grayson turned and came swiftly forward to welcome the tall soldier boy. And what did he do but take her right into his big strong arms and fold her close and kiss her as if he were her lover instead of Janet's. He couldn't kiss Janet that way in public, so he took it out on her mother. "Mother! Little mother!" he whispered. But she understood, and returned the big bear-hug warmly with her slender gentle arms. For this dear boy had been almost like her own for years, and her love for him was genuine.

TWO wonderful days they had together before the orders came to move. Mrs. Grayson took a small suite of rooms with a pleasant sitting room in a quiet hotel of the near-by city, and Harley found no trouble in getting a pass to spend the daytime hours with them.

They were beautiful hours, that swift brief courting, while sorrow waited impatiently just outside the door to lead away the beloved one. Almost the first thing Harley did when he was alone with Janet was to loosen the throat of his flannel army shirt and draw out from around his neck a slender chain of platinum on which hung a ring of platinum set with a singularly pure and beautiful diamond.

"I bought it for you in Paris two years ago, the day I got your letter about growing up, do you remember? I wanted to see you so much that day it seemed as if I couldn't stay away any longer. I felt so lonely and far away; and I had to do something to stop the ache in my heart and throat; so I went out and bought this ring—your ring! I took a long time selecting it. I remember how it thrilled me to handle it and think that some day I would put it on your finger. I wouldn't get a great showy one; I knew you wouldn't like it; but I got the best stone I could find, the purest one without a single flaw. I took it to an expert for his opinion before I would be satisfied. But when I got it and took it back to my dormitory I sat a long time looking at it, and thinking what I would say when I put it on your finger. I've worn it ever since around my neck to have it always near me, because it seemed to bring you nearer; and perhaps you wouldn't believe it. I'm such a poor unworthy fellow now, but often the pressure of that ring has reminded me and helped me to pass by many a temptation to which, just through constant familiarity, I might otherwise have yielded. I shall miss it for a while, I have grown so accustomed to going to sleep with my hand over it, pressing it close to my heart. But I shall be glad to miss it knowing that it is on your little hand. Oh, my darling!"

He slipped the ring on her finger and took her in his arms, so absorbed in her that the little platinum chain slipped unnoticed to the floor. But presently Janet saw it.

"Poor chain!" she said, "You've lost your ring! I've robbed you of your jewel! But wait!"

JANET unclasped a slender chain from about her own neck and took off a tiny golden heart with her name in delicate script on the back, and slipping it on the platinum chain she fastened it about his neck and dropped it inside his collar. "There, now you have my heart," she whispered, "my little gold heart that father gave me when I was a child. I've always worn it because he gave it to me. It seemed to make him more real to me. And now I shall like to think you have it."

He drew her close in his arms once more, closed his eyes and laid his lips on hers.

Wonderful hours! Crowded so full of all that it ought to have taken months to say! of moments of silence which there were no words to fill; of consciousness of the coming separation that might stretch into years.

"I feel as if I were going to war myself!" whispered Janet. "I'd rather go and fight than to stay behind and wait. It's we women that have got to win the war after all, isn't it, by giving up the men we love? And I'm glad and proud to have you go, Harley, but oh, dear, it's so hard to have to give you up when I've just got you!" And she dropped stricken against his breast.

"You haven't just got me, Jan, darling! You've had me all the years!" he comforted her. "Wherever we are, together or apart, we have each other." And looking in one another's eyes they were strong in their great love.

Mother Grayson sat apart and dreamed of her own young love, while her heart bled silently for the days that were coming for these two she loved so dearly.

THAT second night when they came to part, after the last words were said, they hesitated a moment and then together dropped upon their knees beside the couch where they had been sitting, and Mother Grayson slipped away into the bedroom and knelt beside her bed, her eyes all wet with loving tears. They parted with the hope that they might still have another day of companionship left.

But on the third morning Harley did not come, and Janet waited all day, till late in the afternoon, when a soldier brought her word that the order had come in the night and Harley was gone.

Janet stood that night a long time silently looking out the hotel window over the great city, up to the stars, so high and far above the powerful searchlights that plowed the heavens constantly.

"Somewhere" out on the great deep her lover was looking up at those same stars and thinking of her. Her heart thrilled over his last words, and gloried in his strength. He had shaken himself loose from all that had held him down and had gone out at his country's call to face he knew not what; out on the wide far ocean where submarines lurked, and perils were thick on every hand. But God was up there above the stars, watching, guiding that ship on which he sailed. God was not conquered, would never be conquered. All the powers of the universe were his, and he would be with all those who fought for the right. Disaster and bloodshed and death might come, but there was something greater than they, something that sword could not kill, nor devil drown, nor torture break; something that was eternal, and her lover had it! Whatever came, he was gone out for God, and all was well. There were tears in her eyes, but there was peace in her heart and a look of triumph on her lips.

Her mother came quietly up behind and put an arm around her waist in tender, wordless sympathy, and so they stood looking up to the eternal stars.

THE next night they were at home. The neighbors slipped in to hear about their journey and tell the news. Roxy Porter had gone as a Red Cross nurse. Her mother had given her consent at last. The Red Cross Society had finished the two thousand and seventh garment that afternoon. A new supply of materials had just arrived for the Emergency Aid. The Ladies' Aid and Missionary Societies had decided to send a donation to the Y. M. C. A. Fund for the soldiers. Janet must be sure to come down to the knitting class in the morning and see what a lot of work they had done since she left.

Janet was glad when they were all gone and she might slip out to the hammock and rest. Tomorrow she would knit sweaters and helmets and wristlets, strip bandages, make dressings and tampons and pads, and feel the nearer to Harley while she was doing it because she was helping the cause for which he had enlisted; but tonight her spirit was weary and bruised with the sense of her loss.

She lay down in the hammock with her cheek on the old couch cover where Harley had kissed it, and his dear ring against her lips.

The sounds of the house came dis-tantly to her; Mrs. Bruce complaining of the weight of her bed-covers; the soft thud of a window as the nurse shoved it up or down; the tinkle of a spoon in the medicine glass; her mother and Aunt Nan talking as they moved about the house.

Presently they came into the library and sat down near the window where she could hear their voices quite distinctly:

"Yes," sighed her mother's voice gently, "it's very sad for her, of course, to lose him so soon, and have to endure the anxiety and waiting, and all the possibilities; but, Nan, I'd rather have her have the love of a real true man like Harley, even with all this pain, than live out her life in a commonplace way with a man who wasn't the real thing. Nan, Harley Bruce is a real man!"

There was more talk, but Janet did not hear it. With her cheek on his kiss, her lips on his ring, a thrill of joy in her heart, she fell asleep; and dreamed she heard his whistle ringing half around the world to let her know he was thinking of her, and that he would not forget!

THE END

Pushing Relief Work in Palestine

A THRILLING letter, full of human interest, has been received from Rev. Stephen Trowbridge, secretary of the Relief Committee in charge of the distribution of supplies of food to the needy in Palestine. The letter was written from Cairo, Egypt. He writes:

"In Jerusalem I found the poorer people in desperate straits, their clothing reduced to rags and the bread, sold in the bakeries at eight or ten times the normal prices, of a coarse and heavy variety. A great many of the middle-class and well-to-do people have been reduced by Turkish war-taxes and injustice to a state of poverty. In the Armenian monastery I found 612 exiles from Adana and Aintab; many of these people recognized me at once from an acquaintance in Turkey and crowded around me with tears and words of welcome. One after another began to tell the tragic stories of loved ones who had died on the march southward or had been banished to the wilderness of Mesopotamia.

"We are opening up women's and girls' industries for 800 of the destitute people and hope to extend this to include 3,000 within the next month or two. A great many people in Jerusalem have urged us to start soup-kitchens in different parts of the city, but I strongly believe in industrializing the relief work so as to make soup-kitchens unnecessary except for the very aged and crippled and other people incapacitated from work. Jerusalem is a wonderful old city and everyone now is filled with hope in the straightforward and just administration of the British. We have at all points received the encouragement of British officers, many of whom take a personal interest in the relief work. Our medical director is Major Seringeour of the Military Governor's staff in Jerusalem. Next Wednesday Mrs. Trowbridge and I are returning to Jerusalem for a month's work, after which we must be back in Cairo for May and June so as to keep up the lines of Sunday-school service which we have started.

A CABLEGRAM from Mr. Lansing, the Secretary of State, requests that I serve as director of supplies and transport for the American Red Cross Commission of fifty doctors and nurses. The members of our Sunday-school advisory committee agree with me that if some American business man, sympathetic with the missionary work, could be found for this post it would be better for me to keep to the Sunday-school work during this coming year and to assist Bishop MacLure in the Palestine Relief work for only a few weeks at a time. It is extremely difficult to find the right man for this post. I think the best thing will be to ask the commission to set apart one or two of their members to do this work of forwarding the supplies from Egypt; but at least Mr. Hoyman and I must meet the party when they arrive at Port Said. The whole point is that the Sunday-school work would be interrupted and the work of our newly appointed field secretary for Egypt, Mr. Mitry Dewairy, would not be as efficient as if we were working together throughout that time. I have prayed earnestly about this matter and feel that on the whole it would be better for me not to accept unless Mr. Davison of the National Red Cross has a personal conference with you and secures my release for one year.

"Our Relief staff in Jerusalem have agreed to remember daily the words of Isa. 61:3, so that in the pressure of the day's work, and in the midst of throngs of people, we may deal patiently and kindly, interpreting to those who have suffered the compassion and faithfulness of Christ. There are many trying experiences in the relief work, and some of the people are hard to satisfy. During February we had nearly 20 days of rain, our supplies of rice became soaked through in transit from Egypt, and we had to work very hard to dry out the rice lest it should spoil; during the month we completed the distribution of 300 tons. This really saved the city from famine, for the military governor told me on my arrival that the rations then on hand were sufficient for three or four days only; two days later our supplies of rice began to arrive from Egypt.

"Often in the evenings I walked over to the Mount of Olives and into the Garden of Gethsemane, and I thought of the old days when David first conquered the stronghold of the Jebusites; I also thought of what John Ruskin says somewhere in 'Modern Painters,' that the 'highest use of the imagination is to reproduce the scenes of our Redeemer's life.' Every weekday was crowded full of relief work, but Sundays I had an opportunity to visit the Sunday-schools which have pluckily held on during all the hard times under the Turks. The school at the American Colony has never missed a Sunday, and the same is true of the blind school under Miss Lovell. Miss Lovell is one of the two Englishwomen who stayed on through the three years of war; again and again the Turks threatened to take her house and turn her out on the street, but in each case God mercifully overruled the threat. Two Sunday afternoons I spoke to the girls in this school; it was a great inspiration to listen to their singing; they know English better than any pupils I have met in the Near East. The Arabic-speaking church founded by the Christian Alliance has also kept up the Sunday-schools, most of the pupils being Armenian refugees. The large German industrial orphanages maintain Lutheran Sunday-schools. It is possible that our Relief Fund may take over all the work of these German schools in the course of the next few months.

I found the Syrian congregations very much broken down through poverty and lack of missionary direction, but a fresh start is being made with remarkable energy at certain points. St. George's Boys' School in Jerusalem on the day that it reopened in February received 230 boys; Mr. Reynolds, a personal friend of mine, is the headmaster. During April we plan to organize a Sunday-school for these boys. We cannot yet send through large supplies, but small packages can go by post. In this way our Arabic publications can be sent in small amounts to many Sunday-schools in Palestine. All of them being Arabic-speaking, our literature from Cairo will meet the need."

THE American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief announces contributions received during the week ending April 16, 1918, totaling $134,208.32. The American Relief Committee in Cairo have received the $50,000 cabled recently from America for relief work in the Eastern war zone, according to a dispatch received from Stephen Trowbridge. In the same mail with the acknowledgment of the money came a report of the relief work in the Jerusalem Zone.

Eleven hundred children are being cared for in the Palestine orphanages, and plans are well under way to greatly increase this number. Up to date 2,333 garments have been given out by Miss Fisher, the relief worker; 31 persons have received tins of milk; 22 received rice, and 101 soup tickets for the new soup kitchen.

Mrs. Vester, of the American Colony, in charge of the industrial work for women, now has 250 refugees employed for plain sewing. Thousands are asking for work and the widespread distribution becomes more apparent. Women previously in excellent circumstances gladly accept the most menial kind of labor. Mrs. Vester will soon extend her industrial work to the towns of Ramallah and Bethlehem. Major Seringeour reported 12 free dispensaries in the Jerusalem zone. Approximately 6,500 cases have been treated. A nurse goes out from headquarters and gives one hour a day to the refugees in the Bokhara quarter. The committee are purchasing corn and other foods locally as far as possible, because of the difficulties of transportation from Egypt.

Ten thousand dollars has been sent by the Christian Herald to the American Colony in Jerusalem for the encouragement of the lace industry. The Syrian women have long been famous for their beautiful laces, and the editors of the Christian Herald have felt that they could best help the refugees in Jerusalem by giving them an opportunity to earn a livelihood.

A great number of Greeks have been deported from the coast regions along the Black Sea, the Marmora and the Aegean, into the interior, especially into the villages of Konia, Tocat, Sivas and Angora. Some have been sent as far down as the Cilician plains in the region of Adana and Tarsus, and several thousands have reached even the Syrian desert. Thousands of them are in a pitiful condition, especially the women and children.

THE American Committee is doing all in its power to relieve the terrific suffering. During the recent fighting in Trebizond many of the Greeks escaped to Batum and other places in the Caucasus, and 50,000 or more are reported in flight to Crimea. Trebizond, when it was in the hands of the Russians, was a place of refuge for thousands of exiles from the Black Sea coast towns and villages.

The American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief have 70 workers, chiefly American missionaries working without expense to relief funds, distributing relief in Syria. These 70 are in addition to an equal or larger number of workers engaged in other areas throughout Asia Minor.

The British campaign in the Near East has taken a rather surprising turn, according to latest reports. It seems British forces have advanced northward from Bagdad and east of the Tigris River to within striking distance of Mosul, terminus of the Bagdad railway. Several weeks ago another expedition was reported on the Euphrates—when last heard of, after defeating a considerable Turkish army, within striking distance of Aleppo, the junction of the Syrian and Bagdad railroads. It seemed then as if the English objective were to cut both Mosul, on the one hand, and the whole of Syria on the other, off from communication with Constantinople by one and the same blow. Therefore, Jerusalem, for the present, would appear to be safe. In Palestine the British have driven northward on both banks of the Jordan, taking Es-Salt, east of the Jordan, on May 2.

This Non-Skid Heel prevents slipping

As important in walking as in motoring is the "non-skid" idea, which means safety from slipping. For pedestrians, the best example of this idea is the Foster Friction Plug—found in

CAT'S PAW CUSHION
RUBBER HEELS

Not only does this plug prevent slipping, but it also makes the heels wear longer. Other advantages of Cat's Paw Heels: They have no holes to track mud or dirt—and do not mar the floors.

Cat's Paw Heels will give you foot comfort and protection every day of the year. Your whole family should wear them. The name is easy to remember and they cost no more than ordinary kinds.

"King Corn" and a Meatless Dinner

WE begin our conference today with a General Order from Headquarters—i. e., U. S. Administration of Food:

1. "Give King Corn a royal welcome to your Home."
2. "Corn Products containing the outer coating and germ (such as water-ground cornmeal and grits), oats and oatmeal, graham and wholewheat flour, rye flour, barley flour, and soy bean meal—should be 'kept moving' and used as soon as possible. Keep in a cool, dry, well-ventilated place. Raise bags of flour and meal sufficiently far from the floor to secure them from rats, mice and insects, also to permit cleaning the floor beneath the bags. Leave space between them for abundant ventilation. Large stocks should be reduced before hot weather."

"King Corn," as he is officially and facetiously styled, is coming into his rights. For years in certain parts of our country he has held, at best, a second-rate position. Without analyzing other reasons for this injustice, I will say briefly that few housewives know how to make really good corn breads and cakes, and fewer have taken pains to examine and compare various brands of the meal.

Summing into one sentence what I would commend to our housemother's present and especial notice—

If practicable, get the Southern water-ground white cornmeal. It retains certain properties of nutrition which are "bolted" out of the meal of Northern mills. So well is this fact now known that all the principal grocers in our cities keep the water-ground on hand and those who do not can easily order it. The Southland is the native home of Indian corn or "maize," and it has been one of the principal articles of diet in that region for centuries.

Our first recipe bears the name of "Batter Bread" in the Middle Southern States. In Florida and in Georgia it is sometimes called "spoon bread."

Apropos of this popular breakfast bread, a natural mistake was recently made by a visitor to a Virginia family. In a Canadian tour, he had heard of and eaten scores of "War Breads." Falling in love forthwith with the new variety, he asked for the recipe for "Battle Bread."

Virginia Batter Bread

One small cup of cold boiled rice; two eggs; two cups of cornmeal; one tablespoonful of lard or other shortening; one teaspoonful of salt; two cups of milk.

Beat the eggs very light. If you would make the batter particularly nice, whip the whites separately to a standing froth, and the yolks until smooth. Stir the rice to a smooth batter in the milk. Melt the shortening and add to rice and milk. Sift the meal twice with the salt. Mix the beaten yolks well into rice and milk and beat in the meal gradually alternately with the stiffened whites.

Bake at once and quickly in well-greased, rather deep pie-plates and serve hot in the same, cutting with a broad-bladed knife into triangles.

There is no more toothsome cornmeal bread than this if properly made. A notable cook assures me that when eggs are dear she holds her peace and secretly uses but one egg, sifting an even teaspoonful of baking-powder twice with the meal, then proceeding as usual.

Genuine Cornmeal Pone

Much passes under the name in private houses and hotels which is a "bogus article" bearing no resemblance to the dinner and luncheon bread made by old-fashioned Southern cooks.

Sift a quart of white cornmeal twice with a teaspoonful of fine salt. Dissolve a tablespoonful of shortening in hot water. Mix the salted meal into a soft dough with cold water, adding the melted shortening as you go on, and mold with the hands into oblong cakes higher in the middle than at the ends, shaping rapidly by tossing them skillfully over and over. Bake in a well-greased pan and when done lift with a cake-turner to a hot plate. They must be broken, not cut by the eaters, and buttered while hot.

Potato Soup Without Meat

Boil enough potatoes to make a generous cupful when they are mashed into a creamy mass, adding a cupful of hot milk. The mass should be just thick enough to drop from the spoon, and perfectly smooth. Have ready a "roux" or white sauce, made by stirring together over the fire a tablespoonful of butter with one of flour. Mix this gradually with two cups of scalding milk in which have been boiled two slices of onion and a good-sized stalk of celery cut into bits. These must be strained out before the hot milk goes into the soups. Stir into the potato-mixture and set over the fire in a double boiler, seasoning to taste with celery-salt and white pepper. Stir for two minutes after the boil begins; add a teaspoonful of finely minced parsley; boil up once and pour into a tureen into which you have put half a cupful of "croutons"—that is, small squares of fried bread.

This is an excellent family soup.

Nut Roast

One cup of fine dry bread-crumbs—oaten bread is best. One cupful of chopped nut-meats—English walnuts, black walnuts, or pecans; two eggs; a cup of hot water; a teaspoonful of onion-juice; half-teaspoonful of celery salt; one tablespoonful of butter (or substitute for butter) rubbed smooth in half a teaspoonful of cornstarch.

Mix crumbs and minced nut-meats together; stir into the hot water, the butter and cornstarch, onion-juice and seasoning, and wet the crumbs and nuts with this. Mix well before adding the yolks of the eggs beaten light. Lastly, stir in deftly the stiffened whites, bringing up the mixture from the bottom as with a soufflé and breaking the nuts as little as possible. Bake and serve in a well-greased cake mold. It should be as light as sponge cake and a welcome substitute for a meat-course.

While our sensible housewife will keep in mind that simplicity and economy are the ruling principles of her daily living, she must not lose sight of the truth that frugality and ugliness do not, of necessity, go together. On the contrary she should study now, as never before, what may be registered as "culinary harmonies." We have on today's menu a potato soup. Think of some other vegetable than rice, hominy, or potatoes to accompany what the French have taught us to call the pièce de résistance, which is to follow the soup.

Studying the ingredients of this we decide at once that stewed tomatoes would "go" pleasingly with the Nut Roast. Canned tomatoes are both popular and inexpensive, to say nothing of being eminently available as a left-over. The few teaspoonfuls left in the dish will add piquancy to the second-day soup. (Which, let me remind you, should be warmed over in a double boiler for fear of scorching the milk.)

Stewed Tomatoes

One can of tomatoes; a teaspoonful of sugar and the same of butter; salt and pepper to taste; a small teaspoonful of minced onion.

Stew all together, stirring often, for half an hour. Then run through a colander, pressing out all that will pass the holes easily, and return to the fire for a minute for the final boil-up.

Brown Betty

One advantage besides cheapness which commends this homely old favorite to the frugal housewife is that specked and small apples may be thus utilized. Pare and chop enough to make two cupfuls. Have ready a like quantity of dry bread-crumbs. If you have followed directions given in an earlier number of this series you have glass jars of rolled crusts and slices of stale bread, without cutting into a new loaf.

Cover the bottom of a well-greased pudding-dish with a layer of chopped apples, sprinkled over with a tablespoonful of sugar and dotted with butter, and a dash of cinnamon or nutmeg. Spread over this a layer of crumbs half an inch thick. Fill the dish in this order. The uppermost layer should be crumbs dotted with bits of butter. Bake, closely covered, forty minutes. Remove the cover and brown upon the upper grating of the oven. Serve hot with hard sauce.

A Business Man On Missions

SOME months ago I learned of a stenographer in Manhattan who is supporting a native preacher of China. I was told she has been very successful and had won two thousand souls for her Lord. It set me to thinking. There was born in my soul a desire to do this very thing—to have my own representative in the foreign field.

I looked forward in imagination to the time when this maiden will meet her preacher friend up in the Glory, accompanied with these thousands who perhaps never would have been there if she had not saved from her weekly wage and sent it regularly for his support.

Later on I was appointed chairman of the missionary committee of our church, and I not only became responsible for a native preacher under Rev. A. S. Paynter, founder of the Indian Christian Mission, but I began to enlist others in the work. I am profoundly thankful that our paths crossed just at this time, for I was enabled to see the possibilities which, under God, could be realized, as I talked from day to day with this brother. I presented the matter to a number who responded to my request. There was very little solicitation, but when I did present the subject, I never failed to tell them of the vision I had caught. Several came to me voluntarily, which showed plainly that the hand of God was leading. This continued till the number had reached nine.

At present there are eleven native preachers provided for, all because some of our people have caught the vision and heard Jesus say, "Go ye!" I have been asked to record this bit of experience in the hope that others may be led to do, under God, what he has done through me.

A great joy has come into all of our lives. We are soon to have the photographs of these preachers and views of the villages where they labor, and then I fancy our interest will be increased fourfold. And then, a little later, will come the joyful news that Yuhana, or perhaps Andrew, or it may be Devadaas, has won souls for our Lord; then we shall rejoice, and our joy will be complete. For this supreme moment we longingly wait and expectantly look. To Him shall be all the glory.

A recent letter from Rev. A. S. Paynter, in Ceylon, states that my native preacher, Daniel, who labors in the village of Thumbasap, a few miles from Ellore, is having marked success. Several have confessed Christ as their Saviour and been baptized. There must be many who read these lines who can support native preachers in India. Think of his joy and yours as, one after another, they come out of heathen darkness into the light and liberty of the Kingdom of God. If the money is sent month by month, we do not find it a burden.

A man in Toronto, a consumptive, who works in a railroad yard, supports four native preachers under the India Christian Mission. This man, too, has had a vision.

Face the Day with a Smile

Start with Bran

There's a bran-flaked breakfast dainty which everybody likes. But the joy of eating can't compare with the after-joy it brings.

It is bran flakes—Nature's laxative—hidden in rolled cereals. A studied mixture with a most delightful flavor—Pettijohn's.

It supplies what all folks need—the daily bit of bran.

To Make You Fit

Bran acts as roughage. When you omit it, fine foods often clog.

Then come dull days, headaches, blues.

The world would be ten times as cheerful if folks kept clean inside.

Clear bran isn't likable, so nine in ten neglect it. Pettijohn's is likable and welcome.

To serve once daily means a constant bran supply.

Try it one week and watch results. See what it adds to the joy of living. You'll not go back to branless diet when you know the facts.

Pettijohn's

A Flaked Cereal Dainty

55% Wheat Product - 20% Oats
25% Bran

A breakfast dainty whose flavory flakes hide 25 per cent unground bran.

Pettijohn's Flour—75 per cent Government Standard flour with 25 per cent bran flakes. Use like Graham flour in any recipe.

Both sold in packages only.

Protecting the Morals of Our Soldiers

THERE is not a single red light district existing today within an effective radius of any army cantonment or naval station where any considerable number of soldiers or sailors are in training," Raymond B. Fosdick, chairman of the Commissions on Training Camp Activities, has recently declared, summing up vice conditions around military camps. Twenty-five segregated districts located within the 5-mile zones established around military camps have been closed under the congressional enactment which provides for absolute repression in these areas, according to Mr. Fosdick. Beyond the dead line in the cities contiguous to the military camps, many more have been abolished through the joint cooperation of federal, state, and civic authorities. "Scatteration" which has invariably followed the abolition of segregation in these cities also has been combated effectively through the vigilance of the same agencies.

"Not only have the great bulk of the towns in the vicinity of camps assisted the Commissions on Training Camp Activities in cleaning up," Mr. Fosdick asserts, "they have entered with admirable enthusiasm into the Commissions' program for entertaining soldiers and placing at their disposal the recreation resources of the city. Under the War Camp Community Service, undertaken by the Recreation Association of America, the difficult task of assimilating the floating soldier population has proceeded with a heartiness which fits in perfectly with the Government policy—not simply of repressing vice but of setting up a competitive system—a system of organized amusement and clean recreation."

What the Men Say About Camp Morals

THE following letters from men who have gone out from the Dudley Street Baptist Church are indicative of the help some men are receiving through their military and naval experience:

From one who is in the Field Hospital Service:

"There is one thing certain, this war has established a clearer relation between God and man, and I think every fellow who comes back will be a better Christian and look at life in a different way. The Y. M. C. A. is doing a really wonderful work, and I don't know what the boys would do without it."

From a sailor: "We have just passed through a terrific storm at sea, the worst I have ever seen; many of us prayed for help and thanked the good Lord for our safe return. I never forget to say my prayers each night, for it gives me great confidence. The morals of the men are very high; I have been quite surprised to find what a fine, clean lot they are."

From a Southern camp: "I want you to know that I am keeping up my Bible study, prayer and church attendance. The men of my battery are a lot of fine, clean, moral fellows. I don't know just what would happen to a man who brought disgrace upon his fellows by his actions. We are standing for the best things. I do not find the rottenness in the army I expected to discover. Men in the army, the same as in civilian life, find companionship according to their desires. If a fellow wants rottenness, he can find those who will rot with him; if he wants clean living, he will find those who would die before they would stain their souls or sacrifice their morals."

From one in the Aviation Service: "The fellows in my corps are a very clean lot and very easy to get along with. I am delighted to learn that the moral conditions incidental to army life are far better than I was led to suppose by what I had heard and read previous to my enlistment. The men with whom I am associated come from some of the best homes of our country, and while some fellows use a good deal of profanity, still I think we average as high in morality as any bunch of fellows to be found in civilian life."

From the above it will be seen and appreciated that the morals of army and navy life, according to the testimony of some who are living it, are not so debased as some would have it appear, and while every intelligent person knows that human perfection is not to be found among our enlisted men any more than among the unenlisted, still it is extremely heartening to know that our boys are not in hopeless moral conditions, but find helpful, clean comradeship among their fellows.

The Farmer and the Brewer

BESIDES the usual postmark on a letter before me, there is the slogan, "Food will win the war; don't waste it." I should like to present the viewpoint of an actual farmer, living upon a farm, tilling the soil and feeding livestock.

We live in a state that is prohibition by law, yet our flocks and our herds have felt the selfish tentacles of the brewing industry. The ideal type of farmer, I suppose, is a man who has many acres, and large herds, and who, after fattening his stock, has a surplus of grain to sell. But the ideal type misses a good many and fits comparatively few. Parts of our country are suitable for grazing, other parts for mining, others for lumbering, and so on, while other sections seem intended by nature to be vast grain fields. Transportation facilities are a complement of natural conditions, and there is no stigma of poor farming methods attached to the small rancher's plan of buying part of the surplus grain raised elsewhere and feeding it. In the Willamette Valley, beginning at Portland and extending two-thirds of the way across Oregon, there are thousands of farms or ranches of from five to twenty-five acres with their flocks of hens and their berry patches, a few cows and pigs, and few if any acres to be spared for grain fields. Moving here, from east of the Rocky Mountains, we shipped no live stock or grain. By comparing prices of grains, we found that barley was better than any other grain we could get for our hens, cows and pigs. When barley flour was put upon the list of wheat flour substitutes, barley rose to a fabulous price and became very scarce or unobtainable. With the breweries using barley to make into beer, the farmer stands a slender chance of getting enough for feed, while in parts of Washington and Oregon it is difficult to obtain enough for flour.

As owners of livestock, we are up against a difficult proposition. Not a bit of the barley supply that is needed for flour would we for a minute begrudge; but with the need of barley as human food, and as feed for livestock, every glass of beer made from now on means wasting flour, meat, eggs or milk.

What brand of conservation are breweries exemplifying?

The malt that lies in the house the brewer built does not fill the egg basket, nor make loaves to win the war. We need the barley, not the beer.

CLEON EMERY,
Barlow, Oregon.

Food and Ships

WOULD you have them want for food, for clothes, for ammunition to answer the German fleet?

Would you have them think that you had forgotten them—you in your comfort at home?

Would you have the lives of such men unnecessarily sacrificed because you had not concentrated your efforts on the thing that meant most to them?

Build, build, and continue to build ships. Make a bridge of ships to Pershing.

For National time-saving

YOU have found how quickly Gold Dust dissolves the grease—how quickly your dishes dry in consequence—how brilliantly clean Gold Dust leaves them. Have you passed the word along to friends who, like you, are intent on saving time these days?

And Gold Dust has many other time-saving uses, too!

For ready reference you might wish to keep, in your kitchen scrap book, the following hints for quicker, easier cleaning.

THE N. K. FAIRBANK COMPANY

For a sparkling clean bathroom

Even in the bathroom there's a bit of oil, a bit of grease. But Gold Dust gets rid of dark circles and rims in wash bowls and bath tubs—because Gold Dust so quickly dissolves the grease. And, you'll find Gold Dust cleans gently, without scratching or marring the surface of porcelains, enamel, tiling or nickel-plated fixtures.

Your stove will like this hint

Wherever there's a stove there's bound to be drippings—especially greasy ones. Because Gold Dust is such a gentle, effective grease-dissolvent most housekeepers keep a package handy. Try it on the zinc, tin or galvanized iron under your stove. Try it on top of your stove where grease has splattered from the skillet. Try it on the drip tray on your gas range.

What dishwashing does to drainpipes

Almost everybody knows what clogs up the drainpipes—the grease from dishes and pots and pans, which hardens and keeps the water from flushing away bits of waste from the sink. Gold Dust, when used for dishwashing, not only dissolves the grease on the dishes, but keeps your sink and drainpipe free, unclogged and sanitary.

For your ice box or refrigerator

Ice boxes and refrigerators need frequent cleansing—need to be kept always in a sweet, sanitary condition. Gold Dust does this to the very best advantage, because it so thoroughly dissolves the grease. One housekeeper says she always uses Gold Dust for this purpose, because Gold Dust so completely cleanses, rinses so easily—no danger of "soap left behind" in nooks and corners.

How to clean your meat chopper

If you've had trouble cleaning this useful kitchen helper, try a tablespoonful of Gold Dust in a dishpan of hot water. See how quickly and thoroughly Gold Dust dissolves the grease—how fresh and sweet it leaves your chopper. On baking day, too, Gold Dust makes a quick "clean-up"—bread mixer, pans, rolling pin, spoons and all cooking utensils thoroughly cleaned in record time.

The secret of spotless woodwork

Pantry shelves, kitchen floor and tables and woodwork are kept fresh and spotless with Gold Dust. Many housekeepers say no other cleansing agent so quickly dissolves the grease. A tablespoonful to a pail of water is the quantity they use. "Tracked in" grime on stairs and floors also quickly yields to Gold Dust's cleansing action.

Let the GOLD DUST TWINS do your work

Make your kitchen sparkle like the spring sunshine!

In summer, of all times, how important it is to have the kitchen bright and clean! Such refreshing newness when the refrigerator has been "dressed" inside and out; and the stove and boiler have been "cheered-up"; and the hardworked kitchen table made all fresh; and the sink, and service buckets, and garbage can, and floor and walls—like new pins with Acme Quality Paints and Finishes. They save the cost of new things!

Most home furnishings are called "worn out" when they are only shabby; they will still give years of service when regularly touched up with Acme Quality Paints and Finishes.

Your interest in making old things NEW will be greatly increased by reading our two books—"Acme Quality Painting Guide Book," which answers every paint question, and "Home Decorating"—a valuable aid in home beautifying. Both will be mailed you on request, without charge.

Jesus Silences His Adversaries

International Sunday School Lesson for May 26. Mark 12: 1-44

The Great Day of Controversy

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph.D.

IN our last lesson we learned of the direct challenge which the chief priests and scribes made as to the source of Jesus' authority as a teacher. Our present chapter opens with one of Christ's parables which shows very plainly why he does not recognize their authority. It is the story of the Vineyard which was entrusted to faithless and selfish husbandmen, who ill-treated the servants of the owner and finally killed his son. The custodians of the Temple and its religion felt the sting of its application to them. They were afraid to seize him openly and went away to plot his ruin.

Upon their return, they began a skilfully planned verbal assault, having prepared their barbed wire entanglements and laid their hidden bombs. We have here the brief report of a whole day of controversy. A new aspect of Jesus' wonderful personality is clearly revealed: he is a master of repartee, keen, sure, unruffled. He preserves his composure and treats each proposition courteously. Any fairminded bystander must have been strongly impressed, and indeed we hear from one such who seemed to be in the ranks of the enemy at first.

Jesus silenced the whole combination of religious, political and philosophical adversaries. Though Pharisee, Sadducee and Herodian put aside their varied quarrels to overwhelm him, he was more than a match for them all. The boys in our schools admire the quick incisive retort, and will think more of Jesus if they really study this lesson today.

A Political Trap Set

With a great air of respectfully consulting the popular teacher on a matter of public and patriotic interest, they ask him whether as loyal Jews they ought to pay tribute to the Romans or not. In hope of eliciting a compromising answer they pay flattering homage to his fearlessness—he will not be afraid of the authorities; he is known to be a plain and outspoken man. They thought they had him on the horns of a dilemma. If he advised a tame submission to the alien, they hoped to undermine his standing with the common people. If, as seemed more likely, he declared against contributing to the heathen and foreign conqueror, they intended at once to betray him to the governor as an inciter of rebellion.

He saw their hypocrisy and that they were acting a deceitful part, and said so. Then he gave his wonderfully wise and true answer. He asked them to let him see a silver coin, such as was used in paying this tax. "Why, this coin speaks for itself," he practically says. "Whose image does it bear?" When they answered "Caesar's," he responded, "Then pay it to Caesar." They were using Roman money, acquiescing in Roman overlordship, reaping its advantages in trade and police protection. Then there was no reason at all for refusing to pay the price. He turned all the ignominy of it back on them; they had the coins, recognized the subjugation and reaped the substantial benefits. They had asked: "Shall we give or not give?" He answered "Give, even as you have received." But he added one searching word more: "Render to Caesar the things that are Caesar's, and unto God the things that are God's." God does not need money, nor does He ask for coins due to others. God asks for sincerity and truth and brotherhood. There was good evidence that they were failing in what was due to him. The problem had been turned back upon them.

A Theological Catch Question

So they tried another tack. Some different individuals came to see if so wise a man could give them a solution of a hard question in connection with religion. Since he persisted in turning all matters into religious form, they would approach him on that basis. If there is any truth in the doctrine of the resurrection, what about such difficulties as that of the woman who had had seven husbands? Whose wife will she be then? This was probably one of the stock puzzles of the Sadducees, who were fond of scoffing at immortality. Just such smart, superficial, catch questions are the usual delight of the flippant unbeliever.

Yet no doubt, every one around leaned forward to hear the answer, for it seemed a pretty hard problem to them. So Jesus very courteously but with penetrating rebuke made answer: "You stopped at the wrong point in your Scripture reading," he seems to say. "You quote the provision in the law concerning levirate marriage and leave out all the foreshadowings of eternal life. Not only so, but you limit the power of God. When they shall rise from the dead, they neither marry nor are given in marriage, but are like the angels." In heaven there is friendship and love and every spiritual relationship, but marriage in its earthly and physical sense is done away.

But as to immortality, when God is interested in us and loves and forgives us and we love and sincerely serve Him, we are immortal. He is not the God of the dead but of the living. He is still the God of Abraham and Isaac and Jacob, and they are still his worshipping servants, fellowshiping with the spirits of just men made perfect. They have never really died.

A Sincere Questioner

From the group of scribes a man stepped forth with another inquiry. But this was asked in a different spirit, and Jesus, looking upon him, saw an honest man. Interested in the good answers which Jesus had given to the various questions commonly at issue, he deemed it a good chance to get a good solution of another. This was the standing argument as to which was the greatest commandment of the Law. So he asks the Teacher from Galilee his opinion concerning this.

With scarce an instant's pause Jesus responded by quoting the Great Selma which was repeated daily in morning and evening prayer. "Hear, O Israel: the Lord our God, the Lord is one; and thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart and with all thy soul and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength." With what solemnity it must have fallen from the lips of the Master, this great statement of the unity and universality of God, and of man's supreme duty to love him with all the powers he hath given. To this Jesus appends a brief sentence from the book of Leviticus, singled out from the maze of legalistic requirements: "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." The uniqueness of Jesus' utterance lies in singling out this second mighty phrase and emphasizing its necessary complementary relation to the first.

The sincere scribe could not refrain from repeating reverently the mighty lines which for him and for the world were ever afterward inseparable. He wholeheartedly agreed with Jesus, and went further to say that the Teacher was right to omit from it all ritual and sacrifice and technicality as fundamentally secondary and unimportant. He for one gladly agreed. How much we would like to learn more of this candid and fearless Jew, as of others who come and go in the Gospel story. But this we have: that Jesus bestowed upon him the happy rejoinder, "Thou art not far from the Kingdom of God." The others were indeed far away, but this man needed only to follow and obey the principle he had admired and approved, to enter into life that is life indeed. But alas, it is true that one may endorse the principle without carrying it into conduct and character!

The enemies of the Galilean wisely decided that there was no use in trying to catch him in his talk. Some other means must be found to be rid of him.

But he was not yet through with them. The crucial point at stake underlying all these antagonisms was their rejection of him as Messiah and of his interpretation of Messiahship altogether. Now, then, he will look into their doctrine. What is the vital qualification of the Messiah? Who is he? They answered, "The son of David." It never occurred to them to say, "The Son of God!" Messiahship to them was a matter of royal lineage, of legal claims upon a vanished throne, of political and national aspirations. At best it was an old and narrow and worldly thing. To Jesus it was far otherwise. He was not interested in being a legitimist "pretender" to a kingdom of this world. He was not interested in his own Davidic descent. He got his authorization from the Almighty direct by purely spiritual insight. For him, the Messiah was not David's son, but God's. He was builder of a greater and quite different Kingdom from David's. He was a greater than David. He was, in spirit, David's Lord.

Then Jesus delivers publicly a scathing indictment of the self-righteous leaders of Judaism. In Mark it is expressed in one vigorous snappy sentence that curls and cracks like a long Eskimo whiplash. In Matthew a full account is given of his detailed denunciation of them all, these scribes and Pharisees and priests. It must have driven them to fury. Analyze Mark's brief summary and you find them guilty of the sin of pride (walking in long robes and receiving salutations in the public places); love of power (the chief, seats); inconsistency (praying long prayers while greedily taking the money of the poor); as well as of the selfishness and blindness that lay behind all these.

What a dreadful charge, and irrefutable! Woe to those who today are guilty of these same things, of pride and love of power and hypocrisy. It is they who have plunged the whole world into war.

A Note of Commendation

The chapter ends with a sweeter incident. Jesus looked about and saw one who was the very antithesis of all these things. He found some one to commend whenever he could. He let the contrast speak. In this woman he found humility, poverty, unselfishness, self-dedication. All the world has heard the story of the poor widow who silently offered the largest gift the temple received that day. It was only a mite. It was all she could give. It was outwardly insignificant and inwardly rich and beautiful and acceptable to God. But the Pharisee's wedge of gold and loud invocation were exactly the reverse—inwardly dross and refuse, unacceptable to him who seeth the heart.

The Periodical Zone System Will Aid German Propaganda

Ambassador Gerard said:

"Now we have to meet this German Propaganda. The war is not going to last forever—and you have seen what German Propaganda has done in Russia. These are grave dangers, and they only go to show what can happen in a country like Russia.

"Fortunately, they cannot propagate this country as they can Russia, because we have great publications that go all over the country and have unified the whole country and the whole continent. That is why I am against the postal zone law passed in the last Congress putting an extra tax on papers sent from the cities where published.

"They forget that, whether these publications go from Philadelphia, from San Francisco, or from Chicago, it is the exchange of these papers from and to all parts of the country that makes one universal, united America.

"They unify the sentiment, and that is worth far more in this war than the small amount of extra postage which the Government will obtain."

★ ★ ★ ★ ★

If you believe that no sections should be discriminated against in the cost of their reading matter, why not use your influence?

Write to your Congressman and one or both Senators. Simply write to them that you believe the zone system of second-class postage is wrong in principle and will be unjust in practice, and that Congress ought to reconsider the matter.

A Missionary Call for Russia

A CALL for prayer and conference on behalf of Russia's millions will be held at the Moody Tabernacle, Chicago, Ill., June 24 to June 28. The revolution has resulted in throwing open to the Gospel the largest population of white people in the world. There are 182,000,000 people in Russia, and yet there are not as many evangelical workers there as in the city of Chicago alone. Many are eagerly waiting for the Gospel. When, recently, one of the leaders of the "Dom Evangelia" Mission in Petrograd, immediately after returning from Siberia, went with his choir and workers to the large square directly in front of the Winter Palace, and conducted an open air Gospel service, large numbers of men and women assembled. After the message was delivered, the people turned to the preacher and said: "Where have you been so long? And why did you not tell us this before?" "I was in Siberia," was the reply.

The call continues: "Never since the beginning of Christianity has such an immense population of white people become accessible to missionary enterprise. The evangelization plan must embrace not only the 100,000,000 native Russians, but also the 7,000,000 Jews, the 20,000,000 Poles, the 30,000,000 Ukrainians, millions of Mohammedans (Tartars, Kurds, Kirghiz, etc.), Armenians, Rumanians and Greeks, and besides these the Bulgarians, Serbians, Croats, Montenegrins and other related Slavonic peoples. The Greek Orthodox Church is rapidly losing its grip on the hearts of the people, and the masses may be led astray into complete infidelity. Millions of the people are looking for something different. What is it to be? Atheism, or the Gospel? If the latter, then, because of existing conditions in Europe, America must assume chief responsibility for meeting the need.

"The immediate need is the printing and circulating of at least a million copies of the Russian Bible, three million copies of the New Testament, and a large supply of the very best Russian evangelical literature. Then several hundred evangelists, colporteurs and Christian workers must be trained and equipped for service in Russia. Already one hundred Russians in America have offered themselves for soul-saving service in their native land and are now in training, and there are also hundreds of converted and educated men in Russia who have suffered for their faith and who now need to be rallied and encouraged."

A choir of about fifty students from the Russian Bible Institute of Philadelphia are expected to be present to sing their beautiful Russian hymns during conference week. Russian-speaking and other Slavonic evangelists and missionary workers of the Chicago Tract Society will also assist. All inquiries and communications regarding the Conference should be addressed to Rev. Jesse W. Brooks (superintendent of the Chicago Tract Society), chairman Conference Executive Committee, 440 South Dearborn Street, Chicago, Ill.

Among the well known evangelical leaders who have signed the call for the Conference are Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman, Rev. W. H. Griffith-Thomas, Rev. C. I. Scofield, Rev. Francis E. Clark, Rev. Cortland Myers, Rev. William I. Chamberlain, Mr. Charles Gallaudet Trumbull, Mr. Delavan L. Pierson, Rev. Paul Rader, Rev. William I. Haven, Rev. D. M. Stearns, Rev. John F. Carson, Rev. R. A. Torrey, Mr. S. D. Gordon, Rev. S. B. Robold, Rev. Don O. Shelton, Mr. Hugh R. Mouro, Rev. William Petter, and many others.

Called Higher

MRS. LAURA PECKHAM SAYER, one of the oldest subscribers of the Christian Herald, died at Providence, R. I., March 23, in her ninety-third year. For three years she was a shut-in and blind; so she looked forward with pleasure each week to hear the sermons read from the Christian Herald. She had a beautiful Christian character. She said her part in life was to be patient; and nobly she did her part. She joined the church at twelve years of age, grew sweet and unselfish and was loved by all who knew her.

MRS. MARY FRANCES GILLILAND died on March 10 near Willard, Colo., in her 68th year. She was baptized and joined the Christian Church at the age of 14 years. She leaves a husband and six children. Since her childhood she lived a consistent Christian life, being a constant reader of the Bible, and a subscriber of the Christian Herald for at least 15 years.

AFTER more than seventy years in the Gospel ministry, Rev. A. L. Tryon died at his home near Wesley, Iowa, on March 7, 1918, in the 93d year of his life. He had been a Methodist preacher since his 18th year and was instrumental in saving many souls. He was pastor of the Methodist Church in his town, where he had lived and preached the Gospel since 1882.

JOSIAH PILE, of Barronvale, Pa., died April 21, at the age of 92. He was a Christian Herald subscriber and a great Bible reader and Sunday school worker. He leaves eight children.

"The Witching Drop of Lemon Juice"

— See How It Improves Tea

IN the famous restaurants and hotels the world over—lemon juice is displacing cream in tea. People abroad never think of tea without a "dash of Lemon" in it. And it isn't merely "fashion" that creates this great demand.

That incomparable tang that lemons add to scores of foods especially enhances the flavor of the finest teas.

And lemon juice is a rare appetizer—a digestive aid—due to the valuable salts and acids it contains.

Lemon juice furnishes also the precious vitamins, without which no meal can have the proper balance.

Here are three reasons, besides the mere question of fashion, that should decide you to serve lemon with your tea.

Try this new way to make your tea delicious. Tea is better, and is better for you, when you have learned to "prefer lemon."

Serve the lemons sliced or quartered.

How a Change of Food Restored My Life and transformed me from a physical weakling to what my friends call a man of iron

By EUGENE CHRISTIAN

TWENTY years ago I was at death's door. For years I had suffered the agonies of acute stomach and intestinal disorders. My physicians, including several of the most eminent specialists in the country, pronounced my case incurable and gave me up to die.

But although I could get no hope from anyone, I still clung to the idea that somehow, somewhere, I could find help.

I went out into the country—though scarcely able to walk—to think things over. I watched the animals on the farm. I noted the scientific feeding practised. I saw how with foods alone the farmer produced the results he wanted—how, to produce more milk, he fed his cows certain combinations of foods; how, to put fat on hogs, he fed other food combinations; how, to produce muscle in horses he fed still other food combinations. I learned that properly balanced rations produced just the results desired and I saw how improperly balanced rations produced wrong results.

And then a great thought flashed through my mind. It was this: If scientific eating can produce such remarkable results for animals, why wouldn't the same treatment be effective with the human animal?

A Boy's Vitality at 60

The results secured through animal feeding seemed to prove conclusively that there was an absolutely direct relation between the foods they eat and their physical condition, and of course this must be so with man.

Having been educated to be a physician myself, I determined to try some experiments. At first I made so many mistakes that I'd go a step forward and then two backward. But I persevered. I experimented and experimented and experimented. Soon I discovered a few basic laws. These I used as my foundation and gradually I began to improve until from a man who couldn't walk a city block without resting, unable to keep even the supposedly most simple meal down, so thin that the bones literally stuck out all over—from this I developed into a well man.

And I say "well" advisedly. Today I am nearly sixty years old and I haven't had a sick day in years. I work twelve to fifteen hours every day of my life and I never tire. It is a regular comment of my associates that I have more ginger, more vitality, and greater endurance than the average boy in his teens. And I owe it all to corrective eating.

23,000 Cases on Record

The above is Eugene Christian's own story of his remarkable recovery through correct eating. So amazing were the results in his own case that hundreds of people sought his advice about foods, usually after all other treatments had failed. Since then Christian has treated over 23,000 people for almost every non-organic ailment known with almost unvaried success.

One case of unusual interest was that of a young business man whose efficiency had been practically wrecked through stomach acidity, fermentation and constipation resulting in physical sluggishness which was naturally reflected in his ability to use his mind. He was twenty pounds under weight when he first went to see Christian and was so nervous he couldn't sleep. Stomach and intestinal gases were so severe that they caused irregular heart action and often fits of great mental depression. As Christian describes it he was not 50% efficient either mentally or physically. Yet in a few days, by following Christian's suggestions as to food, his constipation had completely gone, although he had formerly been in the habit of taking large daily doses of a strong cathartic. In five weeks every abnormal symptom had disappeared—his weight having increased 6 pounds. In addition to this he acquired a store of physical and mental energy so great in comparison with his former self as to almost belie the fact that it was the same man.

Another one of Christian's most interesting cases was that of a multi-millionaire—a man 70 years old—who had been traveling with his doctor for several years in a search for health. He was extremely emaciated, had chronic constipation, lumbago and rheumatism. For over twenty years he had suffered with stomach and intestinal trouble which in reality was super-aciduous secretions in the stomach. The first menus given him were designed to remove the causes of acidity, which was accomplished in about thirty days. And after this was done he seemed to undergo a complete rejuvenation. His eyesight, hearing, taste and all of his mental faculties became keener and more alert. He had had no organic trouble—but he was starving to death from malnutrition and decomposition all caused by the wrong selection and combination of foods. After six months' treatment this man was as well and strong as he had ever been in his life.

Help for Everyone

There have been so many inquiries from all parts of the United States from people seeking the benefit of Eugene Christian's advice and whose cases he is unable to handle personally that he has written a little course of lessons which tells you exactly what to eat for health, strength and efficiency.

These lessons, there are 24 of them, contain actual menus for breakfast, luncheon and dinner, curative as well as corrective, covering every condition of health and sickness from infancy to old age and for all occupations, climates and seasons. Reasons are given for every recommendation based upon actual results secured in the author's many years of practice although technical terms have been avoided. Every point is explained so clearly that there can be no possible misunderstanding.

With these lessons at hand it is just as though you were in personal contact with the great food specialist because every possible point is so thoroughly covered that you can scarcely think of a question which isn't answered. You can start eating the very things that will produce the increased physical and mental energy you are seeking the day you receive the lessons and will find that you secured results with the first meal.

Put It in Their Hands

The Boys in Khaki Need and Want the Christian Herald

WHAT do they read, these boys of ours in training camp, on shipboard, and over seas? The American Library Association, through the co-operation of thousands of people throughout the country, has equipped every training station, every camp, and every ship with a circulating library. But where they have been able to place one book there are from five to fifteen men with two good eyes apiece and just as much spare time as the fellows who happen to be lucky enough to get a book.

The people in response to the Postmaster General's order to forward magazines at a cent a copy have sent hundreds of thousands in the last year to the boys in camp. But even then there were more readers than reading, and anyway it is fresh, new magazines that the boys like best. They appreciate the love that licks the one cent stamp, but there is a peculiar value in the magazine that is all your own, and was never another's.

For the past year the Christian Herald Family has been providing subscriptions to the Christian Herald with Testaments for enlisted men in the army and navy. The Y. M. C. A., the American Bible Society, the New York Bible Society, the Scripture Gift Mission, and one or two other organizations have also furnished Testaments, until it transpires that practically every man in service has a Testament. Some have two or three and the opportunity for the distribution of other Testaments is limited to the supplying of the new drafts, as they are called. But there is an insistent call far and wide from chaplains and Y. M. C. A. workers for Christian Herald subscriptions to be sent to individual men, to hospitals, to Y. M. C. A. huts and to ships.

The publishers of the Christian Herald would like to place on the subscription list every man in the service at their own expense; but in these days of mounting prices it is impossible from a financial standpoint for the publisher to supply many free copies. On the other hand, it would be unfair to the Christian Herald Family not to give them a share in the very practical work of supplying the leading religious paper of the world to the men, who, most of all, need a personal Saviour.

Not long since, a Navy Chaplain sent to the Christian Herald a list of 25 names to each of which the publisher had offered to donate a six months' subscription. The chaplain said:—"There is great need for good religious literature among the men at the training station here and to help supply it we are trying to get the various denominational papers throughout the country to give us several subscriptions for use in the hospital wards and Y. M. C. A. huts." Of the 25, eight go to separate hospital wards, two to nurses' quarters, one to the officers' hospital quarters, one to a convalescent hotel, one to the main Y. M. C. A. headquarters, and two to the Y. M. C. A. huts, while 10 go direct to the Chaplain for distribution to individual men.

Another chaplain at a naval training station writes:—"We need some Christian Heralds here. The men like it, and use it when it is given to them. Both in the camps, barracks and hospitals, especially the sick men relish and praise it. We would be greatly obliged if you could give us 50 or 100 copies more." Fifty copies each of four issues were sent to the chaplain by prepaid express on receipt of this letter.

A chaplain on a gunboat in European waters wrote:—"I am glad to report that the men on the ship read and enjoy the Herald. The individuals who receive it read and pass it along to their shipmates, 600 in number. I am enclosing a list of names. If your offer is still open will you kindly send the Herald to each and it will be read by all. I find that the men take more interest when the magazine comes to them direct. The receiver reads and takes pride in passing along his magazine. I am using the Testaments carefully but they are going fast." The chaplain enclosed a list of 15 names, for all of which six months subscriptions were entered.

A Y. M. C. A. Secretary wrote from a training camp:—"Through the kindness of friends we have a goodly supply of current magazines for our reading room but no Christian literature. There are 1200 men at this field." Three new subscriptions for this training camp were entered.

THESE are only four windows looking in upon the camps. The long summer evenings are coming. What will your boy be doing with his time? There will be moving picture shows, athletic contests, social events in Y. M. C. A. huts and neighboring churches; but always there will be men with time hanging heavy on their hands, too tired for sociability, too weary to stand for an hour or two to see moving pictures, nor yet ready to turn in, anxious for something worth while to fill in the hours between mess and "lights out."

Let us go with one of these men as he seeks something to do. He may have a pass, and outside the camp there is company of a sort: foolish girls with painted faces, mercenary men with games of chance which they know how to operate, peddlers of poor liquors, and some who sell drugs, store keepers who charge shamelessly for the goods a soldier buys, by-paths and pitfalls that the soldier knows only too well, yet into which he sometime stumbles in desperation because of the lack of better things to do.

The Fosdick Commission of the Army and the Navy is putting an end to much of this. But this boy which we are thinking about today is not interested in these things. He knows what is outside of the camp, he knows what is inside. He wants to read. He goes to the Y. M. C. A. hut. All the good books that are in he has read; all the books he wants to read are out. The camp's table is covered with much-read, much-thumbed, dog-eared, crumpled and soiled magazines. He tries one after another, but none satisfies. He wanders back to the barracks; sits down on his cot with an hour or two of daylight still remaining. Then down the aisle comes the sergeant with the last of the day's mail. He calls "Private Jones," and that is his name, and there, with a letter from home, is a brand-new magazine, the issue for that week, with the news of the world, good stories, and good reading, a sermon by such a minister as he would like to hear, and other articles that take him back home to the little church where his feet first found the way into the Kingdom. We see him tear open the letter first. His face lights up, for it is a good letter, a happy letter, a newsy letter, and it cheers him. He reads it three times and tucks it in his pocket to be taken out and read again and again until the next one comes. Then he turns to the magazine, reads as long as the western light is good, then lies on his bunk and reads until the fellows come in from the movie show; and harring a certain share in the jibes and jokes and rough-house that comes with the turning in of any bunch of fully alive and active men, he is still reading when the bugle blows "lights out."

It is the privilege and it is within the power of the members of the Christian Herald Family to duplicate this little scene in all of the camps, cantonments, and training stations throughout the nation, on hundreds of ships, and wherever our boys are stationed "Over There." The publisher of the Christian Herald is anxious to supply it as widely as possible to the boys in the service. They need its spiritual message; they like its stories and its news, just as you do.

AT the beginning of the war, when the demand for Testaments was insistent and the opportunity for giving them out almost unlimited, we urged you to send money for subscriptions and Testaments. Now that the Testament situation is well in hand and the con-

Little Lessons in Corrective Eating and Christian Herald for a Year

$5.00 Value for $3.00

Nearly two hundred thousand sets of Eugene Christian's Little Lessons have been sold during the past two years at $3.00 each, but through a special arrangement with the publishers, the Christian Herald is able to offer its readers this remarkable set of lessons, together with a year's subscription to Christian Herald for only $3.00. This means a $2.00 saving.

The Christian Herald has fully investigated Eugene Christian's food system and can confidently recommend it to its readers. Already over 7,000 of our subscribers have bought sets of these books and have fully tested their value. Their approval confirms our opinion as to their merits. Eugene Christian's system is not to be confused in any way with the medical systems; it is wholly scientific hygiene reduced to the last point of simplicity. We believe that its adoption by all of our readers would result in their overwhelming endorsement of it; hence, being fully convinced of its merits we see no reason to withhold the Christian Herald's unqualified commendation of a system which is capable of doing so much good.

Only a limited number of the Little Lessons are available, however, so immediate action is necessary. Mail the coupon today.

stant demand is for the Christian Herald alone, we again urge you to provide the paper for these chaplains, Y. M. C. A. secretaries, Red Cross workers and officers and men in the armed service of the United States who ask for it in every mail and to whom the paper is both a message from home and an inspiration for the day's work. You may order these subscriptions for any one in the service of the country and enter the subscription in his name; or you may send us the amount of money to be used in filling requests received from the field. Every dollar received will put a six months' subscription on the books, and these subscriptions will receive the first copies of each issue off the press.

General Pershing has urgently requested that the men be sent current magazines fresh from the press. These they appreciate above all others. To send them is a service as much appreciated as any of the auxiliary services which have been organized since the war began. Thousands of dollars have been sent to raise smokes for the boys; as many thousands might well be invested in Christian Heralds. The sending of literature is almost on a par with the sending of money for the Red Cross. Outside of medical treatment and hospital care the boy, who has been through the fury of the battle and has come out wounded, broken in body, with his nerves shattered, needs wholesome company, new things to think about, and something to occupy his mind while his wounds are healing. A good illustrated magazine gives him new subjects of thought, and helps to bridge over the hours of enforced idleness. No matter whether the boy is in camp with the day's work done or in the hospital itching for another crack at the enemy a Herald will find him. Wherever he is and wherever you send it its usefulness will be multiplied manifold, for the boys are proud of their magazines and will pass them around and they will be read until they are read up; sometimes even single pages are carried into the trenches to relieve the moments of tension while they wait for the alarm.

Importance of the Lincoln Highway

MR. F. A. SEIBERLING, who has been elected president of the Lincoln Highway Association, succeeding Mr. Henry B. Joy, who has entered the aviation section of the government service, is one of America's "big men" of business. Mr. Seiberling is president of the Goodyear Tire & Rubber Company, of Akron, Ohio, and brings to his new office a notable record of achievement in American industry. After a varied business experience, he founded, in 1898, the big rubber concern of which for nineteen years he has been the active head, and which today with its $110,000,000 annual business, is a monument to his business and financial ability. He is one of the men who early anticipated the need of a great transcontinental highway, and has from the inception of the Lincoln Highway been one of its staunch supporters, expending time, energy and money in its behalf. For four years he has served as one of its directors. A seventeen-mile strip of the highway just west of Salt Lake City is known as the "Seiberling Section" in recognition of his support of the great project. As a director of the United States Chamber of Commerce, he has spent much time lately in Washington, and is in close touch with the government's war program, and alive to the importance of the Lincoln Highway as a factor in the great transportation problem. About ten months ago President Seiberling established a long distance motor truck line between Akron, Ohio, and Boston, Mass., operating over the Lincoln Highway from Pittsburg to New York. The success of this line has encouraged others to inaugurate similar lines, although operating over shorter distances, until today the Lincoln Highway is being used to transport many tons of important finished and raw materials to the eastern seaboard. "The winning of the war," he says, "may depend largely upon the use made of this great highway. We see this emphasized now in the transportation of army trucks under their own power to eastern seaports, for shipment to France. A train of thirty army trucks is leaving Detroit daily, all of which are operating over the Lincoln Highway. Hundreds of business houses in the East have purchased trucks from the Middle West factories and have been unable to obtain satisfactory delivery by railroad, and are having them driven through, largely over this highway, even in the face of the heavy snows and extreme cold weather. We are alive to the importance of this great roadway in speeding up our war activities and are planning to expend approximately $4,000,000 this year in actual road work."

A Notable Conference Call

A BIBLE conference on "The Return of our Lord and Related Events," such as the regathering of Israel and the fulfillment of prophecy concerning the end of the age, has been called to meet in Philadelphia on May 28, 29 and 30, with pastors and Bible teachers of different denominations, to consider prayerfully the teachings of Scripture as to the Lord's return. The call says: "In view of the world-wide desire for clear light on the theme, we rejoice in the statement of truths concerning our Lord's return. It is to unite in securing and in giving light on this theme, and to present an unhesitating Scriptural testimony, that all interested are earnestly invited to this conference." The call is signed by Revs. William D. B. Ainey, R. V. Bingham, John R. Davies, Frederic W. Farr, H. W. Griffith-Thomas, Harris H. Gregg, Robert B. Haines, Jr., Charles L. Huston, Fred Kelker, L. W. Send in Your Sets of Answers for the Bible Study

PARTICIPANTS in the National Bible Picture Study may now submit their sets of verses, and all sets must be submitted by May 31, 1918. Sets mailed as late as that final date—May 31—will be accepted, even though we receive them much later; the postmark will show that they were mailed on time.

The following excerpt from the Rules gives the directions for submitting sets. Everyone must follow these directions:

"Participants may submit sets of answers after April 22, 1918, but not later than May 31, 1918—which is the last day for submitting answers. Sets of answers sent by mail must be mailed not later than May 31, 1918. Sets of answers sent by express must be delivered at the express office on or before May 31, 1918. Participants who present sets of answers at the Christian Herald office personally or by personal messenger must do so before 5 P. M. May 31, 1918."

Tell your postal clerk, when he weighs your set of answers, that it must go as first class mail, upon which the postage rate is now 3 cents for each ounce or fraction. One Answer Book, in a thin envelope or light wrapper, will require 9 cents in stamps. If wrapper or envelope is at all thick, or several sheets of wrapping paper are used, the postage will be 12 cents or more.

Be sure your set of answers carries sufficient postage! And do not fold or roll your set of answers; wrap it up flat.

How Norwesco Laboratories Met An Emergency With SE-MENT-OL

"FINDS THE LEAK AND FIXES IT"

How often this happens:

Miles from a garage, while your car is humming over beckoning roads, your radiator suddenly starts steaming. You stop, and find it nearly empty. Leaking!

The joy deserts your little trip—unless you have a can of SE-MENT-OL, the radiator cement, in your tool box.

SE-MENT-OL, just poured into the radiator, fixes the leak permanently. Sure as solder and far cheaper—does not lay up the car. Cannot clog or injure any part of cooling system. Price 75 cents; Canada, 85 cents.

Other Norwesco products are SKALEX, the radiator cleaner—CARBONOX, the carbon remover—NORWESCO Top and Upholstery Dressings—UTILITY BLACK, for touching up metal parts—NORWESCO Valve Grinding Compound. They are sold by most hardware and accessory dealers and garage men.*

How a $150 Repair Job Cost a Motorist $1⁵⁰/₁₀₀

ONE day Mr. Robert Hoffman of Pittsburgh discovered a cylinder of his engine cracked clear through! It leaked so badly that water filled all the cylinders, making his car useless. A $150 repair job stared him in the face!

Someone told him about "X" Liquid, the Scientific Process of repairing leaks in the cooling system. He bought a $1.50 can of "X," poured it into the radiator—and saw that the water soon stopped leaking! Today this "X" Liquid repair is standing up under 2,000 pounds explosive pressure.

"X" Repairs Leaks without Solder or Welding!

Thousands of motorists now know that "X" Liquid is the only process for making quick, permanent and economical repairs everywhere in the cooling system—in radiators, pumps, gaskets, hose connections, etc.

"X" is simply poured into the radiator. It immediately becomes a part of the water, flows through every leak—and hardens right in the hole. "X" repairs every leak with one application, and if left in the water absolutely prevents future leaks.

"X" Eliminates Rust and Scale!

In addition to repairing leaks—"X" Liquid loosens the rust and scale now present. It absorbs all free oxygen in the water and prevents new rust from forming. Moreover, "X" Liquid prevents scale from depositing itself on the metal walls. In this way "X" Liquid keeps the water passages free and clear. This gives better cooling, more power and a saving of oil.

Don't confuse "X" Liquid with cements, powders or flaxseed meals in liquid form. "X" is a pure LIQUID—and is guaranteed to do the work without injuring the cooling system.

"X" is the only Scientific Process for making cooling systems Leak-proof—Rust-proof—Scale-proof.

favor of the feasibility of the scheme. The cost is estimated at between £400,000,000 ($2,000,000,000) and £500,000,000 ($2,500,000,000).

HUNGER IN GERMANY. Washington announced, on April 29, that diplomatic word received through Berne indicated that Germany was considering a reduction in the bread ration during the month preceding harvest. It was announced that the first deliveries from the Ukraine would not begin before May. Austria is also reported to be hungering and on the verge of rebellion, lacking only leadership.

PRINZIP DIES. Gavrilo Princip, the assassin of Archduke Francis Ferdinand at Sarajevo, Bosnia, on June 28, 1914, died of tuberculosis in a fortress near Prague, on April 30. Princip struck the match that the Kaiser's hand applied to the inflammable tinder of national ambition, setting the world ablaze with the furious flame of war.

BUILDING SHIPS. American shipyards in April turned out 240,000 dead weight tons of shipping, or 9,000 tons for each of the 26 working days. The record for the first four months of the year shows a total of 621,340 dead weight tons, representing 80 vessels. Eleven of 91,541 tons were launched in January, sixteen of 123,100 tons in February, twenty-one of 166,700 tons in March, and thirty-two of 240,000 tons in April. If the average of the first four months is maintained, American yards will produce 2,485,360 tons of shipping by the end of the year. There is every expectation that the total will be in excess of 4,000,000 tons. The net loss of Allied and neutral shipping in 1917 was 3,920,268 tons.

CHALLENGE POSTAL RATES. Mr. John C. Coons, First Assistant Postmaster General, asserted before the Senate Committee on Post Offices, on May 1, that the cost of carrying newspapers and periodicals by mail was from 5.4 cents a pound to 12.2 cents, depending on the distance carried. He conceded, however, that 3.86 of the 5.4 cents represented overhead charges. Publishers' representatives challenged his figures, questioned the possibility of getting accurate figures, and assured the committee that the rates should be deferred for at least a year because of the inability to get accurate figures on postal costs, and because the war and rising costs of publication were already adding largely to the cost of operation. The overhead charges figured against second-class matter were reported to represent largely the cost of carrying government-franked matter. The publishers are making a united fight for the defeat of the new postal rate. Unless the subscribers—who in the end will have to pay—are heard from in sufficient force, Congress may not take action at this session. Your letter to your Senator or Representative may wield the final influence.

IRISH CONSCRIPTION DELAYED. Conscription was to have begun in Ireland on May 1. Mass meetings throughout the island, many of them under the leadership of prelates and priests of the church, had placed much of Ireland in the Sinn Fein camp. There was every evidence that an attempt to enforce conscription at this time might defeat itself, and at the same time the rate of enlistment in the island in the forces of the Empire rose steadily, showing that not all Irishmen were slackers. On May 1, however, the British government, by an Order in Council, postponed the operation of the conscription act as it applied to Ireland, it being suggested that no attempt would be made to enforce conscription until the government Home Rule Bill had been presented in Parliament, which would not be before a week.

WARSHIP SINKS COASTER. The Savannah line steamship City of Athens, bound from New York to Savannah, was rammed in a dense fog off the Delaware Capes shortly after one o'clock on Wednesday morning, May 1, by a French warship, whose name was not given. The steel bow of the warship cut deeply into the side of the steamer. It sank in about seven minutes. Of the 135 people on board 35 passengers and 33 of the crew were saved.

PROFITABLE DELAY. Gutzon Borglum, the sculptor, becoming convinced that there was a gentleman of color concealed in the conflicting reports about the aircraft situation, secured a letter from the President, through the power of which he gained certain information. He reported to the President, and later gave to the press the substance of his report. He declared that the chief signal officer of the army had been a rubber stamp for a group of American junkers who had spent nearly a billion of dollars on aircraft production without producing or delivering a serviceable airplane. He declared that there had been colossal profiteering in contracts. An investigating committee of the aeronautical society made public a similar statement on May 1, in which it charged that less than five per cent. of the available manufacturing facilities of the country had been utilized by the Aircraft Productions Board. It was apparent that Gen. Squier and Secretary Baker were misled by those upon whom they depended. The Borglum report was a subject of debate in the Senate on April 29, and May 2, the debate indicating the probability of a searching inquiry, which the President was said to favor if sufficient direct evidence against individuals was available to make the inquiry effective. Meantime American aviators flying French machines were beginning to take a regular toll of German airmen.

AUSTRIAN PARLIAMENT REPRESSED. Emperor Charles of Austria on May 4 adjourned the Austro-Hungarian Parliament and inaugurated measures to render impossible the resumption of its activities. The party leaders were notified by the Premier that the Government was prepared to impress its will by force. The action was reported to have been precipitated by the growing movement in Austria for independence or at least autonomy for the subject races of the empire. The 7,000,000 Slavs, Serbs, Croats and Slovenes are becoming insistent, and Bohemia has been long in a state of incipient rebellion. A conference of subject races was held in Rome, April 9-11, at which a program having the full support of Italy was arranged.

DUTCH-GERMAN CRISIS PASSES. The Dutch Minister for Foreign Affairs announced, on May 5, that the period of tension between Germany and Holland had ended, Germany having agreed to limit the transportation of gravel and sand across Holland to the quantity needed for the maintenance of Belgian highways.

WILL RATION SUGAR TO MANUFACTURERS. The Food Administration announced, on May 5, that all manufacturers using sugar, except those making essential foodstuffs would have their supplies of sugar reduced this year to 80 per cent. of the quantity used in 1917. Producers of non-edible products will have to do without sugar. The action was taken to insure sufficient sugar for the summer canning season.

FRAGMENTS OF NEWS. The Senate on May 1 passed the bill appropriating $60,000,000 to build houses for workers in shipyards, arsenals and other stations where war work is carried on. . . . 122 American soldiers were decorated with the French War Cross on April 28 for bravery in action. 117 were from the 10th (Massachusetts) regiment, which bore the brunt of the German attack of April 12 in the Apremont Forest. . . . The Navy Department on April 29 announced the names of three enlisted men wounded in the service, one of whom had died. . . . Cambridge University in England will confer the degree of Doctor of Laws upon President Wilson. . . . Frank Bopp, former German Consul General at San Francisco, and his Vice-Consul E. H. Von Schack, were sentenced on April 30 to serve two years each in Federal Penitentiary and to pay a fine of $10,000 each for conspiring to cause a revolution in India in violation of American neutrality. . . . Vilhjalmur Stefansson, who has been seriously ill on Herschell Island for a number of weeks, reached Fort Yukon, Alaska, on April 27. . . . Herbert Hoover at a conference of grain men in New York late in April declared that the crop outlook promised sufficient wheat for both America and her Allies in the coming year. . . . The report, that Germans interned by the United States are living on the fat of the land is entirely false. They receive only the regular garrison rations of the United States Army, as provided for by the Hague Convention.

tions at several points, particularly at Meteren, west of Bailleul, while the French advanced somewhat east of Loere. Mist and rain, as for the two days previously, almost completely prevented aerial work. The German High Command was reported to have explained its defeat on Monday by declaring that the attack was not intended as an offensive maneuver, but really as a reconnaissance in force to test the strength of the enemy. Inasmuch, however, as field artillery was placed well forward, one gun even coming within 700 yards of the battle-line, and as the attacks were repeated many times, it must have taken the German commander some time to fully satisfy himself as to the Allies' strength.

May 2 and 3 saw the Allies attacking for local advantages along various portions of the long battle-line, the action of the two days centering largely along the front from Villers-Bretonneux to Montdidier. On this front the French on the 2d and 3d made progress, pushing forward on the 2d in Hangard Wood, and also occupying Baune Wood, southwest of Mailly Raineval, capturing prisoners and machine-guns. German counter-attacks were repulsed. A German attempt to attack at Thennes, near the junction of the Luce and Avre Rivers, southeast of Amiens, was smothered with artillery fire and the French, attacking took Hill 82 west of Castel and advanced their lines over a front of a mile and a quarter. The Germans were reported to be massing guns and troops on both sides of the Arras salient.

The French submarine Prairial was sunk on May 1 by a collision with a merchant ship. Part of her crew were saved. The English naval sloop Cowslip was torpedoed, on May 1, five officers and one man were missing. The British torpedo boat 90 was reported on the same day to have foundered, one officer and 12 men being missing. Italy lost one small sailing vessel through the operation of submarines in the week ending April 27.

Saturday and Sunday, May 4 and 5, were marked by local attacks and artillery exchanges. The German artillery held the whole southern leg of the Flanders salient, from the Nieppe Forest along the La Bassée canal almost to Givenchy, under heavy fire. There were two local attacks, one at Locon north of Bethune and one near Hinges, a little farther west. Both were completely repulsed, the British even gaining ground near Hinges. In the neighborhood of Loere the French and British gained additional ground making a penetration of 500 yards toward Dranoutre over a 1500-yard front, taking heights west of Dranoutre, which materially strengthened their positions.

On the rest of the front there was little activity, except at Verdun and in Lorraine where the German artillery was busy and some raids were attempted. American troops near Lunenburg repulsed an attempted raid while it was in the making and the artillery destroyed a small German salient.

The Italian front showed signs of growing activity also, the artillery action increasing and raids multiplying on both sides.

In the last days of the week the conditions were favorable for flying and the Allied airmen, both in France and Italy were active in bombing work and in driving back the enemy's fliers.

CHRISTIAN HERALD

THE least thing you can do for your country is to—show its flag. Let your neighbors know that yours is a patriotic home. You'll need a flag for Holidays too—in fact for every day during these strenuous times.

A large-sized "Old Glory," six feet long and four feet wide. The very flag you've wanted. It will add much to your celebration of Memorial Day and Independence Day. You'll need it, too, for other National Holidays and local celebrations when the American Flag is indispensable.

The illustration is an actual photographic reproduction of this splendid large flag, which we have procured for readers of the Christian Herald. To insure durability the stripes are double-stitched. Excellent bright colors, guaranteed not to fade, nor shrink. Pole is NOT included. Let your children get their first lessons in patriotism in your own home. If you stand solidly behind the great principles of Freedom and Human Rights, let the flag tell it. Pledge your allegiance to your country by displaying "Old Glory." We will make it easy for you to show your colors. Here is an offer that brings you "Old Glory" at half the price you would pay for a similar flag if purchased in a store—and at the time it is most needed. At this critical time in the history of our country you should display the Stars and Stripes.

By placing an order for thousands of these flags, we were able to purchase them at a considerable reduction. We are glad to give readers of the Christian Herald the benefit of this saving in the liberal offer mentioned above. This flag cannot be purchased in a store for less than $1.50.

The Christian Herald Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

WE often hear the practical suggestion that God expects us to answer our own prayers. If we pray for financial help we must expect to do our best to earn; if we pray for healing we must use our will, our faith and such measures as we have reason to believe effective; if we pray for spiritual blessing, we must be much in the company of our Lord, in prayer and in the reading of the Word. There can be no passive expectation of God's prayer-answering power. So now, when we pray for victory, for the power of righteousness to rule again among men and nations, we must do our part to answer our prayer. Do we ask victory? It lies on the other side of sacrifice—our lives, our best endeavors, our sons, our dollars sum up the price. Do we ask that right shall rule? It may, when we love as we would be loved, when we deal justly, when we no longer covet, and all our steps are upright. A Liberty Bond in our strong box is a good foundation for a prayer for victory. Active helpfulness in some form of ministry to need and suffering is a step toward the international concord of our prayers. Let us pray by all means, let the heavens echo with petitions; but meantime let us work toward the answer with all the energies we possess.

J. L. K., an aged brother, acknowledges with grateful heart the comfort and peace of mind, and alleviation of bodily infirmities, which have come to him since he became a member of the Prayer League.

F. H. B. asks the prayers of the League that he and his wife may be restored to health and be cured of a chronic trouble.

A. W. K., a Christian mother, writes that her boy, who is a corporal in the army, has been told by the medical officers that he is physically unfit for army service and there is danger that he may be left behind when his companions go to take part in the great fight for a freer and better world. The boy, she says, "feels it keenly, and doesn't want to be discharged, for he feels that he must go over and do his bit. My request is: Pray for his restoration to health, that he may go and help in bringing about this world's peace. He is a Christian boy."

C. J., Detroit, Mich., sends a prayer for the ending of the war, together with one dollar, which has been applied to the work of the Bowery Mission.

Mrs. L. W. F., praises God for life and strength preserved through several weeks of confinement, the result of a fall; also for the preservation of the lives of her husband and sons. She asks prayer for the conversion of her children.

Mrs. L. M. D. praises God for the recovery of one of her two boys, who went through a difficult operation; and now she asks the prayers of God's children for the other, who is suffering from tuberculosis, and she feels that the power of God is all that can save him.

Persons who desire a prayer chart, with a subject for each day, can secure one by addressing W. F. Clowes, Africa Inland Mission, 356 Bridge St., Brooklyn, N. Y.

Prayers are asked for revivals of religion at:

What dishwashing does to drainpipes

Almost everybody knows what clogs up the drainpipes—the grease from dishes and pots and pans, which hardens and keeps the water from flushing away bits of waste from the sink. Gold Dust, when used for dishwashing, not only dissolves the grease on the dishes, but keeps your sink and drainpipe free, unclogged and sanitary. If you've had trouble with your sink and drainpipe, you'll appreciate this hint. (Adv.)

American-Japanese Relations

JAPAN'S relation to the world and the world war is a matter of increasing interest to millions of Americans. Is Japan playing a shrewd, selfish game, reserving her forces until the time comes to strike hard in order to reap enormous profits, to the loss and even the permanent damage of her present allies? Or is she honestly co-operating with them, ready to aid in building up a new world order, in which all nations, the small and the weak, as well as the great and the strong, shall have justice, security and opportunity? These are questions of vital importance. Indisputable facts that throw light on the situation should be keenly welcomed by every intelligent American.

These remarks are suggested by a booklet recently published by Dr. Gulick entitled, "Anti-Japanese War Scare Stories." The author has rendered an important service by running down a number of stories that have been circulated throughout the United States during the past few years. He shows that whatever may be the facts in regard to Japan's alleged sinister policies, many of the stories used to prove them have been without foundation.

It is now known, moreover, that the German Government has for years been at work seeking to foment trouble between America and Japan. German agents have circulated in America plausible stories about the "Japanese menace to America," and in Japan about the "American menace to Japan." How much of the mutual suspicion now found in both America and Japan is due to these stories it is difficult at once to decide. A few things, however, are beyond dispute.

First: Japan faces a serious economic problem because of her enormous and increasing population. She has but limited natural resources. So small is the amount of her arable land that for every square mile there are 2,688 inhabitants. Emigration to the great continents of vast undeveloped resources has, moreover, been refused by Canada, the United States, Australia, New Zealand and Siberia. In spite of her economic obstacles, Japan has, nevertheless, given her people universal education, modern methods of justice, industry, civil government and a world outlook.

Second: The policy of the European nations in their dealings with Africa and Asia has too often been characterized by selfishness, greed, fraud, aggression, and secret diplomacy. Too often have they resorted to ruthless military occupancy and annexation. In the light of these features of the policies of Occidental nations in the Far East, Japan has feared the partition of China among the powers of Europe. For it would cause her incalculable harm and prevent her from having any opportunity whatever in the world.

Third: Japan, accordingly, following more or less closely the methods of Europe, has been seeking recently to get ahead of those nations and to take the leadership of China into her own hands.

Fourth: The time has come for a new policy in the dealing of the nations. America should make this a cardinal principle at the World Peace Council. But in order that it may be really adopted and followed, provision should be made for the real economic needs of the heavily populated countries. Safety, opportunity and justice for all, small and great alike, should be the guiding principles of the peace terms. But whatever may be thought of these larger questions, it is of highest importance that our people should know the actual facts in regard to Japan's relations with America. "Anti-Japanese War Scare Stories" deals effectively with the matters which it discusses.

"Anti-Japanese War Scare Stories," published by the World Alliance for International Friendship, 105 East 22nd Street, New York City.

The World's Need of Christ

From a Sermonic Address by Rev. Robert E. Speer

IF Christ were King in the world today, there would not be a hungry mouth anywhere under the sun, nor one little crying child. Men need Christ today not for their bodies' sake only. The moral needs of the world are as deep now as they were when Christ came, and they are everywhere. If they are in America, they are in every land. Where Christ's influence has never been felt even so slightly as in our own land there those moral needs are deeper and darker still. Christianity is the only religion in the world that forbids polygamy. Every other religion either allows it or encourages or enjoins it. In a world like this there are abysmal moral needs rooted, many of them, in the unjust treatment of womanhood, that call for Christ. We protest against any denial of Christ to the world. It has a title in him equal to any title that we have. The world calls for him.

Was there ever a day when not for all men one by one, for the wants of their individual homes and hearts, but in one great mass of want, the world's need of Christ was so sharp and imperious as it is today? Who but Jesus Christ can ever bind this torn and discordant world together? We tried to do it with trade and it could not be done. We tried to do it with diplomacy, but diplomacy failed. We have tried to do it with secular education, but secular education has been unequal to the task. There is only one way in which the world ever can be united in one: "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth," said Jesus Christ, "will draw all men unto me." In the one Head of all humanity, the one Shepherd of the whole flock of every race and every people and every tongue—only there can any hope of human unity ever be found. In a day when we are weary of the strife and hatred and war of the world, the need of the world for Christ protests against any abridgment of our will and purpose to share him now with all the life of men.

And we believe in not only maintaining all that we have begun, but in even now enlarging and extending every effort to carry Christ today—not when the war is over, but today—to the last ends of the world, because we know what carrying Christ will signify and what nothing else will signify to mankind.

Merry Moments

THE ELDER'S SPEECH. It was the regular midweek service of the church. The minister being away, the meeting was in charge of one of the elders. This man had repeatedly spoken about how the minister had nothing to do but to get up and talk, and of course any one could do that. So the pastor determined to give him a trial. The room was crowded with people interested in the subject of the evening. After the Scripture was read, the elder started in to discourse concerning the theme. He got off for a good start. "It's a very lovely lesson that we have for our consideration tonight, my friends," he began. Then he stopped, pulled out his handkerchief and blew his nose vigorously. "I say that it is a very lovely evening that we have for our lesson," he repeated. As the sweat began to pour down his face, he tried again.

"Ahem! I say that this is a very lovely consideration of this subject for the evening." The congregation was convulsed at his attempt to edify them, but they were thrown into hysterics when, shifting from one foot to the other in a wild manner, and slapping his head with his hand excitedly, he cried out: "Well, I had a fine speech for to-night, but I just clean forgot it."

HE HAD FAITH. A minister had taught his little four-year-old son to ask the blessing. One day the family were visiting and as the dinner was to be served in courses there was very little food on the table. The little boy, told to ask the blessing, said: "Dear Jesus, we thank thee for giving us our daily bread. It isn't very much this time, but we are thankful just the same."

"Closer to Nature and the Almighty"

THIS is the philosophy of Mrs. Gene Stratton-Porter, the author of "The Harvester," "A Girl of the Limberlost" and other marvelously successful stories—to bring those who read her books "closer to nature and the Almighty." Mrs. Porter has opened the eyes of thousands to the wonder and glory of the world about them. She, who has spent her lifetime with the birds, the moths, the butterflies, the herbs and the flowers, weaves into her stories the love of Nature, and every one of her novels stimulates the reader's interest in the life of the woods and fields.

Mrs. Porter's stories all have, as a fundamental reason of their existence, the author's great love of Nature. To impart this love to others—to inspire many hundreds of thousands to look for the first time with seeing eyes at the pageant of the out-of-doors—is her gift of rare quality. Through the romance of life and the delights of nature she directs the mind upward toward the Infinite, into an atmosphere that is sweet, cleansing and exalting.

In writing of "A Girl of the Limberlost," Mrs. Porter said: "This comes fairly close to my idea of a good book. The book can, and does, present a hundred pictures that will draw any reader in closer touch with nature and the Almighty, my primal object in each line I write."

Over Three Million Copies of Mrs. Porter's Books Have Been Sold

ALL large book circulations come from only one cause—the recommendation of one reader to another. Mrs. Porter's books are wholesome, and there are more good, upright, wholesome people in the United States than any other kind. Mrs. Porter's novels are not only wholesome and clean, but they are romantic and cheerful. The people who live in their pages do things and accomplish tasks worth while, and one's soul is not harrowed by horrors.

Mrs. Gene Stratton-Porter's first book, "Freckles," was published some years ago, and sold a few thousand; the next year it sold a few more. The following year her second book, "A Girl of the Limberlost," was published and began to sell. Meantime, "Freckles" went on selling more and more until it sold over 100,000 copies a year. Other books followed, until in the last six months of 1915 the sales of her books in the United States, England, Australia, and many other places sold 625,000 copies for six months alone.

Another reason why Mrs. Porter's books have so great an appeal is that the whole family enjoy them. They are not for men, women, or children, but for all three; and an important feature is that they will be eagerly read by young people, and the nature side cannot but be an inspiration.

Few books of recent years have sounded such a new and wholly refreshing note as that which dominates "Freckles." It has been read, it is estimated, by more than 5,000,000 people.

A Rare Opportunity to Obtain a Special Edition of Mrs. Porter's Novels

IT is the desire of the Christian Herald to give its readers an opportunity to procure the best in literature at very reasonable cost.

Of the many thousands of books which we considered, we have selected Mrs. Gene Stratton-Porter's novels as the ones which should be in every Christian Herald home. Arrangements have just been completed with the publishers of Mrs. Porter's works to print a special edition of six volumes of the most popular stories by this talented writer.

These six volumes will be printed from the plates used in the original edition—the type being large and clear, and the paper of exceptional quality. The books are bound in fine cloth, with gilt tops, making them especially attractive.

There are, in addition, twenty-five full-page illustrations by well-known artists.

Gene Stratton-Porter's Novels

At the Foot of the Rainbow

An idyl of central Indiana—a tale of devoted friendship and tender, self-sacrificing love—the friendship that gives freely without return, and the love that seeks first the happiness of the object. The story reaches real heights of endearing sentiment and tender paths.

Freckles

Few books of recent years have sounded such a new and wholly refreshing note as that which dominates "Freckles," the highly successful novel by Mrs. Gene Stratton-Porter. This volume has just been issued in a new and attractively illustrated edition.

A Girl of the Limberlost

This companion story to "Freckles" has repeated the striking success of that book, which, published over ten years ago, has steadily increased its tens of thousands of readers year by year. It is an exquisitely simple love story which stands for true womanhood, as did "Freckles" for pure manhood. It breathes a message of compassion and strength.

The Harvester

Mrs. Porter has lavished upon this unique romance all the wealth of nature lore and nature love from her years of patient, enthusiastic study. It is a charming blend of love, romance and the hidden delights of the woods and roads.

Laddie—A True-Blue Story

The love story of Laddie and Pamela Pryor, the English neighbors of the Strattons, as told by Little Sister, the youngest of the Pryors. A genuine "home-story" close to the heart of Man and of Nature.

Song of the Cardinal

A beautiful and touching story of the love of a Cardinal bird for its mate with an appeal to every one who cares for true romance, as delightful for its descriptions of wild life and nature as for its tender human feelings.

Young People's Topics for May 26

Improving the Sunday School

B. Y. P. U. Topic. 11 Tim. 2:2

THE Sunday school is the spiritual field from which the church must harvest most of its members of tomorrow. It must, therefore, be more than a school. It must be both a teaching and an evangelizing agency. It must so teach the truths of the Scripture that they will lead the young people to a personal knowledge of Christ, and at the same time train them for Christian leadership. The Epworth League, Baptist Young People's Union and the Christian Endeavor are normal schools into which the Sunday school pupils graduate. The place of primary importance is the Bible school, for if children are not interested in the things of Christ there, it is not probable that they will be readily secured as members for the Young People's Society, as they are more likely to drift away by the time that they become eligible for membership.

The improvements are of two kinds: those that make a change in methods, with much or little apparent difference in results, and those that put new force and vigor into methods already in use, modifying them perhaps where they have shown weakness. The Sunday school like the public school has suffered from fads on the one hand and from conservatism on the other. The best that Sunday-school leaders can do is to be constantly watchful for any lack of interest in the school and constantly on the alert for new means to retain interest and to drive home truth; and to be always ready to learn new ways and new methods, if there is reason to believe that they will prove effective. The International Lessons have been greatly improved in the last year; the usefulness of the graded lesson has been greatly extended; the Adult Bible Class Movement has worked transformation in many schools. There is strength in all of these, but each school is a separate problem and there is no assurance that success will follow the same unvaried method in any particular school. Officers and teachers who want to keep their school up to the minute will do well to keep in close touch with the Sunday School Department of the church, addressing Wm. E. Chalmers, Ed. Sec., 1701 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa., with the County and State Conventions and with the Sunday School Times, which is the moving force back of thousands of successful schools. Frank L. Brown's Sunday School Methods, published in the Christian Herald, offer also tried and proven means for the lifting of the school from an ordinary existence to a vital, throbbing life.

What Wrongs Need Righting in Our Town

Epworth League Topic. Isa. 58:6-11; Nch. 13:15-18

THE references for this topic seem to indicate that those who chose it had in mind the breaches of the Sabbath which are so common among us. There are enough of these: Sunday baseball, Sunday dances, Sunday gardening, defended subconsciously by many on the basis of national service, Sunday joy riding, and general disregard of the means of Grace and the things of God. All of these are among the things that need righting in nearly every town, but they are probably not all. In nearly every town, there are families that suffer hunger while others feast. It may be that their poverty is the result of their improvidence; it may be the result of illness, or of the loss of the bread-winner through some other cause. But if society were properly organized there would be no hunger while food was ample. In nearly every town some employer is grinding out the life of those who look to him for wages, fattening his pocketbook on their blood. The time is coming when his kind will no longer be tolerated among men. Perhaps in your town the liquor law is not enforced, and boys in the uniform of Uncle Sam and other boys as well are able to get the poison that unfits them for worthy work and brings them into disgrace and disrepute. Perhaps a little game is able to exist here and there under the protection of your authorities. Perhaps your town government is corrupt and the people's money is spent to enrich those who have not earned it. Perhaps the Saviour is not followed faithfully in your town by those who bear his name. Perhaps the church is in disfavor because those prominent in its councils are guilty of some of the things mentioned in this long list. These are wrongs that must be righted in the name of the Saviour of men, whose heart is crucified afresh by our failures and the failure of our Christian civilization to properly represent Him before mankind.

Doing His Will

Christian Endeavor Topic. John 15:8-14. "Ye are my friends if ye do whatsoever I command you."

HOW often we have sung "I'll go where you want me to go," and then the Spirit has told us to speak to someone across the aisle or perhaps in the seat next to us, about His love, and we have gone back and hesitated and let the opportunity pass? How often we sing "Must Jesus bear His cross alone?" and then act an affirmative answer to our question. How true it is that His yoke is easy and His burden light upon us, because we bear neither. Then we wonder why we cannot tell in meeting of the presence of His Spirit in our hearts, as some do who we have looked upon as no better than ourselves.

It is not always easy to know what is God's will for us. We may be sure, however, that it is His will that we should do good at every opportunity; that we should help wherever help is needed; that we should be ready at all times to act the part of a soldier of Christ, whatever the crisis. It may be His will to lead us in little deeds of helpfulness on through a course in Christian service to His ministry, to the public bearing of His message at home or in foreign lands. It may be that His will for us is merely that we should live His love in our own little town, building a Christian home, teaching our Sunday-school class, leading the Young People's meeting, ready at all times to testify or to pray or to serve Him in any way that offers. We can only do His will as we know it, and we can only know His will by keeping near to Him through prayer, through the study of His word, and through the maintenance in our hearts of the attitude of little Samuel who answered:—"Speak Lord for thy servant heareth."

THE installation of Rev. Dr. William H. Matthews as pastor of Greenwich Presbyterian Church in West Thirteenth Street, New York, took place Wednesday evening, March 20. Dr. Matthews was called to his present charge after a pastorate of eleven years at Grand Forks, North Dakota. He received the degrees of A.B., LL.B. and A.M. from Lake Forest University and later graduated from McCormick Theological Seminary, Chicago, Ill. Dr. Matthews is peculiarly well fitted for the work in Greenwich Church, which is one of the most active of the downtown churches in New York.

Whatever the Drive

Chain or worm, internal gear or double-reduction, the working parts of the truck rear axle that transmit power to the wheels, carry the truck's weight and take the constant buffeting of rocks and ruts are all mounted on bearings.

Each set of gears must be supported and held in mesh by bearings.

Live axle shaft or dead axle beam, the entire unit, and the tons of truck and freight above, rest on the bearings in the hubs of the wheels.

These bearings can not be allowed to wear loose without endangering the efficiency of any form of rear axle. And if the rear axle goes wrong, the truck is out of business until the damage is made good.

Is it not then poor economy to have any less positive assurance than bearings that measure up to every test?

The test of actual use by the builders of the most substantial, worthwhile trucks.

The test of years of use—clear back to the very beginning of the industry.

The test of ability to stand up both to downward (or "radial") load, and of side-pressure, (or "end-thrust") at one and the same time, without the need of any extra "end-thrust bearings."

The test of take-up for wear—so that after years of service and thousands of miles, the bearing can still be brought back to its original newness by a part turn of a nut.

The test of engineering experience, based not on a few but on thousands of varying applications.

The test of manufacture in a plant completely equipped to handle every step in the production of bearings from the making of the steel to the final inspection.

Timken Bearings alone have a record that covers all these requirements.

You will find proof definitely set down in two books—"How Can I Tell," which covers matters of design and manufacture, and "The Companies Timken Keeps," which lists all makes of passenger cars, trucks and tractors using Timken Bearings, and tells exactly where in each car the bearings are used.

Questions and Answers

SUBSCRIBER, New Jersey: you must not allow yourself to think that God has cursed you. He does not do that to those who, like you, are sincerely trying to believe and to live up to their belief. Do not let the evil one or any other agency put into your mind the thought that you have lost God's Spirit. One never does that who wants the Spirit to remain. It is only after man has turned the Holy Spirit out repeatedly and becomes indifferent, that a period of apostasy may come. God's mercy is so unfailing that all one has to do is to repent and to desire to come back, and he is welcomed with all the warmth and love that a good Father and Friend is capable of. Go to him and all will be well with you. "Come unto me, all ye that labor," says the Lord, and those that are heavy laden he wants to refresh. Go to him according to his invitation, and forget your morbid thoughts.

O. R. W., Beaverdam, Ohio. In I Thess. 5:3, the writer is exhorting his hearers to sobriety and watchfulness against the suddenness of the Lord's coming, and compares it to the stealthy coming of "a thief in the night." He also refers to those unbelieving and unthinking men who shall say "peace" and "safety," persuading themselves that there is no cause for apprehension. To such destruction comes suddenly and with terrible effect, and from that fate the apostle would save his hearers.

W. S. K., Woodhaven, N. Y. In I Tim. 5:24, the apostle gives instruction in regard to the disciplining of sinners and cautions against too hasty and severe judgment. He then warns Timothy against two kinds of sins—the flagrant and notorious, so conspicuous even before trial that they scarcely need witnesses, and against those which do not appear at first but creep on and dog the sinner's steps and at last overtake him. There are many thousands of cases around us where men and women bear on their bodies the results of their own sins, or the sins of their fathers.

J. M. 1. The state religion of Germany is a conglomeration of the Reformed and the Lutheran religions, sometimes called Evangelische or Unierte, the latter meaning "joined." This religion was instituted by Frederick William III, in 1817, and compelling Lutherans to accept it caused much dissatisfaction and bloodshed and, later, a large exodus from Germany. 2. Whether the Kaiser is regenerated or no is God's affair—not ours. Just now we are concerned in taking his power from him. 3. There can be no valid objection to Sunday school contests, rightly conducted. There is only good to be expected from a desire to excel in well-doing. 4. We can see no harm in conducting a church social. Anything that adds to the closer union of a church body is only beneficial.

A. M. K., Allentown, Pa. When and how the prophecies will be fulfilled cannot be determined by human knowledge. But amid all the confusion and commotion, the Christian is assured that, though all pass away, Jesus' word shall not pass away, hence his glorious promises remain in full force and effect as a safeguard and anchor to all believers.

Mrs. J. L., Corinna, Maine. Easter is a moving festival because its date depends on the date of the full moon, which, as you know, is changing. Easter is the Sunday after the third full moon in the year.

A. E. S., Fall River, Mass., and others. To secure employment in a government shipyard you should write to your state director, whose address can no doubt be obtained at your post office.

Miss S. W., Hopedale, Ohio, and others. The nurses' training classes in the different hospitals have different entrance requirements. As a rule, the nurses are paid a small amount after their three months' probationary period. This, however, would depend upon the hospital in which you are trained. You might be interested in some of the colleges or summer schools. Most of the large universities and summer schools employ nurses. You might communicate with Columbia University, New York City, and University of Tennessee, Nashville, Tenn., upon the subject.

L. J. M., Springfield, Mass., and others. 1. Government positions are, as a rule, secured through Civil Service examinations. Write to the secretary of the civil service district in which you reside, whose address can no doubt be furnished by your postmaster. Most government positions pay a salary of at least $1,000 a year. Clerical and stenographic help is very much in demand at present. 2. The government does not give out work to be done at home.

Mrs. W. J. S., Cleburne, Texas, and others. The War Risk Insurance Bureau is not sending out policies, but is giving a government receipt, which is sent to the soldier or sailor, or at his request mailed to his home. For further information write to the Division of Military and Naval Insurance, Treasury Department, Washington, D. C.

L. E., Baldwin Place, N. Y., writes: "In the last Christian Herald I notice a short article on 'Preventable Fires.' One chief cause of very destructive fires through this part of the country is not mentioned: it is the non-enforcement of the law for the covering of engines, so as to prevent their throwing live coals among the dried leaves, often spreading widely, fanned by the furious November and March winds, until much valuable timber is ruined, and orchards also; and the whole neighborhood has to turn out to fight the flames which threaten homes and barns." Is it impossible to enforce this law?"

The Christian Herald has always had a warm feeling of respect and affection for genial, good-hearted Bishop Darlington. We have heard him speaking to the men of the Bowery Mission and few messages have found a warmer welcome. Here is a little poem by the Bishop, sent to us by a friend, in which the beautiful spirit of Christian service stands out in every line:

"Patient with others, but strict with myself;
Loving to give, and refusing all pelf;
Doing the right, though it brings me no fame;
Honoring Christ, because signed with His Name;
Helping the downcast, and cheering the sad;
Living our creed till it makes the world glad;
Fond of our work, of our friends, of our land;
Walking by faith, daily led by God's hand;
This is the pathway the saints all have trod,
This is the life hid with Christ's life in God."

Inquirer, Oakland, Calif. We cannot undertake to answer anonymous letters in the Mail-Bag.

D. M., Anderson, Ind., and Mrs. I. A. R., Warren, Pa., write asking the Christian Herald to urge the necessity of certain days for fasting and prayer in view of the war, and for the world's evangelization. Many similar suggestions have been received and have been laid before our readers and especially submitted to the Prayer League.

LIL EMPTY CLOSET

By Margaret E. Sangster

There's a lil empty closet in a lil empty room,
Where th shadows lie like dust upon th floor;
It uster be his closet not s' very long ago—
That's why I don't go near it any more.
Every lil hook is empty, ceptin' one, an' from it hangs (Th whitest lil ghost that ever grew
In a heart that's near ter breakin' with its agony o' grief!)
An empty flannel nightie piped with blue.

Jus'a lil flannel nightie that was shrunken in th wash,
In spots th blue has ran inter th white;
But I've seen him in it, sleepy, when I tucked th covers in,
An' kissed him, soft, an' took away th light.
Jus'a lil flannel nightie, hangin' empty on a hook,
As if it was ashamed—or in disgrace—
Jus'a lil flannel nightie an' it aint no use no more,
But I couldn't bear t' take it from its place!

Jus'a lil empty closet in a lil empty room,
Where th shadows lie like dust upon th floor—
It uster be his closet, where I'd put his clothes away,
That's why I hate ter go there any more.
But I've left his lil nightie hangin' on a single hook,
I sorter had ter leave it there, I guess.
Ah, that lil empty closet in that lil empty room
Is crowded—crowded full o' loneliness!

The English Sparrow

THIS little brown pest, whose noisy conversation under the eaves, or in our down-spouts disturbs our morning's sleep, whose filthy nests clog up the channels of our drains, and whose quarrelsome nature makes it impossible for self-respecting birds to live in his neighborhood, is doomed to go.

He is destructive and serves no useful purpose. He eats seeds and small fruit, and is careful to avoid slugs, worms, plant-lice and the enemies of growing things upon which the song birds feed. Not only does he avoid eating the things that men want destroyed, but he preys upon the nests of the song birds, breaks their eggs, and drives them away. Thus he not only fails to befriend the men whose buildings he clutters with his nests, but he deprives man of his bird friends, whose sharp eyes and busy beaks alone can keep the enemies of plant life from becoming a scourge.

The Federal government has issued a pamphlet covering the whole history of the English Sparrow, his habits, his uselessness, and the ways to be rid of him. It tells how to trap the birds and how to make the sparrow pie, pie being the only place in which the sparrow is of any use to men.

Send your name and address with two cents to cover return postage to the Christian Herald Information Bureau, Mr. Frederic J. Haskin, Director, Washington, D. C. and "The Sparrow Book" will be sent you free of charge.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

AN ILLUSTRATED NEWS WEEKLY FOR THE HOME

The advance-guard of the Turkish-Egyptian expedition about to enter Jerusalem

IT was on Oct. 31, 1914, that Jerusalem awoke to the fact that it was engaged in another war. The day was Saturday, the Jewish Sabbath. It happened also to coincide with the great Mohammedan feast of Bairam. Even under ordinary circumstances, most of the shops would have been closed. But when my wife and I started out for a walk in the afternoon and passed through Damascus street and into the great bazaar, the stillness was uncanny. In the long aisle of the spice bazaar we saw only two other persons beside ourselves:

It was as if a solemn hush had fallen over the strange city. It knew what war and bloodshed meant. Its memory was saddened by millenniums of tragic experiences. Were they again to be repeated? Other capitals welcomed the World War with a roar of guns and the wild cheers of war-intoxicated mobs. Jerusalem heard the news in an awed and melancholy silence.

As we wandered through the narrow, deserted lanes a feeling of great oppression came over us. The possibilities of the future were almost suffocating. But after the first shock was over and we had become adjusted to the idea that we were at last within the war zone, things went on for a time as they had before. Our greatest annoyance was the lack of any authentic news. Rumor was rife and our papers reached us from four to six weeks after publication. We were obliged to read of the battles of Mons and the Aisne after Antwerp had fallen

When the War Came to Jerusalem

By PROFESSOR KEMPER FULLERTON

Oberlin Theological Seminary

PROFESSOR FULLERTON, who is a recognized authority on Old Testament languages and literature and related Oriental subjects, was residing in Jerusalem when the war broke out. His graphic narrative of the events that followed in rapid succession: the hardships the population endured, the proclamation of the Jihad by the Turks, the marshaling of the Moslem forces, and the wonderful scenes, possible only in the Orient, are painted with the literary skill of a master-hand. He was in exile at Luxor, whither he went for rest and recuperation, when he wrote these impressions of the memorable scenes through which he had passed.

Floor of the side chapel of the Cathedral of St. Georges broken up by the Turks in a search for concealed guns and the Germans were advancing on Calais. But we soon began to see a change for the worse in the life about us. The Turkish army was at once turned loose to live off the country and the stores of the fellaheen were already being rapidly consumed.

The government had commandeered every camel it could lay a rope on. The commonest sight we saw in the ensuing weeks was the endless train of camels literally by the thousand a day passing through Jerusalem, laden with wheat from the Hauran, ammunition and provisions of all sorts. It had been only a few short months before that we had gone into raptures over the sight of our first camel in situ (so to speak) kneeling in the courtyard of a Smyrna Khan!

Conscription had also begun its cruel work. One day we saw a poster in green-and-white in Bethany, warning that if any one attempted to avoid the conscription, he would be both sabred and shot in several different ways; a new association with the home of Mary and Martha! The Jews were soon suffering even worse than the peasantry. Before we left the city, seven thousand of them were being fed daily in the soup kitchens. One day we visited the Evelina Rothschild School for orphan Jewish children. They were able to give the little tots even then but one meal a day. Poor little things! When we saw them they were practising their songs for the Hanukha festival which commemorates the great deliverance from the persecutions of Antiochus Epiphanes. It must have been hard to sing these songs of redemption in the present distress, but Judaism has perhaps grown used to this bitter anomaly in the aching centuries of its oppression from Pharaoh to Abdul Hamid.

The great ecclesiastical orders also began to realize the meaning of the changed situation. Beautiful St. Anne's Church, the property of the White Fathers, was seized and transformed into a barracks. Then the convent of the Frères des Ecoles Chrétiennes, the Russian Hospice, etc., were seized. The Carmelite nuns were driven in from their veiled seclusion on the Mount of Olives. I chanced to be at the Dominican convent of St. Stephens when the Dominican Fathers were making their preparations against the time of their exile. To a lover of books and learning it was a truly pathetic sight to see Père La Grange, the famous editor of the Revue Biblique, assisted by his colleagues, moving calmly about from room to room, storing away as best they could their books and archeological treasures. The first descent upon the Anglican Cathedral of St. George was more amusing than disastrous. One morning we were told that the Cathedral had been seized and exposed to vandalism. A young boy, an assistant about the place, had informed the police that two cannon had been secreted beneath an altar of the church. The police decided after a hasty inspection that the most likely place for the burial of the artillery was at the base of an altar in one of the side chapels. They proceeded to dig a great pit through the stone flooring in search of the guilty guns. But the boy had confounded Krupp products with the products of the sacred chrism. He had failed to note the significance of the double n. He had been told that two ecclesiastical canons had been made at the altar and he concluded that two pieces of artillery had been hidden there.

AS the holidays drew near the situation grew more ominous. The camel freight was becoming congested. Huge bales of tebn and wheat were discharged into St. George's school and into St. Mary's just opposite, or heaped high at the Damascus Gate, while the camels were tethered in great herds in the neighboring olive groves, or stabled in the Cotton Grotto. They suffered terribly in the wet and the cold. A camel is never a cheerful looking beast, but an aged, wet camel (and they all seemed aged and wet) is the dreariest and mouldiest of all God's creatures. A wet cat looks like a merry sun-beam in comparison. Hundreds of these pessimists would kneel together in the mud and growl and gurgle by the hour over the times which were so woefully out of joint.

A big military camp was established just beyond the Hill of Evil Counsel, overlooking the Valley of Rephaim on the Bethlehem Road. To the north of the city just across the Valley of Jehoshaphat, near our temporary home, we watched the Red Crescent brigade march to their daily maneuvers on the slopes of Scopus. There also they were practising trench-digging. It was at this point that the English made a dashing bayonet charge when Jerusalem fell. Then word came that the army corps of thirty thousand men which had been stationed at Damascus was on its way to Jerusalem under Djemal Pascha. The Holy Flag from Medina was also to be brought to the city, to prove that the Jihad was now beginning in earnest. It must be confessed that, while we looked forward to these various arrivals with the keenest interest, our curiosity was tempered by considerable anxiety.

On Friday, Dec. 18th, the troops were scheduled to arrive. It was fortunately a brilliant day and Jerusalem went up to the housetops. As we walked to the Damascus Gate and about the city, the words of the ancient prophet came back to me: "What aileth thee now, that thou art wholly gone up to the house-tops?" Three triumphal arches had been erected, one at the little mosque just north of the Tombs of the Kings, one at the Damascus Gate and one at the Jaffa Gate. The last-mentioned was set up by the Jews, who were doing their best (and one cannot blame them) to placate their Turkish masters. Their arch bore two shields with which the Virgin, Daughter of Zion, had decked herself once more belied her real feelings. All these banners and displays of bunting were only compulsory patriotism. Every one had been ordered to decorate or be fined. But a military show will always draw a crowd, no matter what the misery below the surface may be, and so it came to pass that from the Damascus Gate to the Tombs of the Kings, the Nablous Road over which the troops were to enter the city was filled with people. Strangely enough, considering the Oriental character of the crowd, the dominant color appeared at first sight to be black. This was due to the throngs of Mohammedan women who sat perched upon the walls and roofs, on either side of the road, like crows, though apart from their color and their situation, the spiritual suggestion of their attitude and behavior was more of crows than of crows. There was a placid immobility about them as they sat all day long in the sun, munching dried melon or squash seeds that was essentially bovine. But the Nablous Road itself, except for its crépe-like border, was full of color.

WHO can describe an Oriental multitude making holiday! I have often passed through the bazaars of Jerusalem thinking I would note down the things I saw after I returned home. It was impossible. The medley of sights and sounds is too confusing. It defies analysis. It is Joseph's coat of many colors which the Biblical writer wisely abstained from describing in detail. On this day when the new Messiah, Djemal Pascha, and his forerunner, General Kress von Kressenstein, were to enter the city, the variety of man and beast that passed by our particular section of wall almost paralyzed one's powers of observation. There were the school-children who had been instructed to turn out and do honor to "The Coming One." There was the school of Sheikh Mohammed, accompanied by a brass band, carrying toy swords in one hand and bunches of bright red pepper berries in the other and singing the chant of the Holy War: "God is God and Mohammed is his Prophet." There were two bands of Jewish school-children, one of them Yemenite Jews dressed in drab. They formed on either side the road just in front of us, and sang antiphonal hosannas so lustily that the police had to quiet them. There were close-shaved Armenian school-children protected by the Armenian cavass and, farther along, the school of the German Probst sat chattering on the wall. Dignitaries of church and state passed and repassed before us in carriages and on foot, the various consuls attended by their gold-braided cavasses, relics of the days before the capitulations were annulled (our own Consul had the self-control not to appear), the military commander of the city, an Arab from Aleppo, if I remember, on a magnificent horse, the representative of the Greek Patriarch in a carriage trimmed in green, Greek priests, orthodox Greek and Greek Catholic, with high, brimless, "stove-pipe" hats, always suggesting a fine draught on a hot day, Armenian archimandrites in their graceful black hoods, Coptic and Abyssinian ecclesiastics, the latter in a chariot so tumble-down that it hardly seemed capable of carrying them ten yards farther, but nevertheless accompanied by their cavass to lend them pomp and circumstance.

There were Yemenite Rabbis with long elf-locks, dressed in the white kumbar with black stripes, red shawls over their shoulders and crowned with black and red tarbushes, rich Bokhara Jews, robed in parti-colored calico quilts that looked like the loudest of mother-hub-bard wrappers, townsmen in blue and purple and orange slit skirts, always in fashion over there, fellahcen in long sheepskin coats with the woolly side turned in and the brown skin showing to the weather, peasant women from the villages with sacks of tebn on their gracefully poised heads, stepping forward with a lithe and sinewy swing and their kirtles drawn up to their knees for the sake of the freer Hebrew legends. One read "Long live the Ottoman army." The other was the strangest device, the most utterly incongruous, that even the aptitude of the Oriental mind for illogical associations could achieve. It read: "Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord; we bless you out of the house of the Lord."

A strange candidate, this Djemal Pascha, for Messianic honors from a country crushed to a sodden hopelessness and without strength even to writhe under the iron yoke of war. But the gay colors with

Jerusalem, as of old, viewed the procession from the house-tops

The Business of Building the Navy

One Hundred and Fifty Thousand Dollars an Hour and How It Is Spent—By FRANK G. CARPENTER

Copyright, 1918, by Frank G. Carpenter

WHEN the war began most of the branches of Uncle Sam's big machine were so tied up with red tape that the wheels could move only so fast and no faster. The wheels of the Navy began to buzz as soon as the power was turned on, and they whizzed on like a dynamo as more power was demanded. According to the report of the subcommittee on commerce of the House of Representatives, which has been investigating the subject, the American Navy stands without parallel in efficiency, and its system, organized in the time of peace, is working equally well in these times of war. This report states that the 300,000 men and 1,100 ships now in the service are as promptly and as well provided for as were the 55,000 men and the 300 ships which we had before the war began. It says that the Navy is adequately clothed, fed and equipped, and that the vast appropriations made are being economically and wisely spent. It tells Congress that all is well with the fleet and that the 1918 destroyers will be built in from one-third to one-half the time prescribed by pre-war conditions.

Indeed I doubt if a more complimentary report concerning a Government department has ever been made by any congressional investigating committee, and on the heels of it the committee on naval affairs asks for an appropriation for the Navy of $1,325,000,000 to be spent during the next fiscal year. Of this about $80,000,000 is for ammunition and $188,000,000 for aviation alone. Thirteen hundred and twenty-five million dollars to be spent in twelve months! That gives you some idea of the enormous growth of our naval establishment. The gourd which sprang up in a night, by the walls of old Nineveh, so that Jonah was able to sit in its shadow, or the beanstalk upon which Jack climbed into the heavens to kill the great giant, was as nothing to the expansion of our great fighting machine of the seas.

It is now more than a year since war was declared, and the civil establishment of the Navy has increased more than 500 per cent., while the money spent is considerably more than 1,000 per cent. Thirteen hundred and twenty-five million dollars! That means more than $100,000,000 a month. It means more than $3,600,000 a day or more than $150,000 an hour, day and night, all the year through.

I have before me figures showing the cost of the Navy since George Washington was President down to the time we entered the war. The first records are for 1794. The total amount spent on the Navy during that year was less than one-half as much as we now spend in one hour. In the war of 1812 we became famous as having the most daring sea fighters on earth.

During that war our yearly expenses were never as much as they will be in any three days of 1918. During the Civil War the expenditures of the Navy began at a little more than $11,000,000 per annum, and at its close the yearly cost was not much more than we are now spending each month. Our total appropriation for the Navy during the whole war with Spain was less than $169,000,000, and that sum covered three years. We shall spend more within the next five or six weeks.

AND then the size of the Navy and the change in the shipping. The vessels of the war of the Revolution were not much bigger than our harbor tugs now and their cannon were popguns in comparison with the fourteen-inch monsters of the present-day dread-naught. The largest ships we had in our war with Tripoli and those in the war of 1812 were not half as big as the Ferris type of wooden ship we are now building, and the largest vessel of the Mexican War was of only about 3,000 tons. The beginning of the armored ship dates back to the struggle of the Monitor and the Merrimac during the Civil War, and the biggest battleship we had during the war with Spain was the Oregon, of a little more than 11,000 tons, a pigmy in comparison with the Idaho, of 32,000 tons, or some of the big battle cruisers now being built in our navy yards. The Navy of today is a big Navy in every style government plant. The rooms of the naval branch of the State, War and Navy building have been thrown together and in order to give more rapid access from one to another, the doors have been taken off their hinges, so that one can scan a long series of rooms at one glance.

The business of the Bureau of Supplies requires six times as many employees as it did ten months ago, and new buildings have had to be erected to accommodate the overflow. These new buildings of the Navy are nothing like the old-time office structures of Washington, where rooms were set apart for one, two or a half dozen clerks who plodded away as it were undisturbed, in what might almost be termed solitary confinement. They were famous places for gossiping and for the leisurely red-tape methods of transacting business.

The present rooms are all large. Some of those of Coreoran Court will cover at least half an acre and the hundreds of clerks work away side by side at long lines of desks that run parallel throughout the room. The whole room is in view of the chief and there is no chance to put your feet on the table and read the morning newspaper without attracting attention. Indeed, there is no temptation to do so, for the business is so speeded that the man who lags bids fair to be run over, and the spirit of getting things done and "doing it now" is contagious.

AS I went through the various rooms I learned something of how the purchases for the Navy are made. The articles bought include almost everything under the sun—there are 80,000 different items and they come from all parts of the world. The Navy has men who keep track of the changes and conditions of the business. It deals direct with the manufacturers, and in many cases it goes to foreign markets for certain supplies. Much of this work is done under contract, and there is a chain of cost-inspection officers which covers all the purchases of the seventeen shipyards which are building new vessels, and with the sixty yards doing repair work, as well as the manufacturing plants making the ordnance. The contracts are so worded that no decrease is made for war profits and income taxes, and on certain fixed contracts reductions amounting to millions of dollars have been made after going over the manufacturers' cost items.

THE Navy saves a good deal on doing its own business in feeding and clothing the soldiers. It has its own clothing factories, and it is through them that it has been able to keep its men supplied, notwithstanding the enormous demands of the war. The pre-war plans called for clothing for 90,000 men, but, as soon as war was declared, outfits for 200,000 were needed. The clothing factory at Charleston was then put on a double shift basis. It was increased in size and the great factory recently established at New York was strained to its utmost. Additional clothing was gotten from outside sources, and the whole was so speeded up that there has been practically no shortage whatever. Between the 1st of April and the 15th of last December about 200,000 blankets were issued and 40,000 more blankets were ready. Among the other items on hand were 890,000 pairs of cotton socks, 580,000 cotton undershirts and hundreds of thousands of woolen socks and heavy clothing of one kind or another. The Navy has been delivering its clothes right along. It had 170,000 enlisted men to outfit last year and the articles needed ran into the hundreds of sense that the word implies. When the European War began it ranked third in the order of warship tonnage among the world's navies, although it dropped far behind that before we entered the war. Since then it has been growing at telegraphic speed.

IN order to tell you how this big naval establishment is managed, and how the enormous expenditures are handled, I have spent some days in going through the various bureaus. The department is wide open and there is no trouble in finding out how business is done. The Bureau of Supplies and Accounts, which has to do with feeding and clothing the Navy, with the purchase of all its materials and the payment of all the bills, is under Rear Admiral Samuel McGowan, who had held his position several years before the war began, and had put the department on a war basis. Secretary Daniels does not believe in one system for peace and another for war, and Rear Admiral McGowan says that a peace-time Navy is like a policeman without a club. For this reason the Navy has been on a war basis ever since Secretary Daniels took charge. It has been run on the motif of John C. Calhoun when he was Secretary of War in the cabinet of President Monroe. Mr. Calhoun said that his business was "To get ready, and stay ready all the time," voicing the same spirit as that of the young officer in command of our first flotilla of destroyers sent abroad last year. Upon the arrival of the ships in England the English admiral asked this officer when his ships would be ready to start fighting the submarines. He replied, "We are ready now."

THIS spirit was in evidence as I went through room after room of the naval section in the big building of the State, War and Navy departments. Business was going on everywhere, and that without the red tape so often complained of as to other departments since our war with the Germans began. In fact the management of the Navy business is more like that of a modern manufacturing institution than the old-

A Half Million American Troops in France

SECRETARY BAKER, on May 8, authorized the statement that the number of troops in France, the exact details he did not feel at liberty to give, exceeded the number he told the Senate in January that he hoped to have there early in the year. The number he then named was 500,000 so that his statement makes it clear that America is now represented in France by more than half a million fighting men, a number probably in excess of the losses of the French and British since the first of the year. With Germany hard put to it to cover her losses, the Allied armies will steadily increase as the constantly augmented transport fleet carries America's sons to France. The Secretary stated that the men were going abroad fully equipped, and that there was no shortage of machine guns, either in France or in America. The War Department, on May 6, began an investigation into delayed deliveries of heavy Browning machine guns, of which about 3,000 were expected by June 1. The contract is held by the Colt's Arms Company. The failure is reported to have been due to disorganization by draft and labor troubles. The light Browning guns were being produced in quantities anticipated. There was reported to be some delay in production of 9.2, 8, and 6-inch howitzers. The Senate Military Affairs Committee was told on May 8 that none of these guns could be delivered in France in time to be used by our army this year. The work on the American adaptation of the French 75, or 3-inch field gun, was reported as proceeding well; the prospect was that the guns would be delivered in the expected quantity in a few months, but even on these guns much time was lost in futile attempts to improve the carriage. The question of guns took on added importance from the fact that the great increase in the army abroad raised the question as to whether or not Great Britain and France would be able to equip with artillery the great armies which America was soon to furnish.

Gen. John J. Pershing, on May 8, issued the following order to all units of the American Expeditionary Forces in France:

"TO ALL COMMANDING OFFICERS: I wish every officer and soldier in the American Expeditionary Forces would write a letter home on Mothers' Day. This is a little thing for each one to do, but these letters will carry back our courage and our affection to the patriotic women whose love and prayers inspire us and cheer us on to victory. PERSHING."

President Asks Nation to Make May 30 a Day of Prayer and Fasting

IN response to the request of Congress and in accordance with "the reverent habit of the people to turn to Almighty God for His guidance in the affairs of their common life," President Wilson on May 11 set thus apart Decoration Day as a day of prayer:

Now, therefore, I, Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States of America, do hereby proclaim Thursday, the 30th day of May, a day already freighted with sacred and stimulating memories, a day of public humiliation, prayer and fasting, and do exhort my fellow-citizens of all faiths and creeds to assemble on that day in their several places of worship and there, as well as in their homes, to pray Almighty God that he may forgive our sins and shortcomings as a people and purify our hearts to see and love the truth, to accept and defend all things that are just and right, and to purpose only those righteous acts and judgments which are in conformity with his will.

Beseeking Him that He will give victory to our armies as they fight for freedom, wisdom to those who take counsel on our behalf in these days of dark struggle and perplexity, and steadfastness to our people to make sacrifice to the utmost in support of what is just and true, bringing us at last the peace in which men's hearts can be at rest, because it is founded upon mercy, justice and good will.

A Week in the World's News

BOMBS FROM BEHIND. The course of Parliamentary government seldom runs smoothly. The Lloyd George Cabinet in England has had its troubles, and has surmounted most of them. The dispatches of May 8 indicated that Lloyd George was approaching a crisis, but that it would probably pass, with the government stronger than ever. This crisis came through publication of a letter written to the Daily Chronicle by Major General Maurice, in which he

The exposures of General Maurice in the final event proved merely a stepping-stone by which the Lloyd George government emerged from a mist of criticism into the clear light of complete vindication. Mr. Asquith in the first place disavowed any intention of hampering the government or seeking a vote of censure. The Premier, however, insisted on carrying the matter to a division, after a speech in which he showed that the facts, which General Maurice claimed to have been incorrect, had come to him through the office of the general himself, and after he showed also that General Maurice had not taken advantage of numberless opportunities to correct him, had he been wrong, during the time when both were connected with the war work. Although the charges fell flat, the press discussion and gas balloons. While the Liberty Motor was still in process of perfection, it was then being manufactured in quantities and delivered at the rate of 100 a week. Of 14,000 planes ordered abroad, 1,800 had been delivered; of 8,000 foreign engines contracted for something less than 1,500 had been delivered. Between 1,200 and 1,400 aviators were actually flying with the American forces on the western front, and there were 5,000 men physically fit and ready to enter the service.

Sergeant Frank L. Bailey, flying with a French air unit, was on May 5 decorated with the 4 palms. In decorating him, M. Du Mesnil, Air Minister, paid a hearty tribute to the efficiency of the American aviators. Captain James M. Hall, one of the most capable of America's new pilots, was on May 7 reported missing after a battle with a German flier ten miles inside the German lines.

RAILWAY MEN GET MORE PAY. The Railroad Wage Commission, of which Secretary of the Interior Franklin K. Lane was chairman, issued a report on May 8, recommending additional pay for more than 2,000,000 employees, the gross amount totaling approximately $300,000,000. The Commission made a careful examination of wage conditions, taking into consideration all increases in the last 2½ years. Employees receiving a monthly wage in December, 1915, of $46.01 to $50 will receive an increase of 43 per cent. The rate decreases as the salary increases above $50, until for those receiving $239.01 to $240 it will be 4.56 per cent.; those receiving over $240 will be increased to $250. The Commission recommended readjustment of salaries of high officials, which vary from $5,000 to $100,000 a year, and the abolishing of some and reduction of others. All increases since December 31, 1915, will be considered part of the present grant.

FOR THE LASSIES BEHIND THE LINES. The Salvation Army, 40,000 members of which are fighting in the Allied Army, members of both the Salvation Army and the Army of Liberty, began a campaign on May 5 to raise $2,000,000 for its work behind the lines, where it maintains 400 huts, rest rooms and reading-rooms, with 800 Salvation Army officers, many of whom are women, some of whom, as the war story recently developed, have shown marked heroism rather than desert their ministry.

THE GROWING HONOR ROLL. On May 8 the total of casualties in the American forces in France passed the 5,000 mark; 397 men had been killed in action, 217 by accident; 1,004 had died of diseases; 237 had been lost at sea; 138 had died of wounds, 59 from gas or other causes; 7 civilians had died, and one man was reported dead or a prisoner; 2,824 had been wounded, 49 were known to have been captured and 75 were missing. On May 13 the total for the week, for all forces under the command of General Pershing, including the Marine corps, showed: killed in action, 56; died of wounds, 31; died of disease, 41; killed by accident or other cause, 23; wounded 327; prisoners or missing, 38.

RUMANIA SIGNS PEACE TREATY. A peace treaty between Rumania and the Central Powers was signed May 6 at Bucharest. According to the treaty, the text of which was published May 8, Rumania is to demobilize all but 10 divisions, 8 reduced to peace strength, will remain in Moldavia, the other two divisions are to remain on a war footing in Besarabia until no danger exists from the operations of the Central Powers in the Ukraine. A Rumanian general staff officer is to be attached to the Teutonic supreme command in the occupied districts, which will be evacuated at times to be later agreed upon. The Rumanian occupation is not to surpass 6 divisions, the expense of maintaining them is to be met by Rumania. Rumania cedes to Bulgaria that part of the Dobrudja ceded to Rumania in 1913, and to

SHALL WE SHOOT THE TRUMPETER?

By MELVILLE DAVISSON POST

IN the old fable the trumpeter captured by the enemy prayed consideration because he bore no arm, but he was answered that he incited the soldier to battle and was therefore equally dangerous. The policy of the enemy was sound. The trumpeter was an effective belligerent. I think the German Government would consider our newspapers and periodicals as the most dangerous element of our fighting force. I think the Kaiser would rather shoot these belligerents than any other. And one can see the reason.

But for our magazines and newspapers America could not have been awakened; but for them it cannot be kept aroused to the impending peril of German world dominion.

Insidious German propaganda would lull the country to slumber but for the blare of these never ceasing trumpeters.

Beyond question it would be wisdom for the Kaiser to shoot them. But is it wisdom for our own government to shoot them? And they are effectively shot if an unwise revenue postal law drives them out of existence.

The staggering cost of paper and the unparalleled advance in labor and the price of every printing material, has removed any question of profit. This immense patriotic industry can hardly maintain itself; to now burden it with a heavy revenue tax and increased postal rates, is to decimate this arm of our fighting force. All the magazines and newspapers must stand up against the wall, not for the Kaiser's bullet, but for our own.

We must cheerfully bear the burden of this war: we must bear it to save ourselves from the murderous Hun in his amuck of frightfulness. But can we not distribute the weight of this burden so it will not entirely crush to death the little newspapers and magazines?

The spirit of every one of them is fine and noble. They are so many more trumpets blowing all over the land; calling everywhere to every man; awakening the nation, firing it, steeling it, uniting it into one common determined purpose.

Surely we can find some way to rearrange this burden so the trumpeter can live!

Write to your Senators and Congressmen in protest against this destructive and disastrous postal "zone" law!

accused the Premier and Andrew Bonar Law of having misled Parliament, in making answer to various interpolations, regarding important decisions of the Versailles War Council, the strength of the English forces in France on Jan. 1, 1918, as related to the strength in the previous year and regarding the number of British white troops in Palestine and Mesopotamia. He gave as one of his reasons for making these charges at this time the fact that a large number of the soldiers knew the statements to be incorrect, and that this knowledge was breeding such a distrust of government as could only impair the splendid morale of the troops at a time when everything possible should be done to raise it. The publication of the letter brought about a storm in the House, where it was explained that General Maurice would be called before a military court, and that a court of honor, consisting of two judges, would investigate all of the facts, actual or alleged. This latter court was, however, postponed, pending a vote by the House of Commons, on May 9, on a motion by former Premier Asquith for a parliamentary inquiry. The Lloyd George government announced that it would consider favorable action on the Asquith motion as a vote of censure.

the Chancellor's fearless meeting of the situation with uncolored facts resulted in a vote of confidence of 293 to 106, in which Mr. Asquith's motion for the special investigation was lost. It was announced that a court martial would soon consider the insubordination of General Maurice.

WILL SIFT AIRCRAFT CHARGES. Two investigations of Gutzon Borglum's charges regarding inefficiency of the Aircraft Production Board were indicated on May 6. The President sent the correspondence to the Attorney General, with instructions to make a searching investigation, while the Senate Committee on Military Affairs prepared for an extended inquiry. In a hearing before the House Military Affairs Committee, the following facts were developed: of money appropriated for production of airplanes $740,000,000 had been expended; the $433,000,000 remaining on hand was covered by contracts; of the money already expended $163,000,000 had been spent for engines, airplanes and general mechanical equipment; $42,000,000 for hangars and aviation fields in this country; $31,000,000 for aviation fields and other purposes in France, and $5,000,000 for

The Little Old Book

YOU guessed it at once, didn't you? There is only one book that is The Book, and its power was never greater nor its spread wider than today as nations gird themselves for battle and men pray as they fight. Next week old Mariuccia sends her baby Alfredo, her fourth and last son, off to war with the Little Old Book in his knapsack and her kiss on his lips.

Next week also we tell the story of the wide ministry of the Christian Herald Family to War Widows and Orphans and to Soldiers and Sailors. Maynard Owen Williams, working now to save the lives of Armenians, tells next week some more intimate details of this work, in which so many of us have put our hearts and our savings.

Dr. Gray will next week again reveal the meaning, hidden from most of us, in the writings of the prophets, as he tells how prophecy is changing the map of Europe.

Next week also a new story of the spiritual work in the camps, which is helping to keep our army the cleanest in the world.

Keep a place open on the organ for Robert Harkness's hymn, "Lead Me." The words, by John M. Morse, are peculiarly fitting to this time, and the music is splendid.

Mobilizing for Mercy

By
J. F. DOHERTY

THE Surgeon General of the Army has asked the Red Cross to supply 25,000 nurses by the first of January. Already 8,000 nurses are in the Army and Navy Nurse Corps. Over 2,000 are in France, taking care of our own wounded, or, at the request of Great Britain, serving with the British Expeditionary Forces.

Red Cross nurses have gone to Italy and Palestine. They are in Greece and at Salonica. All the world needs the Red Cross nurse. In this connection the Red Cross makes this statement:

That there may be enough nurses for the army we are mobilizing the nursing profession and urging every individual qualified nurse to make an immediate decision as to her willingness to serve with the army and navy.

Every day in the headquarters of the American Red Cross in Washington groups of trained nurses are being mobilized for military service for the cantonments at home or the war hospitals abroad. They are called like soldiers and respond like soldiers. The country is leaning upon them as heavily as on its fighters. For the United States is now fully awake to the realization that an adequate nursing force is just as essential to victory as adequate infantry or artillery or fleet.

So keen, indeed, is the realization, that every man and woman is involved. The government is calling on the general public to do its share—to make the sacrifices, fill in the gaps and promote all public and home health measures, to release the trained nurse for war duty. Those who engage private-duty nurses are urged to give the preference to those nurses awaiting orders of mobilization that the financial burden may not be made too great. Practically every training-school for nurses in the United States is expanding its accommodations to take in a greatly increased number of student nurses to help meet the unparalleled situation.

Also the Red Cross has modified its former requirements for enrolment. The age limit has been lowered to twenty-one and in special cases nurses over forty are accepted. Smaller schools for nurses have been put on the accredited list, and applicants are judged on their merits. On the average more than 1,000 nurses a month are enrolling with the Red Cross nursing service, and its enrolment, 19,000, is the largest of all nursing organizations.

What it means to be a Red Cross nurse is a question that thousands, even hundreds of thousands, are asking. The answer is that to be a Red Cross nurse is to have met the standard of enrolment, and to be subject to such calls of duty from the Red Cross as are specified in the enrolment.

The Red Cross nursing service is the reserve of the United States Army and Navy Nurse Corps, and supplies nurses as needed to the United States Public Health Service. When Red Cross nurses are called on for service with the Army and Navy Nurse Corps, they receive the pay and maintenance provided by law for these corps, and are becomes a member of the one group of women permitted to belong to the military, directly serving the colors, sharing the fortunes and some of the risks of war.

Miss Alice Fitzgerald, R. N., the Edith Cavell Memorial nurse from Massachusetts, after nineteen months of work in military hospitals in France, wrote to her sister nurses in the United States:

"The wounds which you will be called upon to handle and dress are such as you have never imagined it possible for a human being to be the victim of and whom you did not expect to pull through, who, by miracle or care, is going to recover; there is the man whose brave deed is immediately rewarded by the formal presentation of a war medal and the whole ward is glad with him and is cheered by the episode; there is the man whose wife and baby have been allowed to come to see him, and every man in the ward smiles when the baby smiles. . . .

"If you feel that you can answer the call and see it through to the best of your ability, and in spite of all the hardships, you will find it the most satisfying work that you have ever done; and you will never regret having undertaken it."

RED Cross nurses slip off quietly to their foreign service, like the soldiers. Sometimes they go singly, sometimes in groups of a hundred or more. Often the city is asleep, as our nurses, veritable battalions of life, set sail for France, their clear eyes turned toward the war, their hands steady for the task that awaits them. They will know what to do when the stretchers come in; they will know what to do when the operations follow fast upon each other, they will know what to do to ease agony and bring comfort; they will know how to give to every boy and man his fullest chance of life.

Often these units of nurses are mobilized for highly specialized nursing in different branches of surgery prepared by years of the most scrupulously exacting training. Sometimes they go in groups for contagious and psychiatric work. And they may go as mobile surgical units for duty in the casualty clearing stations, ready to follow the movements of the armies, to meet emergencies singly or together, on military call, but the majority of our nurses go for general service in base hospitals.

It is the duty of the trained nurse. She is meeting life at its great crisis when all the world is calling for her help; when all the world is crying to her to prepare for the gigantic tasks of reconstruction that will immediately follow the war—tasks of guiding public health, administering schools of nursing and hospitals and dispensaries, assisting in the social progress of all the stricken countries. Never have women stood in such an intimate relation to the work and health and progress of the whole world as the trained nurse of this day and hour.

She is the soldier of life and the symbol of the new day.

entitled to the same war risk insurance as officers and enlisted men. All nurses assigned to duty in military and naval hospitals automatically become members of the Army and Navy Nurse Corps, and after their assignment to duty are no longer under the supervision and direction of the Red Cross. These nurses wear on the collars of their uniforms the bronze letters "U. S.," indicating service under the government. Those serving directly under the Red Cross wear the Red Cross insignia.

THE Red Cross nurse has become a symbolical figure to the world. Courage is her tradition. While countless thousands of men and women can only follow the army and navy with thoughts of eagerness and yearning, by virtue of her knowledge and skill she yet live. If the man is seriously crippled or disfigured, it will be well to try not to think too much of his wife, or his children, of his parents, who are anxiously waiting for news of him 'over there.' If the wounded man is going to die, shall you be able to keep out of your mind the waiting mother or the wife to whom the postman's knock will mean the bearing of the sad news? And when these thoughts are with you most of your waking hours, and many of your sleeping ones, you begin to wonder how it will be possible to face another day of it.

"Fortunately, however, there is another side of the work which makes it possible to face each day. There is the man who is getting better and who is happy in the near prospect of getting home; there is the man

The Allies Take the Initiative

ALTHOUGH it was known that the Germans had 70 divisions ready to continue the drive, 40 of which have not as yet taken part in the big battle in Picardy and Flanders, and although artillery bombardments of the hottest intensity raged up and down the battle line from Ypres to Montdidier, keeping the British and French commanders more or less in doubt as to the enemy's intentions—and even while the stage seemed to be set for the renewal of the offensive, which was expected in Germany to bring a quick decision—the initiative during the past week remained largely with the British and French. The principal action occurred south of Albert and the Somme, where, on the night of May 5, Australian troops began a forward movement both north and south of Morlancourt. In the first attack the Allied lines were pushed forward more than a quarter of a mile along a front of nearly a mile. German counterattacks were broken up. On May 6 Canadian troops raided German positions near Neuville-Vitasse on the southern leg of the Arras salient, capturing prisoners and machine guns, while a raid attempted by the Germans near Boyelles was repulsed.

On the night of May 7, the Austrians again pushed their lines forward a quarter of a mile along a front of one-third of a mile west of Morlancourt, and further south, near Sailly-le-Sec, they pushed forward one-third of a mile along a front of nearly half a mile. These advances were held against determined counterattacks, the positions gained giving the Allies control of the heights overlooking Morlancourt and the German positions east of it. On the same day, May 7, after nearly two days of intense artillery fire, the Germans, using two divisions, launched an attack along a 5-mile front, from La Clytte to just south of Voormezele. This front was held by British and French divisions who repulsed the Germans except in the center of the attack, where the forward positions were penetrated. During the day of the 8th there was fierce fighting for these positions which after several changes of hands remained on the morning of May 9 firmly in British possession, the former lines having been completely restored except to the south of La Clytte where the French had advanced somewhat into the former German positions.

While Berlin referred to this attack as a local action, there was evidence that

When God Speaks Amid War

AT this crisis in the great struggle of the nations, when civilization seems verging on chaos, and when the minds of our most earnest and capable thinkers are searching to find the way out, it is with a feeling of satisfaction that we turn to any one who can give expression in clear and hopeful terms to the thoughts that are uppermost in the minds of all good men.

Bishop Atkins, one of the foremost figures in American Methodism, in a recent address dealing with the immediate missionary duty of the Christian Church, reviewed present world conditions in words that burn like fire. They are a challenge to the Church to gird itself for the immediate task of spreading the Gospel and arousing the conscience of the nations. It is a situation that calls for strong faith and courage.

In apostolic times the Church was confronted by a hostile heathen world to be conquered, but, as the Bishop points out, "there is a much larger world now than then, and one much more difficult to conquer." All development that has come through the ages of human progress seems now to be aligned with the enemy against the religion of Christ. "The vitalizing forces of Christianity misdirected," the Bishop admits, "have made the foes of religion vastly stronger than they could have been otherwise." Civilization with the mask thrown off shows under the surface a more terrible power than the early barbarism. We are now at the critical stage of this period of world trial. "It is true," the Bishop proceeds, "that none will dare to foretell when the end will come. . . . But all can see that, with the breaking up of the old order, a new and larger one must come. This new order will bring the largest opportunity for the recasting of civilization that has come to men. . . . Let us be attuned to hear God's voice to his Church as he speaks to us through the roar of cannon and the crash of nations."

Right here, some may ask whether in the past the Church has done its work well; but the time has passed by for longer discussion of the old era, and we must take up the new. Upon the character of the democracy of the future depends the entire issue in the largest sense. "The task of the Church, therefore, is, by its evangelical and educational processes, to transform the citizenship of the world into preparedness for meeting the issues of this new and larger life. This, of course, embraces not only the conversion of the heathen world, but also the readjustment of the so-called Christian nations on the basis of the altruistic ideals of the Gospel of Christ."

We believe that this new note of service is being heard and widely accepted by the Church. Not all will agree with the good Bishop that the Church will ever convert the world; that result can probably not be attained except through the transforming power and presence of Omnipotence, for in Scripture we are not led to expect it otherwise. Yet it is clearly the duty of the Church, and the mighty army of Christians behind it, to bend every energy toward the completion of Gospel dissemination and preaching throughout all lands. Nor will its task be finished until this is done completely.

The Blood-Red Cross

THE Cross on Calvary, the blood of sacrifice, the service to humanity which he lived and taught, these three make the Saviour of mankind. Christ dignified service. He said, "Let him who will be chief among you be the servant of all." And so in these later years, wherever the carnage of war has tinged the soil of nations with the blood of men, one organization has carried into those same fields the love of Christ and his spirit of service. Christian in its essence, it has well taken the cross as its emblem; ministering as it does to the wounds of war, the blood-red color of its cross is equally well chosen.

Brave indeed are these boys of ours, daring and reckless, caring only for that which is a soldier's choicest distinction, an honorable wound. If the wound be fatal, the boy has thought that out and risked it; if otherwise, he knows that gentle hands and tender hearts are waiting at the dressing-stations and at the hospitals to give him every possible chance for the recovery that means either another crack at the enemy—or home. He prefers the former, but if home it must be, this same gentle ministry of mercy will follow him across the sea to the very threshold where praying hearts have waited long for his return.

Although this is the major portion of the work done beneath the Red Cross, its ministrations are not alone to wounded men, although that would be enough in itself to warrant more than the amount of money which the Red Cross has asked at the hands of America. Wherever grim war's desolation has passed on and men have returned to the arts of peace, the Red Cross is helping to restore and reform homes and firesides, factories and industries. Wherever famine or cruel tyranny has caused thousands to hunger, there again the Red Cross exerts its power to relieve and reconstruct. In base hospitals, in emergency dressing-stations, in countless villages in France, in Italy, in England, in Syria, in Palestine and in Armenia, the American Red Cross is serving Christ and mankind. To carry forward this great work in its manifold avenues of service, the organization asks of the American people the sum of $100,000,000. Our people, who have just loaned the government more than forty times that sum, will not be slow in giving generously to the American Red Cross.

As this issue of the Christian Herald reaches your hand, the campaign for $100,000,000 for the Red Cross will be just getting into full swing. It begins May 20 and will end May 27. It should not take a week to put under its banner of Christian service the power which this money represents. Give, by all means, your money, your time and yourself. Knitting, rolling bandages, making sweaters, and wearing nice white gowns and caps, are all very well; but this week is the week we pay. It is not your money or your life but your money and his life—your boy's life—"Over There."

Patriotism and Thrift

ONE man in every six in the United States is now a possessor of at least one Liberty Bond. This takes no account of the innumerable purchases of War Savings Stamps, the sale of which is going on constantly and increasingly.

This is a magnificent manifestation of patriotism of which any people on earth might well be proud. It is most practical, most tangible proof of the popular spirit which supports the nation in its supreme test against autocracy unleashed and militarism gone mad.

But there is even more than patriotism to be counted as a national asset in this showing. The cultivation of thrift is of great importance. The lesson of thrift is not easily forgotten individually or nationally. As an incidental result of the war the bondbuyers of the country will have expanded from a small minority of its inhabitants to a majority of its adult population. We shall have become familiar with safe investment and have learned the language and practice of thrift.

For the first time we shall practically all of us have had a direct stake in the conduct of the Federal Government, with an incalculable effect on the progress of good and economical government in the future. Individually we may be transformed in great part from a nation of spenders and borrowers into one of savers and lenders. We shall all have had a training in some of the fundamentals of political economy.

Even if the Liberty Loans accomplished nothing more than this cultivation of thrift and public spirit among our people themselves, it would still be of incalculable service. But this is not all, for backed by these consecrated billions, our nation is to assert on the battle-fields abroad the human liberty and high manhood that are the sole hope of the sorely tried world.

Prince Lichnowsky's Disclosures

PRINCE LICHNOWSKY, who was the ambassador of Germany to Great Britain from November, 1912, until war between the two countries was declared in August, 1914, is the scion of a distinguished Germanized Polish family. During the tense period when negotiations were in progress previous to the break between the two Powers, he took the precaution to keep a diary in which he set down, with infinite care and detail, every incident in his negotiations with the British Foreign Office. This "secret memorandum" he declares he was impelled to write that he might be able to justify himself to his friends.

The first intimation of its existence came from the publication of portions of it in a Swedish journal, the Politiken of Stockholm, in March, which came about, as he declared, through "a breach of confidence." This was followed by the Berlin newspaper Vorwärts. It was shown in these publications of parts of the ambassador's diary that the German militarists alone had pressed for war; they were inexorable. Subsequently the disclosures were brought up before the Main Committee of the German Reichstag on March 16, and stirred up a storm, as they not only support all the statements of the British Foreign Office relative to its efforts to maintain the peace of Europe, but squarely place upon the Kaiser the responsibility for the war. Even Foreign Minister Von Jagow uncerservedly supports the Prince in acquitting England of the charge of causing the war. The ex-ambassador's revelation of the whole story of the deception by which the German people were led for four years to believe the oft-repeated assertions of their rulers that England started the war, and that the Kaiser was innocent and wanted peace, is one of such amazing and far-reaching interest that it should be known everywhere. The essential points of the Lichnowsky documents are given elsewhere in this issue.

Prince Lichnowsky, though now discredited in Berlin and stamped as a traitor, is by no means the only man of German birth or descent who has prized honor and truth more than imperial favor. Many good Americans who trace their ancestry to the Fatherland have not hesitated to speak from personal knowledge of facts, and to write bluntly what they know about the Kaiser's disregard of religious and moral truth. In a little booklet just issued by Professor Graebner of Concordia Seminary, St. Louis, Mo., it is related that Professor Frederick Bente in 1902 wrote in "Lehre und Wehre": "The German Emperor apparently has little regard for moral or religious truth. He employs both for the purpose of retaining and augmenting his power. Both religious and moral truth he subordinates to the summum bonum—Hohenzollernism. It is a sad business!"

Recently the Kaiser, while viewing a sanguinary battle on the Western front, is reported to have said in grief-stricken tones: "What have I not done to preserve the world from these horrors?" The correct answer is found in Prince Lichnowsky's confession.

Trying the Thing Out

LV. ASHBAUGH, publisher of the Clover Leaf Publications, announces the suspension of the American Home Weekly and the Omaha Rural Weekly with the current issues.

This action on the part of the directors of these two corporations is due to conditions which face the publishing industry, more particularly the postal law which goes into effect July 1.

Mr. Ashbaugh said in an interview with the Editor and Publisher, "The publishing business is undergoing greater hardships than any other industry in the country. The cost of white paper is 50 per cent. above normal, all other material and labor are ruinously high, and on top of that Congress has passed a postal law which will bankrupt hundreds of loyal, patriotic publishers who have done everything possible to help in the prosecution of the war. Recognizing that there is no use of continuing under these impossible conditions, the stockholders of two of our newest publications, which have a combined circulation of 400,000, have decided to risk no more of their money in these ventures and to 'scrap' the effort and investment already made. Many more publishers will follow the same course within the next two months."

The Ladies' World, a long-established New York magazine, has also ceased publication, and there are many others. The American Newspaper Directory for 1918 chronicles the death of 616 publications in this country since its issue of 1917.

These are trying times for publications, and, with their postage being increased from 50 to 900 per cent. on July 1, the worst is yet to come.

The Senate Post Office Committee has refused to consider legislation to suspend or modify the increased postage rates. The determination in Congress is to try the thing out and see how it will work.

Among many letters received by us on the matter is the following from a reader in Dakota, Illinois:

EDITOR, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD: In regard to the Zone Postal System I have written to our Senators and Congressman, and received a reply from our Congressman, Hon. John C. McKenzie. If I understand Mr. McKenzie right, the zone system is to be given a trial, which will of course hit the Christian Herald hard. Now as far as I am concerned I am ready and willing to remit the difference it will make in postage on the Christian Herald to reach me. It seems to me a man having brains enough to be on the House Ways and Means Committee should know that such a system would do harm only, without trying it out. I hope the Christian Herald will find a way out, as every reader is with you.

This killing increase of 50 to 900 per cent. in periodical postage was adopted by Congress without giving publishers a fair hearing. If Congressmen are in ignorance as to how it will work, this ignorance is voluntary. The suspension already of more than 600 publications in anticipation of the postage increase must be pretty good indication to any open mind as to how it will work.

Unless protests from the public to Senators and Congressmen are made promptly, the list of useful publications suspended will soon be rapidly increasing.

Court Unravels Baby Tangle

IN spite of the protestations of Mrs. Minnie Leoniff that she was sure she would not get her own baby, Magistrate Healy in a New York City court the other day decided that the girl babies of Mrs. Gussie Felner and Mrs. Leoniff had been exchanged in the maternity ward of a New York City Hospital on September 12, 1917, when both women were in the same ward, and ordered the women to exchange the babies they had in their possession. Mrs. Leoniff was bitterly opposed to the decision. Mrs. Felner, who had brought the suit, said that she had been perfectly sure from the beginning that Mrs. Leoniff had her baby. In the course of the proceedings, after Dr. J. J. Weiner of the hospital where they were born had been unable to determine to which mother each belonged, it looked for a time as if the babies would have to be turned over to an orphan asylum until the mothers could come to an agreement. Then Mrs. Felner offered to take both babies, saying that she would be at least sure of getting her own. Tired at last by the argument between the mothers, Judge Healy called upon the spectators in the court room to decide which baby resembled which mother, and reporters, the clerk of the court, the court interpreter and spectators were unanimous in the opinion that a mistake had been made at the hospital, and that the mothers should exchange babies. The magistrate, thinking the same, rendered that decision. With all the red tape of the hospital and all the care and wisdom of its administration, it would seem almost impossible for such a mistake to be made. Such a mixing of babies is a very serious thing; it is inexcusable and should never be repeated in that or any other hospital. In olden times two mothers went into court to determine whose baby had died and to whom the living one belonged. When the king took a sword and said he would divide the child and give a half of it to each, the real mother cried out against it and said: "Give it to the other." But the one whose child had died and who had stolen the living one, putting her dead child in its place, said, "Let the king divide the living child." And the king took the babe from the unnatural woman and gave it to the real mother. "Then the king answered and said, Give her the living child, and in no wise slay it; she is the mother thereof." (1 Kings 3 : 27.)

Soldier Wanted no Mourning

ON April 21 Lieutenant Dinsmore Ely, U. S. A., of a Wisconsin lake town, was killed in France in aviation service. A few days before his death he wrote a letter to his father, which was received after the son's death. The letter ends thus: "And I want to say in closing, if anything should happen to me, let's have no mourning in spirit or in dress. Like a liberty bond it is an investment, not a loss, when a man dies for his country. It is an honor to a family, and is that the time for weeping?"

freely offer their lives to fight and die for a righteous cause. How can our country with such heroes fail in the contest? No men of stronger fiber, manlier equipment, or cleaner character ever marched to a battle-front than those who have gone out under the Stars and Stripes. May God bless locked up in a large coop with them at night. The name given to the duck is Dorothy. Though her feet are made with paddles for the water and the ground, and not for a perch, she roosts on the perch as the chickens do. Seeing them fly to the roost for sleep, she concluded to follow their example and learned to balance herself on the perch and get her rest. But that feat is not so remarkable as that of protecting the whole coop colony from danger at night. At the first hint of any danger, Dorothy calls out in a loud voice "Quack, quack, quack," and keeps up the alarm till her master comes to the rescue. Sometimes she sees a rat, a cat, or a dog prowling around, or even the shadow of a thief, who has business elsewhere just then. Much as she loves her master, she is half suspicious of him, for Dorothy quacks at him if he comes fooling around the coop at night. Her owner says ducks are worth so much a pound in the market, but Dorothy is not for sale, as she seems almost to belong to the family. What a beautiful life of benevolence does Dorothy, this watchdog of the flock, live! Her "quack, quack, quack" should inspire in us a new zeal in guarding those with whom we associate from the physical, moral, and spiritual dangers that would harm or destroy them. The prophet thus powerfully expresses this responsibility: "But if the watchman see the sword come, and blow not the trumpet, and the people be not warned: if the sword come, and take any person from among them, . . . his blood will I require at the watchman's hand." (Ezek. 33 : 6.)

Seaweed Substituted for Oats

EXPERIMENTS with alimentary seaweed as a substitute for oats in feeding horses seem to prove its value. The tests were conducted in France under the supervision of the government veterinarians, and horses fed on the seaweed fattened as rapidly as those having regular rations of oats. The seaweed, it is said, grows in great abundance on the Brittany coast. The conservation of food energy for man and beast, these days, is the mother of many valuable inventions. Once a learned Englishman, compiling a dictionary of the English language, defined oats as "food for horses in England, for men in Scotland." To which a witty Scotchman replied, "Who ever saw such horses, or such men?" Oats are so much in demand for human food that the seaweed will make a timely substitute for the horses. There is this mention of the food for the war horses of Israel provided by the commissary: "Barley also and straw for the horses and dromedaries brought they unto the place where the officers were, every man according to his charge." (1 Kings 4 : 28.)

Earthquake in Southern California

SOUTHERN California experienced its first severe earthquake in a number of years on the afternoon of April 21. The shock began at Barstow at 3:30 o'clock. It was most severe at Hemet, San Jacinto and San Bernardino. Considerable damage was done in Pasadena, Los Angeles, Long Beach and Santa Monica. Bathers on the pier at Long Beach felt the earth shaking under them and leaped into the water. The Los Angeles City Hall rubbed shoulders across a two-inch air space with the building adjoining. Walls were cracked, windows broken, chimneys and cornices thrown into the street, and dishes shaken off the plate rails. Thousands were badly frightened, a few persons were hurt, and two deaths were reported. In the early days of southern California earthquakes were frequent, and until the era of steel structures, very few buildings were erected above two stories in height. Los Angeles and Pasadena today have their skyscrapers of steel and reinforced concrete, which may vibrate with the earth tremors but go through practically unscathed. Earthquakes are sometimes caused by the expansive force of steam caused by the internal fires of the earth coming in contact with water soaking through the bottom of the sea. Human enterprise dares the danger and builds its cities on the threatening coasts. And when the cities are thrown down, as San Francisco was, it builds them up again more beautiful and magnificent. There is this reference to an earthquake in Palestine: "The words of Amos, who was among the herdmen of Tekoa, which he saw concerning Israel in the days of Uzziah king of Judah, and in the days of Jeroboam the son of Joash king of Israel, two years before the earthquake." (Amos. 1 : 1.)

I would rather leave my family rich in pleasant memories of my life than numbed in sorrow at my death." Dr. Ely sent his son's letter to his wife, who was at the family cottage in Donaldson, Wis. There the family held a funeral service for the soldier the following Sunday, placing his effects in his canoe, covering all with the national colors, and sinking it in a quiet nook of the lake which was the favorite retreat of young Ely. One of the compensations of this awful war is just such heroism as the lieutenant expressed and sealed with his blood. A nation is rich indeed that raises such sons. Not our farms, nor mines, nor mills, nor banks, nor cars, nor ships, make our nation rich; it is the priceless loyalty of our young men like young Ely, who so them and give them victory, and receive to himself those who must fall and make us worthy of them and our country worthy of their sacrifice. Pericles in his celebrated oration over the Athenian youths who had died for their country said that the gods would certainly grant a blessed immortality to such as give their lives for their nation. Christ Himself said: "He that findeth his life shall lose it: and he that loseth his life for my sake shall find it." (Matt. 10 : 39.)

The Banquet of Redeeming Love

AN EVANGELISTIC SERMON BY REV. PAUL RADER*

TEXT—Song of Sol. 2:4. "He brought me to the banquet house, and his banner over me was love."

THE best banquets I ever saw were football banquets, given by some lover of the university to the victorious team. They ate, oh, how that crowd of big huskies ate! They didn't pick over things and eat a forkful and set it aside. They cleaned up everything in sight. They sang the songs of victory. They shouted out their praise of heroes and they cheered for their university.

God would love to have men eat of the great banquet of salvation and life in his Son Jesus Christ with great appetite. It is one thing to have the banquet prepared and the doors thrown open. It is quite another thing to tempt the appetite. Long ago God said: "All things are now ready," but men are so slow in coming. Their very excuses show their lack of appetite. But when they hear the shouts and the songs of those who are at the banquet, and see their happy faces, they begin to take notice. My brother, remember the world is watching to see how you enjoy the menu discussed and preached about. They are not looking at the food. They are watching your face day by day as you eat of this banquet provided by Jesus. There are so many lean souls—joyless souls—these days. They are at the banquet, they say, but the world can find no banqueting signs about them. They do not seem well fed or delighted.

ONE of the missionaries on our platform told us of a field of labor among a very strange people, and very degraded. When they talked to them they would not listen. When they sang for them they hid in their mud huts. They tried to show them trinkets but to no profit. The missionaries found that these people did not care for anything they had. "Something must attract them," they argued, "or they'll never even hear our message." Finally one of the missionaries happened to put on a hat, a sombrero, which a friend had sent him from Texas. He walked into the mud hut village with it perched on his head. Instantly he had the eyes of the men. They followed him, they came back to his house with him and watched through the windows as he sat down and, with beaming face, praised God with his fellow missionaries that at last these men had an appetite for something. The chief wanted the hat, but the missionary held back and promised to have one brought by the next ship for him and his men. They watched him as he wrote the letter and it was a great day when two men took the letter away to the nearest mailing station. Now they would listen as he told them of other things while they anxiously awaited the coming of the hats. At last they came: one for each head man. They put them on and walked among the people with pride swelling in their hearts. When they tried to go into their mud huts, kneeling down and crawling through the low, small opening, as they had in the past, they found they could not get in with the big hats on, or if they did they would crush them and, worst of all, they would have to take off their hats. You have seen your child go to sleep with its new Christmas present, a fine doll, and you know how the child felt.

Now came the change. It was either different huts or no hats. An hour had not gone by when a leading man had changed the size of the hole in his hut, and could go in and out without taking his hat off. The others soon followed his lead, and before the week was over they were building houses like the missionaries and listening intently to the Gospel.

Your joy, your broad-brimmed joy, in Jesus, like the missionary's hat, should be something to make this old sin-doped world wake up and to stir them to want something that would get them out of their mud-holes to accept the truth, and win them to the banquet which Jesus has provided. Get the joy bells in your heart, and broad-brimmed helmets of salvation, and walk among the people, calling them to the banquet provided for them, by telling of the things Jesus has done for you. Ask God so to feed you that you'll make others hungry. "Blessed are they that do hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they shall be filled."

GOD said, "let there be light." Who cares to eat in the dark? Think of a banquet without lights! Yet there are thousands of men trying to take the Bible and to understand it without that divine illumination of the Holy Ghost. Jesus said of the Holy Spirit what we would say of light. "When he is come, he will guide you into all truth." Here are men, critics of the Bible, who don't know the difference between God's treatment of and plan for the Jews before Christ, and those who are born again and are now part of the body of Christ. Then they wonder why they don't enjoy the banquet. Oh, the souls who are reaching in the dark for world peace when they should be partaking of pardon! "Let there be light," and you will see what God is serving in this present course or age. It takes divine light to enable us to sit and eat at a divine banquet, prepared by the Father, the Son and the Holy Ghost.

THE banquet is all prepared. God's plans have all been made. God does not have to depend on a crowd of ministers in our day to arrange a Gospel for the twentieth century. The Gospel of the first century is his Gospel to this day and hour. There is only one faith spoken of in the Bible. God never says faiths; there's no "s" on it. It is the faith once for all delivered to the saints. Abraham walked up to Mount Moriah with that same faith and came down with more of it; Isaac, too, saw the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world much more clearly after they had sacrificed the ram caught in the thicket at the side of the altar. They had the same faith we have, beloved. Jesus said: "Abraham saw my day and was glad." God doesn't hold anything in his program back from his faithful ones. He said of Abraham in Gen. 18:17-18: "Shall I hide from Abraham that thing that I do, seeing that Abraham shall surely become a great and mighty nation and all the nations of the earth shall be blessed in him?" Can you not see that in these two verses God opens up the whole banquet menu of the nations through the Jews and the final blessing when the Jewish nation is in its rightful place, and when Jesus sits as King on David's throne? Then he had told Abraham of his first coming and Abraham rejoiced in that and in his blood shed for sin. You see, the Gospel and the truth and the plan and the purpose of God in Christ Jesus do not need to be changed in our day. It is all fixed. The food is prepared, and it is man's part to come to the feast.

GOD'S Word is the menu, the bill of fare, the program. The Holy Ghost shows you the courses or dispensations. He will turn you to II Tim. 2:15; "Study to show thyself approved of God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the Word of truth." He will bring to you things new and old, to make God's plan for men and for the world and for the heavens very clear. First, he always serves you with the righteousness of Jesus. He turns you to Matt. 6:33 in God's program: "But seek ye first the Kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you."

Then he begins to tell you of great promises made by God and what will result. He turns to Jer. 33:3, and you read: "Call unto me and I will answer thee, and show thee great and mighty things which thou knowest not." You take God at his word. You call and you are not disappointed. Then he shows you a little rebuke in James 4:2: "Ye have not, because ye ask not." And you are encouraged to dare to ask for all you need. We feed on the bounty of himself, even on his very life. The Spirit turns you then to such a wealth of supply that you are hardly able to believe your own senses. There it is in II Pet. 1:2, 3, 4, and you feel ready to shout as you believe and read: "Grace and peace be multiplied unto you through the knowledge of God, and of Jesus our Lord, according as his divine power hath given unto us all things that pertain unto life and godliness, through the knowledge of him that hath called us to glory and virtue, whereby are given unto us exceeding great and precious promises: that by these ye might be partakers of the divine nature."

AT the banquet which Jesus is giving, there hangs a banner of victory. All the rejoicing is because he is victor over the world, the flesh and the devil. We partake because he has victoriously undertaken for us. Many Christians these days are asking about victory. They want to be overcomers. Yes, he conquered all our foes:

I have overcome for thee,
Thou shalt overcome through me;
Fight no more with broken sword.
Trust, oh, trust thy conquering Lord.

Oh, how few see that their struggles against the self-life are useless, and turn from it as a broken sword and live in him, and walk in the Spirit. You do not have to fail; there is victory in him. How wonderful it would be if, just now, you would give up and give over the battle to him and then trust him to undertake for you henceforth.

MRS. PEMROY fought this battle out at a little tent meeting and God showed her his ability by the way her own life had been spent. She owned a millinery store in a small town in Missouri, where she had been born and raised. Her father lost his business and she was forced to do something to make a living. She was very proud, and since she had been forced into business she had set her mark high and intended to be a great success in millinery. Mr. Henry Pemroy owned a great deal of coal land and had become very wealthy. He had told her of his love and she did love him, but her pride would not let her drop the millinery business until she had made a great success. She would say to herself that the gossips about the town would say she couldn't make a success of business and had to marry. Henry Pemroy waited around for some seven years while she struggled and wore herself down. He kept telling her that he could run a hundred millinery shops for her if she wanted them. Success was as far away at the end of the seventh year as at the first. So, on a Christmas day, while Henry pleaded, she threw herself in his arms and sobbed it out, and Henry became her husband. Henry had confided in the evangelist who was running the tent meetings. He had known him for many years. Mrs. Pemroy sat on the back seat listening as the preacher told of Jesus as our victor. She was a Christian, but victory was far from her life. To give up and let the Holy Spirit run her life was not what she wanted to do. She was having the same fight with God's blessed Holy Spirit that she had gone through with Henry. She had her plans made and she was working them with a high hand. She was the wealthy Mrs. Henry Pemroy and she wanted folks to know it. She had some great schemes to make that name famous. But God's Spirit pleaded for a full right of way and she was in the thick of the fight and the people were singing and many were going to the altar as the evangelist reached her side. They greeted each other and the evangelist said: "Are you glad you dropped the millinery business and let Henry run things, Mrs. Pemroy?"

"Yes, I am," was her answer.

"Then," said the evangelist, "you love Jesus and he wants you to throw up these proud spirit plans of yours and let him be your life." She almost ran to the altar and there she sobbed it out. And she arose, a yielded soul, ready to do of the Spirit's good pleasure. Her life became a refuge for many a storm-tossed soul and she led them to the Saviour, who was indeed her very life.

"And the greatest of these is love." Divine love; this is not just human love. This is God's great warm heart beating for us. The heart flow of him who went to Calvary is love. Perfect love, that is the victory. Perfect love casteth out all fear. All God's plan of redemption is the unfolding of his great love, and it will be His great love forever that will make glorious eternal life for us.

THE Illinois State Penitentiary is at Joliet. My good friend Dr. Brown visits the prisoners there. One case especially drew his attention, and while we were sitting waiting for meeting time the other day, he told me of it. The case was that of a young boy, who was not overly bright, and crippled or withered in his hand and foot, and his poor face anything but pleasant to look upon. He had been sent to the penitentiary for stealing chickens and shipping them away. The boy hadn't been in the prison long when the father was sent up for a precisely similar crime. The father made but one request of the judge who sentenced him and that was that he might be put in the same cell with his boy. The warden granted his request. Dr. Brown found them there in the cell together as happy as could be. The father told Mr. Brown how much he loved the boy. And Brown proceeded to tell the father that love like that was worthless when they were chums in crime—when he had to stop talking. The father was protesting.

"Oh, sir," said the old man, "wait a minute. I'm no criminal, sir. I just had to be near my boy and that's the only way I could think of getting next to him. I love him. I couldn't sleep at night without him. I couldn't think of him being locked up here all alone. So, well, I'm here. This is my boy." And he hugged that ill-shaped boy to his heart and comforted him.

The sinless Jesus came into this old penitentiary of a world and to share our cell and to take our crime upon Himself. "He brought me to the banqueting house. His banner over me was love!" Oh, let him bring you, too.

The Blast of Burning

SUNDAY, May 26. Isa. 4 : 4. "The Lord shall purge the blood of Jerusalem by the blast of burning." Here is a case of foul blood, and when the blood is foul the entire body is infected with defilement. When the stream is poisoned the deadliness touches the entire countryside. When the postman has smallpox he leaves it at every house. The blood is the courier of the body. It is the vital current, and if the blood is polluted every fiber of the flesh will share its corruption. And the blood of Jerusalem was impure. Her life was not affected by a temporary fever, or by some transient spasm of irritability or fear. She was not troubled by a slight chill which had made her lukewarm, and which had robbed her of speed and nimbleness in the paths of obedience. She was the victim of bad blood. She had become bad at heart. Her soul was poisoned. There was something rotten at the very core of her being. It was not a passing indisposition; it was a deadly possession.

How is it to be dealt with? "By the blast of burning." The figure of speech may seem confusing, but the meaning is clear. Defilement has to be met by fire. Fire is the last and greatest resource in the ministry of cleansing. When water is powerless fire is efficient. The plague in England in 1665 was burned away by the great fire of 1666. And so it is in the ministries of God. There are plagues and defilements in society which seem as though they can only be reached and removed by the fires of calamity and tragedy, and by the blasts of unutterable woe. There are fields which cannot be cleansed by means of ordinary culture, by the plow, or the spade, or the hoe, but only by the ministry of fire. And God's fire comes! The blast of burning visits cities, and countries, and races, and through much suffering they reach a cleaner, sweeter life. The severity may appear destructive, but the destruction is the instrument of a gracious culture, as it is also the gloomy pioneer of a more bountiful life. "The frost, which kills the harvest of a year, saves the harvests of a century by destroying the weevil or the locust." God's frosts are the ministries of coming harvests. God's fiery blasts are the fiery dawns of a better and larger day. Jerusalem is purged by the blast of burning. Our God is a consuming fire. J. H. J.

Love and Obedience

MONDAY, May 27. John 15 : 10. "If ye keep my commandments, ye shall abide in my love." He is a poor soldier who enlists simply in order that he may wear the uniform. We are poor Christians who call ourselves by that name and who do not strive daily to prove our right to the title by keeping Christ's commandments. The weakness of the Church has ever been the presence in it of people who wear the uniform, the badge, the sign of discipleship, but who never seriously think of discipline, of training, of service. Not so do those of soldierly spirit interpret the Christian life.

It is related that "Stonewall" Jackson, shortly after uniting with the church, was called upon by his pastor to lead in prayer, at a midweek service. He attempted to do so, but being unaccustomed to public prayer, broke down in confusion. After the service his pastor apologized for calling upon him without warning, and promised not to ask him to lead in prayer again. Professor Jackson—for he was then only a professor in a boy's military academy—was surprised at his pastor's words, and said, "I beg of you not to refrain from calling on me simply because I made such a failure tonight. If it is my duty to lead in prayer, call upon me any time. Whether I succeed or fail is not material. I want to do my duty." Thus spake the brave soldier of Jesus Christ.

It is important that we have right thoughts and right feelings. But it is far more important that we should have the right will, a daily surrendered will. Only so do we prove our love for Christ. Let us remember his words, "Ye are my friends—if ye do whatsoever I have commanded you." C. C. A.

Faith a Shield

TUESDAY, May 28. Ps. 3 : 1-3. "Lord, how are they increased that trouble me! Many are they that rise up against me. Many there be which say of my soul, There is no help for him in God. But thou, O Lord, art a shield for me; my glory, and the lifter up of mine head." Here the righteous man takes up the challenge of the ungodly. The odds seem against him; he faces a multitude of enemies, and these enemies have carefully estimated, as they think, his resources. They are convinced that he cannot hold out against them. Even God in heaven cannot help him. The righteous man has heard their defiant declaration, and then turns, not with anxious mien, not with doubt in his heart and fear in his eye, but with the utmost composure, yea, with exulting joy, to the heavenly Champion of his cause. The formidable array which he beholds and the terrifying speeches which he has heard have not for a moment shaken his confidence in the divine support which has hitherto borne him up in the strife.

His God is become greater in his esteem because of the struggle that has been forced upon him by the ungodly. They overwhelm him with the tumult of their threatening voices; he slips beneath the sheltering wings of his Protector on high and is enfolded in the peace which God alone can bestow.

Thus true faith is able to change the most unfavorable aspect of affairs into the most favorable prospects. What the believer sees and hears and experiences in his heart by means of his faith in God is far more reassuring than the sights and sounds that fill his physical eyes and ears are terrifying. His enemies have merely helped him to recognize his impregnable position. W. H. T. D.

"Seeing the Invisible"

WEDNESDAY, May 29. II Cor. 4 : 18. "While we look not at things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen: for the things which are seen are temporal; but the things which are not seen are eternal." The most vital realities of life are invisible. We can see our friends, but we can not see friendship; that is a mere idea, a sentiment. My friend dies, and I mourn him. I keep his portrait in my memory till death stills my heart. The friend has gone, but Friendship remains. Friendship is real. So is Patriotism. It is in the blood of most of us to love one land above all others, and to honor its flag accordingly. It is so that nations are built up and that progress has been made in law and life. The nation itself may perish, but the patriot's love for his nation persists, as in the case of the Jews. Do not Belgian exiles love Belgium better than ever before? Do not the Serbians love Serbia, though their loved land lies beneath the oppressor's heel? Patriotism is real. So is Duty. Here is one who applies himself to a task. It may be polishing wood or polishing verses; it may be teaching children or making clothes for them, but whatever it is it is done faithfully and well. The task may not be pleasant. It may grow monotonous. The worker may be ill paid, or unpaid, for the best work in the world is unpaid, but the task is done. This it is which makes heroes of common men.

In our search for reality, we shall easily find these three: Friendship, Patriotism and Duty. If we search a little longer we shall find Prayer. It is a fact as concrete as telegraphy or any other means of communication. It is a force as available as sunlight or radium. Prayer is not merely an exercise of the spiritual faculties. It is the cry of the hungry heart. The cry to what? To whom? Jesus tells us to whom. Jesus knew what is real. He had his feet on the solid rock, and he helps us to find our feet there. Prayer was a great reality to Jesus, because God was the supreme Reality. It was so with Paul—God was ever present in his consciousness, ever at his right hand. Out of that consciousness he wrote these words: "The things which are not seen are eternal." C. C. A.

The Ever Living Dead

THURSDAY, May 30. Prov. 10 : 7. "The memory of the just is blessed." It is said that the blood of patriots is the seed of liberty and that the soil out of which such men are made is good to be born on, good to live on, good to die for and good to be buried in.

It is blessed to know that the Blue and the Gray are now united in defense of the American Republic, standing shoulder to shoulder for the rights of mankind. Today the whole nation turns its thoughts toward the sleeping heroes and the few remaining veterans of the great conflict. Flowers will beautify burial grounds and orators will recount deeds of daring. The memories of our heroes are truly inspirations to the living. While we visit the galleries of recollection beholding the faces of those who died that we might live under the best government among men, we feel strengthened to do and dare by remembering their heroism. Forgetting to remember is the treachery of ingratitude. Every memorial service and every decorated grave should say to us, "Do this in remembrance of me."

Nineveh, Babylon and Rome forgot God and their heroes and therefore perished. In our day we should listen to the voice, "Son, Remember!" Remember to emulate the heroism, the virtues and devotion of the fallen patriots; remember to perpetuate the liberties for which they died, handing down to succeeding generations the heritage purchased by costly treasure and precious blood. Remember that the flower-strewn mounds are only upon the dust of bodies. The stars, the flowers of the sky, adorn the crowns of victors. The soldiers who won triumphs for the nation also won victory over death for themselves. We must look higher than the tomb for those who camp upon the plains of immortality. They have joined the hosts of the skies; the armies of peace, purity and everlasting friendship among the comrades of the Cross. E. W. C.

Limitless Power and Love

FRIDAY, May 31. Isa. 40 : 12. "Who hath measured the waters in the hollow of his hand, and meted out heaven with the span, and comprehended the dust of the earth in a measure, and weighed the mountains in scales, and the hills in a balance?" Have you ever read the fortieth chapter of Isaiah entire, at one sitting? If so, you will have been struck with the change of tone in the speaker that begins at verse 12. With a call of infinite compassion the chapter opens, and the first eleven verses are ringing with joy and gladness over the salvation which God has prepared for the people. Then comes, almost abruptly, the depiction of the infinite, incomparable sublimity of God, who sits enthroned above the universe in lonely grandeur and majesty, and before whom the wealth and glory of the earth is as rotting matter and its inhabitants as grasshoppers.

Sinful man, when told of the redeeming love of God, stands stupid and doubting before the mystery of divine grace. He declares that it cannot be; it is impossible that so much love should have been expended in his behalf. So Israel of old received the prophet's message of comfort in a spirit of strong doubt, and the prophet had to expostulate with them, saying: "Why sayest thou, O Jacob, and speakest, O Israel, My way is hid from the Lord, and my judgment is passed over from my God?" They were measuring God's mercy by their little standards of human sympathy.

The majestic picture, therefore, which the prophet has drawn of the limitless power and glory of God is to reinforce his message of consolation. As the power of God is immeasurably greater than the strength of man, so is his love exalted far above any human conception. This great and mighty God is the Redeemer, and he glories in the fact that all his glorious perfections have been placed in the service of his rescuing mercy. W. H. T. D.

The Source of Power

SATURDAY, June 1. Job 26 : 7. "He hangeth the earth upon nothing." So far as we can see, the planets have no support or guidance. But the natural eye cannot see gravitation, electricity or the forces of the supernatural. God's Word, however, which is quick and powerful, asserts that all power belongeth unto him. He is the preserver as well as the creator of all things. Unbelief sees no visible support in the lives of God's children. There is no personal, omnipresent Protector, but the eye of faith sees God everywhere.

In the natural world, morning and night never fail; none of the moving spheres are ever a second behind time; therefore, in the spiritual realm, we should enjoy similar confidence in the rising Sun of righteousness, in the Star of Bethlehem, in the protection of Providence.

In hours of desolation and loss, when one seems to be left alone, he finds himself under the shadow of the sheltering wings of the Almighty, and though we perceive only parts of his ways, yet we do see that he was back of the beginning and is beyond the ending of time.

The millions suffering and dying in the world war find comfort and hope looking forward to where "they shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more, where all tears are wiped away and no night comes, neither sorrow nor crying, nor pain nor death." How delightful to know that after momentary afflictions comes the eternal weight of glory. When humanity seems to be rushing to ruin without divine guidance, "I will never leave thee nor forsake thee," is a wonderful promise.

Oh, the blessedness of him who trusteth in the Lord! He is a branch of the living Vine, a tree planted beside the Tree of Life, where living waters flow. The souls that live and move seeing the Invisible, do not hang upon nothing. They are clasped in the arms of him who maketh the clouds his chariot and guideth the forces of the universe with his fingers. E. W. C.

Only a Snipe

BY ROLAND WILLIAMSON

THE leper raised not the gold from the dust:
"Better to me the poor man's crust,
Better the blessing of the poor,
Though I turn me empty from his door:
That is no true alms which the hand can hold;
He gives only the worthless gold
Who gives from a sense of duty;
But he who gives but a slender mite,
And gives to that which is out of sight,—
That thread of the all-sustaining Beauty
Which runs through all and doth all unite,—
The hand cannot clasp the whole of his alms,
The heart outstretches its eager palms;
For a God goes with it and makes it store
To the soul that was starving in darkness before."
—The Vision of Sir Launfal.

I NEVER hear or read any lines from "The Vision of Sir Launfal" but I think of McWillie and of a story he told me of a man with whom he had worked on the "Cisco" railroad. McWillie is a civil engineer, and as such saw all sorts of life. A man of his profession, you know, may spend all the day slopping around in mud and water, and associating with all sorts of "roughnecks," and that night be in full dress at some swell social function.

McWillie told me this story in the Bruly railway station while we were waiting for a down train. How he came to tell it was this way: A railroad employee came along and talked with Mac for a while about the work on a new branch road where Mac had been running some lines, and as the railroad man was leaving Mac called to him and asked what had become of Thompson. "He's down and out. Only a snipe now," was the reply. "Only a snipe? Huh!" said Mac with a disgusted accent on the "only."

I thought I was pretty well up on railroad lingo, having traveled for several years, but "snipe" was a new one on me, and, not wishing to wander further in ignorance, I asked my friend to enlighten me.

"There was a time when I didn't know what a snipe was myself," said Mac encouragingly. "I'll tell you what a snipe is." He climbed up on a baggage truck, settled himself comfortably, and went on: "During the high water of 1912, I was rushed up to our big bridge on the Atchafalaya to help save it. We had some gang up there, believe me. You know the Atchafalaya is one of the most treacherous rivers in the South. It is hard enough to keep up with its shenanigans when it's down, but in high water, when the Mississippi is sending some of her overplus through that way on a short cut to the Gulf, she's as full of tricks as a cage full of monkeys, as terrible and powerful as millions of gorillas, and more deceitful than Machiavelli himself.

"I remember I was sent up there once, when the water was tolerably high, to investigate the foundations. I sounded backward and forward around the piers, and found everything as lovely and smooth as you would in the mildest mannered river in the world. It was too good: I became suspicious. The more I thought it over, the surer I was that she had something hid from me. My train was late, so I took my lead up above the bridge and dropped it in only to find a good solid bottom just where it should be. With any other stream I should have felt ashamed of myself, but with the Atchafalaya, no. I was on to her curves, so went up just a little bit further, dropped in my lead two hundred feet, and found no bottom!

"That river was eating her way to that bridge at the rate of more than fifty feet per day; and it would not have been many days before she would have eaten the bridge and, maybe, a nice juicy trainload of passengers. You bet there was some tall pile-driving going on there the next day; and the big cypress trees out of the 'forest primeval,' impelled by a giant pile-driver, were standing on their heads in that river bottom a whole lot closer together than they had ever been before; and that sand and mud food was so filled with those seventy-foot splinters that the old lady gave up eating it. She likely turned her attention to some poor levee miles below, where, with the help of a few crayfish holes, she'd eat her way out to thousands of acres of young sugar cane.

attract almost any one. I was used to seeing lots of ugly roughnecks, though, and the thing that got me interested in him was, first, that I recalled having seen him, about six months before, do something quite unusual, and, secondly, because I noticed that he was always doing some unselfish thing. The six months ago thing was this: It was up on the Cisco branch, where I had been running some levels for a new trestle. I was there for only a part of a day. Just before I left, I saw this little fellow, named McCrea, mix in with a little affair of one of the squawks. A 'squawk' is a 'straw boss,' that is, a sort of under-boss who works just a few men. Clothed with a little brief authority, they often get awfully stuck on themselves and become tyrannous.

"This particular squawk had a big supply of muscle and profanity and seemingly no heart. One of his men was a poor, weak, little 'Cajun,' and because the little fellow just naturally didn't have the 'punch' in him to move some of the work quickly, it nettled the squawk, and it looked like he took a delight in picking on the man, and would purposely throw him in all sorts of tight places so as to burn him out. If the 'Cajun' burned out, all the squawk had to do was to holler: 'Gimme another hat!' (a 'hat' is just a man—good, bad or indifferent), and he would be given another worker. Squawk didn't speak any French, and the 'Cajun' didn't understand much English, but he did understand enough to know when Squawk vilely cursed him, and he said to Squawk, with a meaning shake of his head: 'Vous ne devez plus parler de cette manière,' or something like that, meaning, 'Don't talk that way to me any more.'

"Squawk either understood it or didn't understand, and thought the 'Cajun' was cursing him, maybe; anyway, he gave the little fellow a mean shove, and cursed him fiercely. That little 'Cajun' hopped on him like a wildcat, but Squawk was many times his match, and in a jiffy had the 'Cajun' out at arm's length pounding his face into pulp. This was the opportunity that Squawk had been looking for—to teach his men his power: but he had underrated one of them—this red-headed fellow McCrea, who, in less time than it takes to tell it, had jumped into the fight, thrown the 'Cajun' aside, and with a few steam-hammer blows and some jiu-jitsu movements had Squawk whipped to a frazzle. My train pulled out just after the fight, but I heard afterward that McCrea had been discharged for insubordination. I hadn't seen him again until I met him on that work up there on the bridge. I took an interest in the fellow, and soon discovered that he was always on the firing line, ready to do more than his share of every piece of work. If he was helping carry a piece of timber, and the man on his hand-stick looked worn-out or less strong than himself, McCrea would get up a little on the stick, and thus take some of the other fellow's load. He was all man, though, and saw to it that no one intentionally imposed upon him. I was standing near him on the works, and in the course of his remarks I heard him quote some appropriate line from Kipling's 'Gunga Din.'

"THAT night, after supper, he was out putting a patch on his mosquito bar, and I struck up a conversation with him by offering him some of my 'skeeter-skoot.' We chatted for quite a while. I asked him if he was Scotch. 'Well, yes,' he replied, 'in a way I am. My father was Scotch, Irish and English; my

McCrea had to hold on with one hand while he made the rope fast to Squawk

"But that has nothing much to do with my 'snipe' yarn. As I was saying, it was high-water time, and I had been sent to help save the bridge. The Atchafalaya was levee-top high; and it looked as if nothing short of a nice $50,000 steel bridge would appease her dainty appetite.

"It was about the middle of June, and our work-train

"lay in a sidin' through the day,
Where the 'eat would make your bloomin' eyebrows crawl.

"The whole gang, with a few exceptions, from the chief to the water-boy, was hot and more or less mad and cranky. One of these exceptions was a short, red-headed, freckled-faced, middle-aged man with large ears and kindly eyes. His ugliness would mother is part French and English. Her father was a German Jew. I'm just a plain American." I told him that I heard him quote some Kipling, and asked him how he liked him. Of course he agreed with me in thinking Kipling great. There was nothing of the pedant about the fellow. In fact, he murdered the King's English worse than Kipling's East Indians at times; but I soon learned that he had been a great reader—not by his saying so, for any one can do that, but because of his intimate acquaintance with many characters of good fiction who were dear to me. I talked books with him, and wished I had had some with me; though I believe a man caught with a book in daytime in that rush would have been shot on the spot; and at night the mosquitoes would have eaten you up about the lights, or you'd have burned up your mosquito bar in getting one of our dingy old kerosene lamps close up enough to read by.

"WHEN a costly bridge is in danger, railroad officials don't lose any time in placing their guests at the tea-party; and so it turned out that McCrea, who had so nobly assisted the Cajun, was working right along now with Squawk. McCrea was nice enough, and seemed to have forgiven everything. Not so with Squawk. He had been ragged many, many times about that beating, and was now looking for any opening for a chance to get even. Once, when McCrea jumped in and helped take off an unnecessary strain that Squawk had thrown on a negro workman, I heard Squawk say something desperately unpleasant and uncomplimentary. McCrea heard him but paid no attention to it.

"We were right in the hottest of the fight for the bridge, building braces and cribbing to break the force of the rushing water, when Squawk, who at the time was actually working, lost his balance, and fell off the bridge railing. In falling, his head struck a projecting beam that knocked him senseless. Just as he struck the water the suspender of his overalls caught on a spike; but the water sucked his body under the timbers, and he would have drowned in a few minutes, had it not been for McCrea. There was no lack of rope at hand; and McCrea grabbed the end of one, and jumped off the bridge.

"The water was only a few feet below; but the way it was snatching and sucking about those piers and pilings was awful. McCrea didn't have to do any swimming; for he had hardly struck the water when he was driven like a chip against the pilings where Squawk was caught. The hardest thing he had to do was to hold on with one hand tight enough to keep from being sucked under, while he made the rope fast to Squawk. It only took him a few seconds to do this, and we soon pulled Squawk up on the bridge. McCrea was now holding on with both hands, with his back up-stream; but before we could untie the rope off Squawk, a big timber swirled through and struck McCrea with the force of a projectile. The end of the timber was a jagged splinter that struck right through McCrea's body below the right shoulder blade. There was no danger of his sinking, stuck on like that; and we rigged up some poles and lines as fast as we could and soon had the poor fellow along with Squawk, carrying them to the camp car.

"Squawk regained consciousness in a little while, but was as weak as a cat from the cut in the head and his ducking. Poor McCrea had never entirely lost consciousness, and suffered terribly until the King Snipe gave him morphine. His wound was fatal. A man was rushed off on a motorecycle to Birma, a few miles above, to bring a doctor; and we telephoned to have number fifty-three stop at the bridge and take McCrea down to the city. On account of the high water above, the train was delayed. The morphine eased McCrea, but didn't put him asleep; and he called for me. I knew he was dying; and in the presence of that little red-headed, freckled-faced (the freckles showed plainly now, his face was so white), big-eared man, I felt confused and ashamed. He asked me if I had a Bible.

"I didn't have a Bible, and would have given a month's salary for one, or a prayer-book; and told him so. He asked me if I had anything I could read to him. I remembered that I had a small book of Lowell's poems in my coat pocket at the bridge, and hurried off to get it. When I returned McCrea had his eyes closed. I thought he was asleep, or, perhaps, dead; but he said, without opening his eyes, 'Please read The Vision of Sir Launfal.' It was mighty hard for me to make my voice behave, but I read. When I got to that place where Sir Launfal shared his crust with, and gave water to, the leper, and read what the leper, transformed, said, I knew McCrea understood. You remember how it goes:

"Lo, it is I, be not afraid!
In many climes, without avail,
Thou hast spent thy life for the Holy Grail;
Behold, it is here, this cup which thou
Didst fill at the streamlet for me but now;
This crust is my body broken for thee,
This water his blood that died on the tree;
The Holy Supper is kept indeed
In whatso we share with another's need.
Not what we give, but what we share,
For the gift without the giver is bare;
Who gives himself with his aims feeds three:
Himself, his hungering neighbor, and Me.

"Squawk, who was on a cot, just a little way off, understood too; for he came over, and thanked McCrea, and told him in a shaky voice that he was truly sorry for all he had said and done. I didn't know it was in Squawk to do such a big thing. I have heard since that he is a changed man, and is patient and fair with his gang. I sat with McCrea for about an hour—until he died. I thought a whole lot while I was sitting there—of how many of us are missing the Gate. 'Because strait is the gate, and narrow is the way, which leadeth unto life; and few there be that find it.' When I got up, there were tears in my eyes—and it seemed that I almost saw Him standing before me.

Shining and tall and fair and straight
As the pillar that stood by the Beautiful Gate,— Himself the Gate whereby men can Enter the temple of God in Man."

Our train was blowing for the station. McWillie slid down off the baggage truck, and said: "A 'snipe' is a railroad section hand; a 'king snipe' is a section boss. McCrea was only a 'snipe.'"

Ministers Help Win the War

THE American clergy has responded nobly to the appeal of Commissioner of Internal Revenue Daniel C. Roper that they aid in bringing peace and victory to the United States and its allies by impressing upon their congregations and the public their patriotic duty to pay cheerfully and promptly the income tax for the support of the war. Letters were addressed to 124,000 clergymen of every denomination. Hundreds of assurances of co-operation have been received. Among the replies was one from a retired clergyman, eighty-three years old, who, evidently mistaking the purpose of the message, enclosed a one dollar bill, "half of all I have in the world." "I wish it were $1,000," he wrote, "I would give it as cheerfully and willingly as God gives his children the sunshine and the rain."

The letter was returned by Commissioner Roper with a note expressing his appreciation of the spirit of loyalty displayed by the aged patriot.

Another letter was from a clergyman with a wife, three children and a salary of $1,500, of which $500 was invested in 1917 in Liberty Bonds. The children, aged four, seven and nine, have put their savings of $50 in War Savings Stamps, and the family has contributed to the Red Cross, Y. M. C. A. and other funds. "We are trying," he says, "to do not only our 'bit' but our utmost."

Instances of personal sacrifices in order to contribute to the government's war needs are numerous.

"Liberty Tax" is the designation given the levy by Commissioner Roper. Every dollar of it is for the defense of freedom. Last year 500,000 persons paid an income tax. This year the number will be more than 6,000,000. The income tax is payable on or before June 15, 1918.

Introducing Mrs. IDA C. BAILEY ALLEN Specialist in Home Economics Lecturer for the United States Food Administration

Mrs. Ida C. Bailey Allen, one of our highest authorities on home economics is known to hundreds of thousands of women the country over. Through her conservation lecture work and her magazine articles she has earned the title of "Teacher to the American Housewife". Mrs. Allen is practical. She explains in words any woman can understand, the principles of home economics—the secrets of good cookery—the everyday problems of the everyday housewife.

Because she believes in the importance of conservation and the value of milk as a food, Mrs. Allen has consented to present a series of articles on the use of Evaporated Milk. She will include in each article, a simple conservation recipe, worked out in her own home kitchen. They will be practical recipes, for the practical woman. Watch for them.

Mrs. Allen says: "I use Borden's Evaporated Milk because it is pure and economical. The Borden system of protection begins with the frequent physical examination, by graduate veterinarians, of the cows supplying milk to the Borden factories, and the regular inspection of sanitary conditions in the dairies. Moreover, the milk itself is handled with extreme care from the time it leaves the dairy till it reaches your pantry shelves. It is subject to the most scrupulously rigid sanitary regulations that guarantee its absolute purity. It is rich whole milk with only water removed.

"Borden's Evaporated Milk is easy to use. For cooking, simply dilute with one to two parts of water. For richer milk, reduce the quantity of water—for coffee and tea, use it as it comes from the can—undiluted.

"Try my recipe for Baked Tapioca Indian Pudding given below."

Baked Tapioca Indian Pudding

4	tablespoonfuls pearl tapioca	2	cupfuls Borden's Evaporated
6	tablespoonfuls cornmeal		Milk diluted with three cups of water,
2	cupful molasses	}	(Or use 1 cupful
1	cupful sugar
			omit sugar)
		1/2	cupful chopped candied ginger, optional
		2	teaspoonfuls salt

Cover tapioca with warm water and let it soak for an hour; scald 4 cupfuls of the milk and water; add the tapioca and cook for 15 minutes. Mix together the remaining ingredients, stir into the tapioca mixture and cook over hot water till thickened and the pudding is beginning to separate. Turn into a buttered baking dish, and bake for three hours in a slow oven. Add the extra cupful of cold milk and water at the end of two hours.

Adventures in Neighboring

A Department for the Exchange of Experiences Between All Who Have High Community Ideals and Are Putting Them into Practice
Conducted by VERA L. CONNOLLY

The time your Nerves need real help

WITH work unfinished, strength all gone and nerves pleading for help—you realize that something must be done. If you only could help your nerves the way nature would, if she had the chance. And you can. Give them a natural food- tonic such as Sanatogen.

For the experience of physicians has proven that Sanatogen supplies just what the nervous system needs, pure protein of milk combined with organic phosphorus. Being in concentrated form it not only nourishes the nerve cells, but repairs and rebuilds at the same time. One soon feels the uplifting effect of this wholesome food- tonic because it is so easily and quickly assimilated—even by the weakest system.

The keen and alert business executive, the professional man, the office worker, the student, the housewife—all find in Sanatogen that source of new strength and vitality they so sorely need in these times of stress and over-activity. Many have testified to this in writing, among them

Col. Henry Watterson
Hon. Thomas S. Martin
John Burroughs
Hall Caine
Sir Gilbert Parker
Hon. Wm. C. Adamson

Sold by Drug Stores—everywhere.
Three sizes—$1.00, $1.50, and $3.00
No advance in prices.

FREE SAMPLE OFFER

Sanatogen comes as a fine white powder which may be easily taken dissolved in water, coffee, milk, etc. Sample package sent FREE on request, together with the new "Text-Book on Sanatogen." The Bauer Chemical Co., 26F Irving Place, New York.

I WONDER, dear neighbors, in how many of your communities there stands a dreary, neglected little school: tolerated by the parents; wept over by the discouraged young teacher; and attended by a horde of rebellious boys and girls, who detest it?

Does this describe the school situation where you live?

Then, fellow members of The American Community Club, draw your chairs closer to the platform and hear today (from the Adventurers themselves) how certain plucky women in other states are awakening the right "school spirit" in their communities by bringing pupils, teachers and parents together as comrades instead of critics of one another.

But first let us open our meeting with the haunting poem written for us today (at my request) by the sweet singer of the Christian Herald. Not being a singer myself, and yet longing to express to you the love I feel for all little rural schools scattered over the land—those wee, sma' buildings standing ankle-deep in ferns and wildflowers, or topping a wind-swept hill, or crouched at the turn of a cool, shadow-dappled country road—I implored Miss Sangster to sing of this to you, and she has done so with beauty, tenderness and pathos.

With her song echoing in our hearts, let us yield our club platform to the speakers of the day, trying to work out, from their suggestions and experiences, a practical solution of the school problems of our various communities.

Entertaining the Teacher

I wonder how many parents in the rural districts make it a point to get acquainted with their children's teacher: the "he" or "she" with whom the children are entrusted, every day, the greater part of the year?

I had not given it a thought until this winter, when my own little boy started to school for the first time. Due to illness he has been out quite a little, so does not know the teacher very well. But among the other children, who do know her, there has been much bitter complaint of her. And I am sorry to say that the parents, instead of investigating and finding out for themselves, have been prone to believe all this.

I have not believed it, for the teacher has been most kind to me and mine: seeming eager to be of assistance. So I have done all I could to defend her.

A short time ago, one of my woman neighbors was in my house, calling. She began to complain of the teacher, siding with her boys. I said: "She seems very nice. Why don't you try to get acquainted with her? Perhaps you'd like her better. As soon as my boy returns to school I intend to invite her over for supper—possibly to stay all night."

She looked her surprise, but said nothing; and a couple of weeks later she with another neighbor were again in my house. The new neighbor began to attack the teacher; when, to my surprise, the first neighbor said: "I've told my children I'm going to invite the teacher over to supper some evening. They declare they won't come into the house; but they will."

I cannot tell you how happy I was, for I knew I had started a bit of good for the whole neighborhood. Now, every scholar will want teacher to go home for supper, because she "went to Bob's." And there will be a much better understanding between all of us: parents, pupils, and teacher.

Try this, dear friends, in your district. Also, visit the school, not once, but several times. Begin now, even though school is about to close. Make the teacher feel herself one of you, before she leaves for the summer. You will notice the difference next fall.

MRS. CLEON SUNDBY.

I hope other communities like Mrs. Sundby's will try out this Christian plan. But I should carry it even further. I should throw open that little schoolhouse, this summer, as a kind of recreation center for every one, young and old. The desks could be removed, and all the school paraphernalia stored in a safe place. I should interest every one in beautifying the place with donations of pictures and plants, rugs, tables, chairs, dishes.

Perhaps some one would loan their library; some one else their gramophone or piano. Others could hang curtains and repaint the woodwork. Possibly the men of the neighborhood would paint the outside.

Too much trouble for a few months? Not if it resulted in the reawakening of a whole community. Not if, in the fall, the children went back to their schoolhouse with a changed attitude toward it. And why need the plan be confined sick and crippled children. And so, in this adventure, we reached, not only the neighbors nearby, but those in a distant city.

MISS GRACE A. MANCHESTER.

Can't you imagine how, in that dreary hospital ward, tired eyes brightened, and thin little hands reached out eagerly, as those gay-colored pictures came blowing in like a fresh wind! There is a suggestion for you, neighbors, when next you happen on a group of bored listless school children.

For our fourth adventure, I have chosen this practical, constructive one, which bears so vitally on a problem almost every school district has to face:

A Boys' and Girls' Debating Club

For many years the public school in our community could not hold the boys and girls in school after they became fifteen or sixteen years of age. They would leave with only a scant knowledge of the common school branches, and in consequence were not prepared to meet the battles of life. The community had accepted the condition, feeling that nothing could be done about it.

But a young man came to this school as teacher about eight years ago, and immediately began to take hold of the problem. He first got the parents and children together, then organized a debating club. The older persons carried on this work for almost a year by themselves. But as time went on, the younger ones were induced to take part, even the most timid outgrowing their fear, and the club came to have a great influence.

The programs varied as to the material used. Sometimes they were debates, while at others they were lectures, singing, recitations, and so on. The interest in them has never flagged.

The results of this adventure have been wonderful. Many young men and women who would otherwise have quit school prematurely have received from this club enough stimulus and inspiration for them to want to graduate and take their rightful places in the world. It has seemed to change completely the ideals and outlook of many students, causing them to seek for higher and nobler things in life.

LEONARD J. PRIESTLEY.

And while on the subject of unselfish devotion to a community's educational welfare, read the following beautiful account:

Enlightening a Community

There came into our neighborhood a family consisting of father, mother and four children: the eldest a girl of about sixteen. The father was an invalid—had been for years. They were people of refinement and intelligence and were Christians. At that time our neighborhood was very unenlightened, ignorant and irreligious, ignoring education and in fact anything that flavored of culture and refinement.

This new family I speak of had to hire their work done and often our young men would go there to work. The old gentleman would interest himself to talk to them about education, about books and things going on in the world outside this little spot. At first it was hard to get them to listen. They did not believe him, and were not interested. But others came and he still persisted in trying to teach them something, until there were a few that realized the condition they were in and felt that they would like to better themselves. But now (they declared) it was too late, as they were past school age, even had they had time to attend, which many of them had not, as they had to work every day for their living.

Now, the house this family occupied consisted of but one room, like most of our houses there. Yet they offered their house as a schoolhouse, and as many as would, attended at night. The father would teach them. Well, only a few came at first, but soon others, seeing the improvement in them, came too, until the "night-school" would be crowded. The daughter had to help with the teaching.

Finally the pupils got so interested that they offered to build a room to the house, which they did. And here they continued to have their school at night, after the day's labor. For the teacher's pay, they furnished wood for fuel and worked a little patch of ground that he had. There was nothing too hard to do for him or his family. After a while, they got up a literary society and made bold to go to the little schoolhouse for their meetings. The little heaven got into the lump, and in two years the whole neighborhood was so changed for the better that it seemed like a miracle.

That was a long time ago, but there are opportunities today of doing good to any

To a Certain Schoolhouse

By Margaret E. Sangster

I WONDER if it's standing where it stood,

Beside the lane, so many years ago?

I wonder if the springtime winds that blow

Still find their echo in the little wood

That was our playground? How I wish I could Take slate in hand again, and laughing go

To learn the lessons that I would not know,

And that, today, my heart would find so good!

It all seems more than years and miles away.

(Lost dreams, folk tell us, never come again!)

And yet, in some bright, in-the-future day,

When knowledge shall be laid with doubt and pain—

I know that I, a little child, will say

My lessons in that schoolhouse by the lane!

to the summer months? The desks could be put on skids, which would allow the room to be used all winter as well, by pushing the desks back.

That such plans are practical, I know. They are being tried out daily in wide-awake communities. The following is an example of this:

A Parent-Teacher Association

Did you ever move into a locality where each family seemed sufficient unto itself? That is what happened to us. For one year, there was merely an exchange of calls between the ladies and a pleasant "How do you do?" between the men, and I used to wonder, "Will it be a deep sorrow or some great joy that will start something here?"

At last, one day, I suggested that we have six o'clock picnic dinners. (We are farmer folk and very busy all day.) The others agreed, and this was a beginning: just a starter.

Then, our school mistress asked that we organize a Parent-Teachers Association. We did so, making the picnic dinners a feature of it. We took our dinners to the district schoolhouse, and made our gathering into a full evening affair. We women discussed school matters, while the men talked better roads. We had a victrola at these evenings, but we decided we wanted more music. So we gave entertainments to raise money, and with the funds bought and installed a piano.

And now we wonder: "Is it only a year since this began?" At one of our recent meetings the school-mistress said to us: "Oh, you good people haven't the least idea what these gatherings have meant to the school. I know you personally now: the parents of my pupils; and the pupils know that the community is interested in their work."

Recently our Japanese neighbors have been meeting with us at the school, on these evenings. They are as interested as we, and are ready to help in any movement for bettering conditions.

MRS. E. G. PEARSON.

And here is an example of schoolroom neighboring planned and carried out by one loving, thoughtful woman. This act not only brought a delightful diversion to the children, but bore fruit of another sort.

Coloring Pictures at School

Most of my neighboring experiences have been with children, as I have found this the surest way to the hearts of my neighbors.

Some time ago, wishing to get acquainted with the children in our rural town, I secured the consent of the village school teacher to come to the school at noon and ask the children to color pictures.

For several weeks I met there with the children during the noon hour, and we colored quantities of pictures. The parents became interested and searched their homes for pictures, which the children brought to me. After a while we met at my home and pasted the pictures on cardboard. We sent them to a hospital, where they were enjoyed greatly by

It is strong, enduring, almost waterproof. It sticks to anything that's dry, and stays stuck. It is instantly attached without wetting.

It is the same adhesive plaster that surgeons use.

But it also has a thousand household uses. And these pictures suggest some.

Think of a strong, rubber-coated adhesive tape. One side sticks to anything, and clings like glue. The other side is fabric.

Think how many services that tape could render, almost every day.

In simply patching lawn hose it may save a hundred times its cost.

When you try it once—on anything—you will never be without it.

One should never go anywhere without having a spool along.

B&B Adhesive Plaster Tape is particularly adapted to these multiple uses. It is ever-ready, strong, enduring. And it has a perfect rubber base.

It sticks when you apply it. And it stays.

If this happened to you would your brakes hold?

Failure even once may cause disaster

THE most watchful driving is of no avail unless your brakes obey instantly. When you apply your brakes do they respond smoothly, quickly and surely? In city traffic, on hills, or in emergencies your safety and peace of mind depend on the efficiency of your brakes. Ninety-nine successful operations count for nothing if they fail the hundredth time.

It is easy to know always the condition of your brakes. Simply ask your garage man to inspect them regularly.

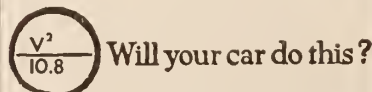

If they need relining have him put on Thermoid Brake Lining. It will give certain safety for the longest time for three reasons.

1. More material, greater service. There is over 40% more material and 60% more labor used in the manufacture of Thermoid Brake Lining than in any woven brake lining.
2. Grapnalized—an exclusive process which creates resistance to moisture, oil and gasoline.
3. Hydraulic compressed, uniform throughout. Every square inch of Thermoid is hydraulic compressed at a pressure of 2,000 pounds.

Have your dealer inspect your brakes today. He will show you Thermoid Brake Lining that you may see why it is so different, so efficient and long wearing. If he hasn't Thermoid we will gladly send you a sample.

Brake Inspection Movement

Prominent officials, leading clubs and organizations and motorists everywhere have endorsed this big national movement to reduce automobile accidents, by having all brakes inspected before the touring season begins, and regularly thereafter. Give it your support.

Automobile engineers have proved that when brake mechanism is right and road conditions average, any car should stop at distances and speeds given by the chart.

V² means the square of the velocity or speed of your car; 10.8 is the proved factor of retardation under average road conditions. This factor decreases on smooth, slippery roads to 6.7 and increases as high as 17.4 on rough, worn roads. The chart represents the average condition and other conditions can readily be figured by changing the factor within the given limits.

Remember that your brake mechanism is not "right" unless its brake lining has the ideal coefficient of friction. The better the brake lining the quicker your stop.

selfish, run-down, bigoted neighborhood, if we only seek them out and try.

SARAH O. RAMSAY.

This brings us, fellow adventurers, to our Forum, which we cannot afford to miss this week. Our meeting today has been a thoughtful one, but not without its sunny, cheery note. It has been, I hope, satisfying with an earnest message to carry through the fortnight which shall elapse before we meet again.

The Neighbors' Forum

Our little rural club of women had a real adventure in neighboring not long ago, when we took our lunch and visited the school. At the close, each pupil was served with a sandwich, a slice of cake, and a glass of lemonade. Then they were dismissed, and we spent a pleasant hour over our lunch, getting acquainted with the new teacher.

MRS. H. W. S.

DEAR CHRISTIAN HERALD NEIGHBORS: In paring apples, potatoes or onions (any vegetable or fruit that stains the hand when you use the indispensable small, steel-blade kitchen knife), a "cot" made of cloth, to slip over the three fingers, with the thumb piece made separately and set in, will protect the fingers from the stain that is so hard to remove. I always make the piece long enough to extend over the top of the hand to the wrist, sewing on a narrow band to button over.

MRS. N. H. W.

There is no doubt but that a local community club, a branch of our big American Community Club, will be started in this neighborhood. I wish you would send me a plan of organization and programs.

N. CAROLINA.

I am a shut-in, living with my mother. I should be glad to be put in touch with some lonely Christian Herald neighbor who would enjoy writing letters. Life is very painful and monotonous for me.

MISS E. STONE.

One adventure you published took me back fifty years: when we went to Minnesota and took homesteads. It was just after the quieting of the Indians. There were only thirteen families in the county and they lived far apart. But we had school in our house in winter, while the first district school was taught in an old log blacksmith shop. We had Sunday school in a grove in summer and our houses in winter. In the course of two years the men had put up a small church, 16 by 16; so after that we had Presbyterian and Methodist preaching.

MRS. C. C. LESTER.

Germany Accused by Her Own Diplomat

ONE of the most notable documents of the war is that of the former German diplomat, Prince Lichnowsky, placing the responsibility for the war upon Germany.

The Germanic governments, in order to justify themselves to their peoples, have maintained the pretense that the war on their part was a defensive one and that England was the arch-conspirator. This pretense is now completely exposed by Prince Lichnowsky, who was the ambassador of Germany to Great Britain from November, 1912, until war between the two countries was declared in August, 1914.

Prince Lichnowsky's document supports all the statements of the British Foreign Office as to its efforts to maintain the peace of Europe and to bring about a fair and permanent adjustment of all matters which might be the cause of misunderstandings and controversy.

In 1916 Prince Lichnowsky, who is of a distinguished Germanized Polish family, prepared a memorandum review entitled "My London Mission, 1912-1914," in which he gave a detailed account of his negotiations with the British Foreign Office and of his relations with his home government during these important years, which covered the period from practically the beginning of the first Balkan War to the outbreak of the Great War. He did not intend that this paper should be made public at the present time, but seems to have been impelled to write it for the family archives in order that the truth of his own relations to the war and the political history preceding might be known at least to those close to him, and perhaps eventually to the public. By some means the Swedish Socialist journal, Politiken, secured the document and published it.

LICHNOWSKY says that shortly after his arrival in London, in 1912, "Sir Edward Grey proposed an informal exchange of views, in order to prevent a European war developing out of the Balkan War," and that the British Minister by no means placed himself on the side of the Entente Powers, and during the negotiations, which lasted about eight months, he lent his good-will and powerful influence toward the establishment of an understanding. Instead of adopting the English point of view we accepted that dictated to us by Vienna. Count Mensdorff led the Triple Alliance in London and I was his second.

On every point, including Albania, the Serbian harbors in the Adriatic, Scutari, and in the definition of the Albanian frontiers, we were on the side of Austria and Italy, while Sir Edward Grey hardly ever took the French or Russian point of view. On the contrary he nearly always took our part in order to give no pretext for war—which was afterward brought about by a dead Archduke. It was with his help that King Nicholas was induced to leave Scutari. Otherwise there would have been war over this matter, as wo should never have dared to ask "our allies" to make concessions.

Sir Edward Grey conducted the negotiations with care, calm, and tact. When a question threatened to become involved he proposed a formula which met the case and always secured consent, he acquired the full confidence of all representatives.

HE tells of the conciliatory attitude of the British Government in reaching an agreement as to territorial lines in Africa, and as to the Bagdad Railway. This treaty, which was practically ready for signatures, was arranged with the "effective cooperation of Herr Von Kuhlmann," who is now Foreign Secretary of the Imperial German Government, but notoriously viewed with suspicion by the military party.

During these critical years Prince Lichnowsky, himself earnestly desirous of promoting peace and completely satisfied that the British Government had the same purpose in view, labored to bring about a good understanding between the countries, but the policy of his home government made difficulties for him. He was sanguine, however, of success, and when in Germany, in June, 1914, after the assassination of the Austrian Archduke, he was confident there would be no war.

PRINCE LICHNOWSKY sums up the situation which led to war as follows:

As appears from all official publications, without the facts being controverted by our own White Book, which, owing to its poverty and gaps, constitutes a grave self-accusation:

1. We encouraged Count Berchtold to attack Serbia, although no German interest was involved, and the danger of a world war must have been known to us—whether we knew the text of the ultimatum is a question of complete indifference.

2. In the days between July 23 and July 30, 1914, when M. Sazonoff emphatically declared that Russia could not tolerate an attack upon Serbia, we rejected the British proposals of mediation, although Serbia, under Russian and British pressure, had accepted, almost the whole ultimatum, and although an agreement about the two points in question could easily have been reached, and Count Berchtold was even ready to satisfy himself with the Serbian reply.

3. On July 30, when Count Berchtold wanted to give way, we, without Austria having been attacked, replied to Russia's mere mobilization by sending an ultimatum to St. Petersburg, and on July 31 we declared war on the Russians, although the Czar had pledged his word that as long as negotiations continued not a man should march—so that we deliberately destroyed the possibility of a peaceful settlement.

In view of these indisputable facts, it is not surprising that the whole civilized world outside Germany attributes to us the sole guilt for the world war.

The German Vice-Chancellor, in discussing the memorandum before the Reichstag Committee, said in part:

Some assertions in his documents must, however, be contradicted, especially his assertions about political events in the last months preceding the war. Prince Liehnowsky was not of his own knowledge acquainted with these events, but he apparently received from a third, and wrongly informed quarter, inaccurate information. The key to the mistakes and false conclusions may also be the Prince's overestimation of his own services, which are accompanied by hatred against those who do not recognize his achievements as he expected. The entire memorandum is penetrated by a striking veneration for foreign diplomats, especially the British, who are described in a truly affectionate manner, and, on the other hand, by an equally striking irritation against almost all German statesmen.

The Vice-Chancellor characterized as false the statements that Von Moltke had urged war, that the then Foreign Secretary had visited Berlin in 1914, and that the German Ambassador at Petrograd had reported that Russia would in no event move.

HERR VON JAGOW, German Foreign Secretary in 1914, has issued a statement commenting upon and denying some of the statements of Prince Liehnowsky's paper, among them that he visited Vienna in 1914. Of the Bagdad railway negotiations he says:

When in January, 1913, I was appointed Secretary of State I regarded a German-English rapprochement as desirable, and an agreement about the points at which our interests touched or crossed as obtainable. In any case I wanted to try to work in this sense. A main point for us was the Mesopotamia-Asia Minor question—the so-called Bagdad policy—because it had become for us a question of prestige. If England wanted to push us out there, a conflict seemed, indeed, to me to be hardly avoidable. As soon as possible I took up in Berlin the settlement about the Bagdad Railway. We found the English Government ready to meet us, and the result was the agreement which had almost been completed when the world-war broke out.

At the same time the negotiations about the Portuguese colonies, which had been begun by Count Metternich and continued by Baron Marschall, were resumed by Prince Liehnowsky. I intended to begin later on—when the Bagdad railway question, in my opinion the most important question, had been settled—further agreements about other questions, in the Far East, for example:

Von Jagow referring to Prince Liehnowsky's policy of developing closer relations with England, instead of backing up to the limit the aspirations of Austria in the Balkans, says:

I also pursued a policy which aimed at an agreement with England, because I was of the opinion that this was the only road by which we could get out of the unfavorable situation into which the unequal distribution of strength and the weakness of the Triple Alliance had brought us.

"Political marriages until death us do part" are, as Prince Liehnowsky says, impossible in international relations. But in the existing state of affairs in Europe isolations are equally impossible. The history of Europe is composed of coalitions, some of which have led to the avoidance of wars and some to violent conflicts. A loosening and final dissolution of old unions which no longer satisfy all the conditions cannot be recommended until new constellations are within reach. That was the aim of our policy of rapprochement with England. As long as this policy did not provide trustworthy guarantees we could not abandon the old securities—and the obligations which they involved.

The extreme policy of Germany in supporting Austria is partially explained in this paragraph:

Our Morocco policy had led to a political defeat. Happily this had been avoided in the Bosnian crisis, and at the London Conference. A fresh diminution of our prestige was intolerable for our position in Europe and in the world.

Herr Von Jagow is fair enough to add his testimony to that of Prince Liehnowsky, as to Sir Edward Grey's desire to maintain peace. He says:

I am by no means willing to adopt the opinion, which is at present widely held in Germany, that England laid all the mines which caused the war; on the contrary, I believe in Sir Edward Grey's love of peace and in his serious wish to reach an agreement with us. But he had involved himself too deeply in the net of Franco-Russian policy. He could no longer find the way out, and he did not prevent the world-war—as he could have done. Among the English people also the war was not popular, and Belgium had to serve as a battlefield.

The Pan-German newspapers of Germany are demanding that Prince Liehnowsky shall be tried for treason. The Socialist papers give weight to his statements. The Vorwaerts, although now supporting the government, says that the efforts to discredit Liehnowsky's ability and discernment merely mean that the most important Ambassadorial post that Germany had at her disposal was occupied by a fool and a blockhead.

The Mannheimer Volkstimme says that "either Prince Liehnowsky is the most ineurable idiot who ever sat in an ambassador's chair, or else not a shred remains of the fiction that the outbreak of war was caused by English intrigues."

IN a speech before the Reichstag Committee, in which Vice-Chancellor Von Payer discussed the Liehnowsky memorandum, he also referred to a letter written by a Dr. Muhlon, a German of high social and business standing now living in Switzerland, but who at the outbreak of the war was a director in Krupps. Notwithstanding his connection with the great gun works, Muhlon seems to have comprehended the awful crime against humanity involved in wantonly bringing on the war. His statement, in part, was as follows:

In the middle of July, 1914, I had, as I frequently had, a conversation with Dr. Helfferich, then director of the Deutsche Bank in Berlin, and now Vice-Chancellor. The Deutsche Bank had adopted a negative attitude towards certain large transactions in Bulgaria and Turkey, in which the firm of Krupp, for business reasons—delivery of material—had a lively interest. As one of the reasons to justify the attitude of the Deutsche Bank, Dr. Helfferich finally gave me the following reason:

"The political situation has become very menacing. The Deutsche Bank must in any case wait before entering into any further engagements abroad. The Austrians have just been with the Kaiser. In a week's time Vienna will send a very severe ultimatum to Serbia, with a very short interval for the answer. The ultimatum will contain demands such as punishment of a number of officers, dissolution of political associations, criminal investigations in Serbia by Austrian officials, and, in fact, a whole series of definite satisfactions will be demanded at once; otherwise Austria-Hungary will declare war on Serbia."

Dr. Helfferich added that the Kaiser had expressed his decided approval of this procedure on the part of Austria-Hungary. He had said that he regarded a conflict with Serbia as an internal affair between these two countries, in which he would permit no other State to interfere. If Russia mobilized, he would mobilize also. But in this case, mobilization meant immediate war. This time there would be no oscillation. Helfferich said that the Austrians were extremely well satisfied at this determined attitude on the part of the Kaiser.

When I thereupon said to Dr. Helfferich that this uncanny communication converted my fears of a world-war, which were already strong, into absolute certainty, he replied that it certainly looked like that. But perhaps France and Russia would reconsider the matter. In any case the Serbs deserved a lesson which they would remember. This was the first intimation that I had received about the Kaiser's discussions with our Allies. I knew Dr. Helfferich's particularly intimate relations with the personages who were sure to be initiated, and I knew that this communication was trustworthy.

After my return from Berlin I informed Herr Krupp von Bohlen and Halbach, one of whose directors I then was at Essen. Dr. Helfferich had given me permission, and at that time the intention was to make him a director of Krupps'. Herr von Bohlen seemed disturbed that Dr. Helfferich was in possession of such information, and he made a remark to the effect that the Government people can never keep their mouths shut. He then told me the following. He said he had himself been with the Kaiser in the last few days. The Kaiser had spoken to him also of his conversation with the Austrians, and of its result: but he had described the matter as so secret that he (Krupp) would not even have dared to inform his own directors. As, however, I already knew, he could tell me that Helfferich's statements were accurate. Indeed, Helfferich seemed to know more details than he did. He said that the situation was really very serious. The Kaiser had told him that he would declare war immediately if Russia mobilized, and that this time people would see that he did not turn about. The Kaiser's repeated insistence that this time nobody would be able to accuse him of indecision had, he said, been almost comic in its effect.

Von Payer's comment upon the Muhlon disclosures was that the gentleman was suffering from neurasthenia, and that no attention need be paid to his statements since the important gentlemen quoted by him denied having made the statements attributed to them.

Mitchell
Sixes

See What $1250 Buys in a Six

HERE is a car which gives more for $1250 than any other Six of the day. It gives a 120-inch wheelbase, so the car is roomy. It is longer and larger, and far more impressive, than the usual 5-passenger car.

The motor is our 40-horsepower Six—our finest type after many years devoted to Sixes only.

The body is a masterpiece—the latest creation of a famous designer. It is built in our own body plant, with the most exacting care.

The rear springs are shock-absorbing—an exclusive Mitchell type. The equipment is unusually complete. There is nothing like it—nothing nearly like it—at this price elsewhere.

Unique in Over-Strength

Both sizes of Mitchells are this year built to new standards of endurance. Months have been spent on these cars by specialists in over-strength.

Our export requirements call for extra-sturdy cars, and these cars are now built to meet them. On American roads, cars built as these are should render lifetime service.

The Mitchell Sixes are built in two sizes—$1250 and $1525. Both are built to these new standards. Yet both undersell every rival Six of like size, class and power.

That remarkable fact is due to our factory methods. This mammoth plant has been equipped to produce the Six-type economically. Efficiency experts have worked here for years to minimize factory cost.

Now the complete car—chassis and body—is built in one plant in this modern way. And the Mitchell prices, plus these extra values, show how much we've saved.

The latest Mitchells come in 16 new-style bodies. Not a wanted type is missing. Write for our catalog, then see these cars—see how much they offer you—before you buy a Six.

THE HALLMARK OF EXCELLENCY

If you examine an old piece of silver plate, you will probably find on the under side a small, almost invisible, distinctive mark. It may be an anchor or a letter, a dragon or a crown. It is the hallmark of the maker.

Today the hallmark is called a trade mark and used on every sort of merchandise.

There is another hallmark quite as significant—the guaranteed advertising appearing in a few leading publications, one of which is CHRISTIAN HERALD.

To be worthy of a place in the advertising columns of CHRISTIAN HERALD is the modern hallmark of excellence. Any product so hallmarked you can purchase fearlessly. If it or its sponsors do not make good, CHRISTIAN HERALD will.

Jesus Warns and Comforts His Friends

International Sunday School Lesson for June 2

Mark 13:1 to 14:9

The Christian Attitude in Time of Calamity

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph.D.

THE thirteenth of Mark is the most difficult chapter in the book for most readers. Its pictures are vivid and terrible and its message tremendous.

One of Jesus' disciples, doubtless a Galilean countryman, was exclaiming at the marvelous stones in the temple foundations, which were the largest in all Judea. But Jesus was never carried away by mere physical size, and he was moved to state plainly that for all their impressiveness they would be overthrown in the downfall of the system of which they were a part. He saw clearly the tendency of the times and clearly predicted the destruction which befell Jerusalem a generation later at the most.

But four of the disciples were anxious for more definite information in the matter. When? was their very natural question, and has been a favorite theme of speculation by a certain type of religious mind ever since with reference to every word of prophecy. Jesus did not tell them when, but he warned them, first, against prematurely considering the end of the Jewish order to be at hand, and secondly against being overwhelmed by the course of events to the losing of their faith. How often, in the history of the Church, men have jumped to premature conclusions! How often, too, have they lost heart in the terrific trials that have befallen the people of God!

They were not to be alarmed at wars and tumults, nor at the coming of false Messiahs. For an account of these things see any good history of the Jews, or read Josephus, and learn of the harrowing days when Caligula and Claudius were on the Roman throne. But when the desolating abomination, the Roman army (Luke 21:20), surrounds Jerusalem, then they are to know that they are to flee. Jesus gives in the customary vigorous pictorial language of the prophets a picture of heaven and earth stirred by the epoch-making events. Many of these expressions are taken from Isaiah 13.

The Initiation of a World-Wide Kingdom

But even when these things come to pass, it is not for the little Christian group the end but the beginning! Out of the destruction of the old comes the opportunity of the new. The limited and Jewish order passes in blood and tears, but the world-wide kingdom of God is only just begun. Christ is manifested in power and glory, and his messengers go forth through the earth with the Good News.

Well, we know how marvelously history has unrolled the fulfillment of these words. The substance of Jesus' message of encouragement was wonderfully realized. The early church not simply survived those awful days but flourished. As he said, that generation did not pass away without some who were standing by, living to see these things revealed.

I. The Christian Unafraid in Calamity

Jesus had a very practical purpose in revealing these coming sufferings to his friends. He was not stimulating curiosity and speculation. He was forewarning and forearming them that they might be strong and of good courage. This is the first great teaching of today's lesson for us: we, like them, are to be unafraid in time of national calamity and international strife and tumult. God reigns and his Kingdom is advancing. There can be no catastrophe so gigantic as to shake his holy will. There can be nothing so unexpected as to take him by surprise.

We ought to seize upon Jesus' interpretation of such times as ours as times of travail, of the birth of the new as well as the death of the old. Out of this present war will come new democracy, new opportunity, and a new revelation of God's Kingdom among men. Believe it. God is greater than our fears.

II. The Christian to Be Loyal in Service

There is a second great teaching for us here. Christians are not only to be confident in God under calamity, but are also to be constant in service. When evil days come upon them they are to be but the more faithful and earnest. "You be on the lookout," was his watchword to these disciples. They were not to be taken unawares, but to be ready to turn disaster into opportunity. These men really made good on that basis. Take the Eighth of Acts as an illustration. When the "great persecution" arose after the martyrdom of Stephen, it became the means of wide evangelism. "They therefore that were scattered abroad went everywhere bringing good tidings."

Christians are to be like house-porters, Jesus says: always on the watch. They are to meet every emergency with renewed service. Now consider how the people of Christ are responding in the wars and rumors of wars today. There is no place on earth where loyal, sacrificial service is not being rendered. In the hideous wastes back of Armenia, faithful Christians are ministering to little orphan children "in His Name." On the battle-fields the chaplains are in the front line trenches, two American clergymen receiving the Croix de Guerre already. Who shall count the surgeons, Red Cross nurses, stretcher-bearers, and all the rest who were ready and sprang forward at the call of Christ?

Only ask yourself, "Am I doing all that I can for Christ and men?" Only pray earnestly that you may be ready when some great test comes to you.

III. The Christian Attitude Under Persecution

We must not omit one other splendid practical teaching which Jesus brought to bear effectively: Under persecution and insult the Christian attitude is to be one of calm trust in the Holy Spirit. These men were humble fishermen and they were to be haled before governors and kings! But they are not only to be unafraid; they are not even to be anxious! They are not to prepare speeches, but to have prepared souls, through which God himself can speak. The Holy Spirit will guide them. You remember that many of them obeyed Jesus literally with splendid results.

Now we do not have to suffer the things for which Jesus so thoughtfully prepared his first disciples. And yet many of us are found in situations where prepared and loyal hearts would enable us to speak for the Kingdom with power. Too often we are tongue-tied in the Bible class and the prayer meeting, where the Holy Spirit would fain speak through us to the edifying of our fellow workers. How then shall we say the wise and tactful thing for Jesus Christ in a hostile environment?

It is still a fundamental Christian duty to confess Christ before men. We must always have the inner experience ere we can have the outward expression; but we shall find, as those early disciples found, that telling that which we know, simply and bravely, will be a means of leading us into deeper knowledge.

Jesus Comforted

With such deep and yet practical teachings, Jesus was seeking to prepare the twelve for the approaching crisis. He was to be killed, and afterward great tribulations would come. Yet God would guide them, and make their witness count, and out of all these things there would come the future Kingdom.

Our lesson closes with a picture of Jesus comforted by the loving ministry of a woman, doubtless Mary of Bethany, who was ever thoughtful and responsive in service. The strong Son of God appreciates human sympathy, and how much more is it awaited by the suffering, sorrowing men and women all around us. Every heart knoweth its own burden, and we must not shut up the alabaster cruses of our love when the world's need is so great. "She hath done what she could." God grant that such may be our epitaph.

Threaded Rubber Insulation

Where?

Read what follows carefully. It may clear up some points you haven't understood and will enable you to explain them to any of your friends who may ask you.

Inside every storage battery there must be four different things—positive plates, negative plates, battery solution (or electrolyte) and insulation.

Chemical action between plates and solution causes the flow of electric current.

The insulation is a thin sheet of some material placed between each two plates—the positive on one side, the negative on the other. It keeps the active material of the plates from coming into contact and ruining the battery.

Threaded Rubber Insulation is an exclusive feature of the "Still Better" Willard Battery, which is branded with a red circle enclosing the words "THREAD-RUBBER."

The reason Threaded Rubber Insulation is such a remarkable improvement is because it lasts longer and does the job better—which adds to the durability, life and efficiency of the battery.

Why?

1 Because Threaded Rubber Insulation means a better battery at only a slight advance in price for you, the car owner.

Willard might have been content with a battery that was already used by about 85% of all car builders and had given satisfaction to a million and a half car owners.

But the Willard policy is "Improve whenever it is possible."

2 Because it is the answer to a definite, long-felt desire of engineers.

They recognized the great durability and ideal insulating properties of rubber, but for years could not overcome certain obstacles to its use.

This was because no thoroughly satisfactory way had been developed to let the battery solution pass through the insulation—its free flow being necessary to the chemical action which meant a good, strong electric current.

3 Because the Willard organization persisted in working away at the problem till they found the answer by piercing the rubber with 196,000 little threads.

Write Willard Storage Battery Co., Cleveland, Ohio, for free booklet, "The Story of 196,000 Little Threads," which gives further details, including the very important Willard "Bone Dry" Principle, which is another great advantage of Threaded Rubber Insulation.

NICARAGUA IN THE WAR. Nicaragua declared war on Germany and her allies May 7, the twentieth nation to declare war against Germany.

THE CHURCHES URGE PROHIBITION. At an opportune moment the churches of America have entered the arena to do battle for prohibition. A memorial has been prepared for presentation to the President and Congress, by Bishop McDowell, chairman of the Washington Committee of the Federal Council. It sets forth that "our nation has, with clean hands and pure heart, engaged in conflict for lofty and unselfish ends, and the attainment of these ends demands all the moral powers of our people for the conservation of our economic resources, and the highest efficiency in service." These powers are impaired, the efficiency decreased, and the nation's vitality diminished by the liquor traffic and its attendant evils. Then follows this resolution:

Therefore, in the interest of those who defend our nation, for the saving of our own supplies of food, for the highest efficiency of the industries which provide our means of warfare, and for the strengthening of the moral health of the people, we earnestly urge the President and the Congress of the United States to take steps to prevent, during the entire period of the war, by whatever means are feasible, the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquor of all kinds for use as a beverage, including the importation of all liquor.

The memorial is signed by all of the National Service and War Time Commissions of the American Churches.

FRAGMENTS OF NEWS. It was reported on May 5 that Congress planned to pass all annual supply bills and adjourn early in July. Have you written that letter to your Congressman or Senator about the increased postal rate which threatens either your purse or your reading matter?

The Allies Take the Initiative

other divisions were in reserve ready to press home any advantage which might be gained. The point attacked was just south of Dickebusch Lake. Had the line given way, it would have given the Germans possession of the last high ground between Kemmel and Ypres and would have permitted the outflanking, had the Germans been able to progress, of the Allied possessions at Ypres and on Mt. Scherpenberg.

The Germans are still pressing on in the east, having advanced along the southern coast of the Sea of Azov to the mouth of the Don, occupying Rostov.

In Palestine, faced by attacks by superior Turkish forces, the British abandoned Essalt east of the Jordan, withdrawing their troops to the Jordan crossings. In the operations east of the river, between April 30 and May 4, the British captured one German and 49 Turkish officers, 42 Germans, 843 Turks, 29 machine guns and 6 motor lorries, besides inflicting considerable casualties on the enemy in excess of their own losses. In Mesopotamia the British at last reports were within 80 miles of Mosul.

The Italian front has been comparatively inactive although British and Italian troops have made successful raids on the Austrian positions and the Allies have maintained their supremacy in the air.

The British fleet, on May 9, completed what they had begun on April 23, when the channels at Zeebrugge were blocked by concrete filled cruisers. The old cruiser, Vindictive, which was the flagship at Zeebrugge, was filled with concrete and sunk between the jetties at the port of Ostend, almost if not quite completely blocking the channel. The port was approached as in the previous case behind a smoke screen or wall of artificial fog. The British losses were very light, one motor boat being blown up to prevent capture. The German official report declared the attempt a failure. British aviators have prevented the Germans from clearing away the obstruction at Zeebrugge, reporting the channel completely blocked. If the success at Ostend is as complete, the submarines will be forced to make the long and hazardous trip from Wilhelmshaven through the North Sea before they can get within effective range of Allied shipping. The French official statistics, issued May 9, reported the losses of Allied and neutral shipping by submarines and all other causes in April, 1918, as 381,631 tons, about 60 per cent. of the losses in April, 1917.

The British, on May 9, retook from the Germans some positions on the high ground east of Albert, which had been in German hands over night after a costly assault. French troops, on May 10, captured Grivesnes Park, 5 miles northwest of Montdidier, taking 258 prisoners and holding the position against counterattacks.

There have been no reports during the week of individual action on the part of American troops. American troops in the Montdidier region were reported, on May 10, to be holding a sector 5 miles from Montdidier in front of the Amiens-Beauvais road, where they were digging in while the artillery engaged the German guns in a mutual smashing bee, villages behind both lines being gradually reduced to broken stone and brick dust.

May 11 and 12 passed without that resumption of the great offensive for which the world had waited since April 29. The guns were busy, but the Allied guns more so than the enemy's on these days, the enemy concentrating his fire on points in the Ypres salient giving especial attention to the Trappist Monastery on Mont des Cats, which he was rapidly destroying. During the two days the French stopped and drove back a German attack near Mailly-Raineval, between Montdidier and Hangard; attacked in their own turn, making some gains and taking prisoners near Orvilles-Sorel, also in the sector facing Amiens, and in the Ypres sector, near Kemmel, improved their positions east of Loere, and recaptured Hill 44 north of Kemmel, which the Germans had held since May 8.

Berlin reported on May 11 that heavy losses had been inflicted on the Americans by means of mine bombardments southwest of Apremont and north of Parroy. No confirmation of this report came from French or American sources.

A regiment of the National Army, 2,700 strong, which had landed at Liverpool, was reviewed in London on May 11 by King George, and was cheered to the echo all along its route by enthusiastic Londoners.

A dispatch coming through Ottawa on May 12 reported that conditions on the front were now so satisfactory and the enemy so well in hand that the war cabinet had decided to hold back the American army until it is complete, then to use it in giving the knockout blow which is to bring the victory. Notwithstanding the fact that Germany now had an army of some 5,300,000 men, this force is less by 700,000 than she commanded a year ago, and less by 1,500,000 than two years ago. Her new recruits number some 600,000 a year, and her permanent losses about twice that. Her only chance to increase her army lies in Russia and the Ukraine, and her brutality and domineering disregard for agreements is making her more enemies than friends in both quarters. There were reports on May 11 that the Ukrainian situation had become so threatening that Bavarian cavalry was being dispatched from Belgium to the Ukraine.

Memorial Day Flag Day (June 14th)
Independence Day and Every Day

THE least thing you can do for your country is to—show its Flag. Let your neighbors know that yours is a patriotic home. You'll need this Flag for holidays too—in fact for every day during these strenuous times.

A Large-Sized Old Glory, six feet long and four feet wide. The very Flag you've wanted. It will add much to your celebration of Memorial Day and Independence Day. You'll need it, too, for other National Holidays and local celebrations when the American Flag is indispensable.

The illustration is an actual photographic reproduction of this splendid large Flag, which we have procured for readers of the Christian Herald. To insure durability the stripes are double-stitched. Excellent bright colors, guaranteed not to fade, nor shrink. Pole is not included.

Let your children get their first lessons in patriotism in your own home. If you stand solidly behind the great principles of Freedom and Human Rights, let the Flag tell it. Pledge your allegiance to your country by displaying "Old Glory." We will make it easy for you to show your colors. Here is an offer that brings you "Old Glory" at half the price you would pay for a similar Flag if purchased in a store—and at the time it is most needed. At this critical time in the history of our country you should display the Stars and Stripes.

By placing an order for thousands of these Flags, we were able to purchase them at a considerable reduction. We are glad to give readers of the Christian Herald the benefit of this saving in the liberal offer mentioned above. This Flag cannot be purchased in a store for less than $1.50.

The Warmth of the Next Season

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

THE first warm weather came with a flash of blinding heat. The city drooped under the unexpectedness of it, and the sidewalks, reflecting as they did the glare of the sun, seemed hot to walk upon. One saw women, who had fared forth in their winter coats, quivering under the weight of the sun, and strong men frankly mopping their faces with very damp handkerchiefs.

During the afternoon, a little friend of mine stopped at the office to see me. She dropped heavily into a chair and began to fan herself with a folded paper. "It's never May!" she exclaimed petulantly. "Why, this is August weather!"

"And yet," I answered, laughing, "last week wasn't so unlike winter, was it?"

"Oh, winter!" My friend shrugged her slender shoulders. "I can't believe, now, that it ever was winter!"

I laughed again. For I was looking back, over a short two months, to a blustery, blizzard day, when this same girl had called to see me and had shiveringly wondered whether the winter would soon be over.

"I don't think," she had observed, "that I'll ever be warm again. I know that spring is never coming!"

My little friend wasn't the only one, this winter, who wondered whether the spring would ever come. For this winter was an exceptionally long, hard, snowy one. It seemed to many of us as if there would never be an end to hail and sleet—as if the cruel winds would never cease to blow. And yet, with the first day of summer weather, the thoughts of winter slipped so very far into the background that few remembered the discomforts of it.

ONCE knew a girl who wanted to become a trained nurse. When she was tiny, she used to dress up in apron and cap and play that she was bringing her dolls victoriously through frightful attacks of the measles and the whooping-cough; when she grew older she used to struggle through solemn books on "How to be useful in the sick room," instead of the stories that we usually read. And, finally, she grew old enough to enter a hospital and begin training.

The profession of nursing is usually glorified in the mind of the average girl. She sees herself giving cheer and comfort to suffering folk, and the mental picture is a romantically pleasant one. But, in reality, there is a great deal of hard work to be done before one qualifies as a graduate nurse—hard, messy work like the scrubbing of floors and the washing of dishes and the cleaning of metal instruments and wooden wainscottiings, that is very far removed from the aforesaid pleasant mental picture.

The girl who had always wanted to be a nurse found out very soon that her playing with dolls and her reading had not done a great deal to make easy her chosen line of work. But, because she really wanted to be a nurse, she stuck to her colors and scrubbed and washed and polished with a good will and a certain thoroughness. But—

"My, it's hard!" she confided to me. "I don't know whether I'd have wanted to be a nurse if I'd understood just how hard it is. It doesn't seem as if I'll ever be finished."

During the years of her training I often heard her voice the same thought. And then, at last, came the great day when she graduated and was entitled to wear a cap and go out on cases—real cases.

"I've finished at last," she told me on that day; "but I'll never forget the way I worked to get here—never!"

And then, and I am sure that it was the biggest moment of her life, came a call to her first case away from the hospital. The patient was a little girl-child, very seriously ill—a child that the doctor in charge had small hope of curing.

"We can make the youngster a bit more comfortable," he said, "but I fancy that's about all we can do."

It wasn't exactly a pleasant case for a first one. But the girl who had always wanted to be a nurse set her teeth firmly and went into the room where the child was battling for breath. And, with knowledge and the years of her training behind her, she fought with death.

And how she fought! It was her dream come true—her dream of saving, of easing suffering. Even the doctor was surprised at the progress she made. And when the child grew better, slowly but surely better, he paid her a great tribute.

"I do not think that many women could do what you have done!" he told her.

The girl, some time afterward, told me about that first case of hers.

"It was a marvelous thing," she said, "to know that I was helping that little girl to get well. And how I thanked God when the doctor said that she would live! At that moment—" she broke off and smiled a bit mistily before she went on—"I wonder," she said finally, "whether you remember what I told you once—whether you remember how I said that my training had been so hard that I would never forget it?"

"I remember," I answered.

"Well," the girl told me softly, "I did forget the hardness of it—every bit—when I stood by that child's bedside and heard the doctor say, 'I guess we'll be able to pull her through!'"

THIS story hasn't any moral—much. It's just a bit of psychology that we, who have already forgotten the cold of the winter in the unexpected warmth of the spring, have proved again to be a true psychology.

For the human mind is so constituted that hard work and even pain and suffering can be forgotten in the joy of achievement—just as the snows of the winter time can be forgotten as the spring flowers break through the moist soil.

It's a pleasant thought, at this spring time, to carry with us. It's pleasant to know that if a victory is worth while the struggle leading to that victory may become as an erased page in the book of life. It's pleasant to think that even the horrors of war may, after years, be blotted out in the light of a new liberty and a reconstructed world.

The first warm weather came yesterday. It's summertime again. And winter—well, it doesn't seem as if it ever was winter!

OVER 200 TRUE STORIES OF THE GREAT WAR

In Six Thrilling Volumes. More than 200 True Stories of Adventure and Daring, Told by the Fighters, Thrilling Personal Experiences of Men on the Firing Line in the Greatest War, of Outraged Belgians, Prisoners of War, Air Men, Submarine Men, Torpedoed Castaways

THE true stories from the Fighting Front! Told by the fighters themselves! Will any set of books appear in the world in this year that will so enthrall readers of every degree and every taste?

For here is the one set of books in existence in which over 200 men and women "over there"—the very actors in the greatest tragedy in the history of the human race—give you first-hand, intimate, vivid, accurate, unforgettable pictures of the most dramatic episodes of the world-tragedy. They are reporting to you because the titanic struggle touches us all.

Look over the fascinating titles; a mere glance within the covers of any one of the six volumes will convince you that every American home must have this unique set of books, and that no wide-awake man or woman whose eye meets this announcement can afford to let the chance given here slip by.

These hundreds of stories will keep your eyes open wide from the first page to the last. They are the inside stories of the tremendous struggle, told by the very men and women on both sides who are fighting the battles in the trenches, in the air, on the sea and under the sea. No other stories in the world can be as interesting and thrilling, because no other thing since the world began has been so big and new and terrible as this war.

Here are tales told by the fighting Irishmen—the daring Scots—the daring Frenchmen—the brave Canadians—the bleeding Belgians—the starving Serbians—the bulldog Englishmen—the valorous Italians—the Russians, Greeks and Roumanians—the desperate Germans and their Austrian allies, and by no means least, here are the stories of our own Americans on the firing line.

There is no other set of books in the world to-day, no matter how costly, that appeals so universally to the American people.

There is no other set of books which so satisfies the cravings of the human mind and heart, which grips so strongly both old and young, which tells so intimately about the most important and tragic happening in the history of the world.

You cannot follow the wonderful stories told by these strong men and brave women without a glow of pride in your own manhood, without a thrill of true patriotism, without the uplift that comes from witnessing deeds of devotion, of self-sacrifice and heroism.

FICTION PUT TO SHAME BY FACTS

PICK up any one of the volumes, and you will not willingly lay it down; for you will find the stories so vivid, so dramatic, so stirring, so fascinating, so realistic, so absorbingly interesting, so heroic, so wonderfully told, that it leaves an ineffaceable impression on your mind. The images rise from the pages of this wonderful work like the creations of fiction, and you read on and on without effort or weariness.

Yes, Here Are True Stories of Adventure, Daring, Valor, Self-Sacrifice, Love, Passion, Fortitude, Revenge, Kindness—The Whole Gamut of Human Emotions—Far, Far, Beyond the Imaginings of the Greatest Fiction Writer (Whoever He May Be) That the World Has Ever Seen.

Here are Stories of Spies—true adventures in the Secret Service.

Here are Stories of the Submarines—of life at the bottom of the sea, of thrilling escapes, how they hunt for prey and are preyed upon—of ocean graves.

Here are Stories of the Air Fighters—of battles in the clouds—how it feels to drop 5,000 feet—how to twist and turn to get or avoid the enemy—of the fall to death.

Here are Stories of the Trenches—behind the big guns—on the firing step—"over the top"—"no-man's land"—the barrage—the bayonet charge—taps.

Here are Stories of the Ambulances—heroism of the nurses—silent suffering of the wounded—nobility of the women—skill and daring of the doctors—scenes at the hospitals.

Here are Stories of the Battle Line—the thrill of victory—the despair of defeat—how brave men live and brave men die.

Here are Stories of the Atrocities—the true ones, attested and proved.

And remember, these stories are true. They are not the wild flight of imagination—no man could have written them who had ever been an author before. They are written without style—without polish—without fine language—without fine literature. Yet they will live in the annals of literature as no other writings of the war times will do.

OUR OFFER—SEND NO MONEY NOW

OUR offer to you is to send these six volumes to you free in connection with subscribing to The Christian Herald and The Review of Reviews, both for one year at the regular subscription price.

Those who accept this offer quickly, while the first edition of the books lasts, will secure free the complete set of the six volumes, handsomely bound in cloth, and illustrated.

Send no money now—merely mail the order blank, and the set of six volumes will be forwarded, all charges prepaid by us.

If, after five days' examination, you decide not to keep the books, return them at our expense, and you will be under no obligation. You need not purchase them unless convinced of their value. But if you decide to keep them, send $1.00 within five days after their receipt, and $1.00 a month for four months, a total of $5.00 in all for the books, the Christian Herald for one year, and the Review of Reviews for one year. Your subscription for the two magazines will be entered upon receipt of your first payment of $1.00. If now a subscriber, your subscription will be extended one year from expiration.

But be sure to mail the order blank promptly. This offer absolutely covers the first edition. There is no telling how high the war time prices on paper and printing will go. We cannot guarantee to extend this offer to the second edition.

YOURS FREE You have only to sign the order blank below, if you are prompt, to get the six volumes to examine, without obligation or expense, except a stamp. Do not let this chance go by without seeing what it is.

For besides thrilling you beyond any reading you have had before, 15 minutes spent each day with these stories will soon make your newspaper reading, your magazine reading and your conversation vastly more interesting and profitable—will bring you face to face with the greatest historical episode in human annals.

FOR 25 YEARS
THE GREATEST MONTHLY NEWSPAPER

THE Review of Reviews is the world's greatest monthly newspaper. Its editor, Dr. Albert Shaw, has for 25 years been foremost in interpreting lucidly and authoritatively the month's history and personalities to the American public. In the present year particularly, Mr. Frank H. Simonds has given the magazine a new distinction as a reporter of the war's current history.

Mr. Simonds is nothing less than a genius in giving his brilliant yet simply drawn word pictures of the movements of the greatest war in history. Do not miss the Review of Reviews this year.

motion, vendors of chickpeas, squash and melon seeds, boys with green and purple sugar-cane, sucking as they went, camel trains on the lumping, bumping trot, hurrying to get out of the way of the advance guard, big donkeys and little asses and—parading along with all this motley crew—an elder of the Mormon Church, Utah!

COMPARED with the marvelous complexity of color and type in the crowd, the arrival of the troops themselves, as a spectacle, was commonplace. The soldiers were dressed in a dull gray-green, were well equipped and looked hardy. They marched at a remarkably swift pace. As we watched them file past in their modern uniforms and with their modern rifles, we might have forgotten that we were looking at an Oriental army had it not been for one detachment that was still in character. It was the company of camel riders. The camels were not of the variety I have already described. They were fine, graceful animals that paced along briskly and smoothly. The riders rode "side-saddle" and their black top-boots shone glossy in the sun. The detachment of the Red Crescent followed close upon the infantry.

The people did not want this war, at least the people of Syria and Palestine did not. There was no enthusiasm about it. Even the Holy War, upon which the war-party in Turkey relied to rouse interest, failed to enlist the sympathies of the Syrian and Arab Moslems. Nevertheless the entrance of the Holy Flag into Jerusalem on the Sunday after the arrival of the troops was a memorable scene. The crowds were of the same character as on the Friday preceding, only larger. The great flags of the mosques, green and red and gold, were more in evidence. A white camel bearing the mahmal, a kind of throne which is always used to carry the sacred carpet to Mecca, was led out to meet the flag. The camel was followed by a sheikh riding a white horse, covered with handsome Persian rugs, who sprinkled holy water from the Zemzem well of Mecca upon the crowds. The flag itself was carried into the city by an aged mufti from Medina. It was a small, red flag embroidered with gold thread.

As soon as the flag had passed us on its way into the city, my friend, Professor Montgomery of the American School in Jerusalem, and I hurried over to the Mount of Olives. From there we hoped to get a view of the celebration in the temple area below. Rain was beginning to fall as we hastened down into the Kidron Valley and climbed the slopes of Olivet. We took refuge under the broken arches of a ruined church which marks the traditional site where Jesus looked upon Jerusalem and wept over it. The poor old mufti who bore the Holy Flag into the city caught cold in the chill and wet and two days later died of pneumonia.

The entrance of the Holy Flag into the Holy City ended in fiasco and tragedy, a not unfitting symbol of Turkey's ill-starred Egyptian expedition.

THAT night Mr. Gelat, the very capable and reliable dragoman of the American Consulate (now unfortunately interned somewhere in Asia Minor) hurried over to inform us that the authorities had just issued an order that all foreigners who wished to leave the country must do so by the 28th of the month, or stay till after the war was over. As we hastily packed for our flight into Egypt the full meaning of what we had been passing through began to impress itself upon me.

Jerusalem had revealed itself to us as it had to no one, perhaps, for generations. And more, we had been privileged to be in Jerusalem as an old chapter was closing and a new was opening in its history. As we watched the Turkish army filing over the slopes of Scopus—successor to Assyrian, Babylonian, Persian, Seleucid, Roman, Saracen and Crusader—we realized that we were watching the coming of a nation, not to victory but to ultimate defeat. And as we saw the flag of the Prophet again unfurled in Jerusalem—the first time since Saracen and Crusader fought here for supremacy—we felt that in all probability this would be the last time in the history of the world that Islam would attempt to draw the sword in the name of Allah!

THE afternoon before we left for Jaffa, I walked along the ridge for Scopus to the Mount of Olives. It was just at sunset. Toward the East the shadows were deepening in the great billowy, blue folds of the mountains of Moab; but over the city toward the West hung the glow of the most splendid sunset I had seen during our stay in Jerusalem. A boy came out on the minaret of the mosque which adjoins the Chapel of the Ascension and in a clear, strong voice called the world to prayer. It is in mystical moments such as this that the East asserts its ancient supremacy over the West, its supremacy in religion, of which the hoary city that lay beneath me is the enduring symbol. It must have been in a moment of transfiguration such as this that the ancient prophet saw the mountain of the Lord's house, that same low-lying temple-mount upon which I was then looking down, established in the top of the mountains and exalted above the hills:

And all nations shall flow unto it,
And many people shall go and say:
Come, let us go up to the mount of the Lord,
To the house of the God of Jacob,
That he may teach us out of his ways,
And that we may walk in his paths,
And he shall judge between the nations,
And shall give decisions for many peoples;
And they shall beat their swords into ploughshares,
And their spears into pruning hooks.
Nation shall not lift up sword against nation,
Neither shall they learn war any more.

Final Warning! Bible Picture Study Participants

You MUST Submit Your Sets of Answers by May 31, 1918

THIS is "sending in time" in the National Bible Picture Study, for sets of answers may now be submitted, and all sets must be placed in the mail, or delivered personally to the office of the Christian Herald, by May 31, 1918. Remember that sets mailed as late as that final day—May 31—will be accepted, even though we receive them much later; the postmark will show that they were mailed on time.

The following excerpt from the Rules gives the directions for submitting sets. Everyone must follow these directions:

"Participants may submit sets of answers after April 22, 1918, but not later than May 31, 1918—which is the last day for submitting answers. Sets of answers sent by mail must be mailed not later than May 31, 1918. Sets of answers sent by express must be delivered at the express office on or before May 31, 1918. Participants who present sets of answers at the Christian Herald office personally or by personal messenger must do so before 5 P. M. May 31, 1918."

Tell your postal clerk, when he weighs your set of answers, that it must go as first class mail, upon which the postage rate is now 3 cents for each ounce or fraction. One Answer Book, in a thin envelope or light wrapper, will require 9 cents in stamps. If wrapper or envelope is at all thick, or several sheets of wrapping paper are used, the postage will be 12 cents or more.

Be sure your set of answers carries sufficient postage! And do not fold or roll your set of answers; wrap it up flat.

Heavenly rest will be sweet only to those who perspire for God now.

Mountains of trouble shrink to molehills when a man gets a new vision of God.

Marion Harland's Corner

Barley Flour; Hulled Corn and a Meatless Luncheon

TAKING our correspondents in the order of the receipt of their letters, we have this request from a Minnesota Cornerite:

I shall be very grateful if you will publish soon some good recipes for barley flour bread and muffins, or tell me where we can get them. Mrs. P. M., Big Lake, Minnesota.

A housewife whose reputation as a bread-maker is in all the kitchens in her township, tells me that barley flour, used alone, as the foundation for bread, bismuits, muffins, etc., is not manageable in the making, or palatable when cooked.

"It is stiff and viscid in the dough, hard and tough in the baked loaf," she explains. "I make very good family bread by sifting together twice two cupfuls of barley flour and one of wheat flour. This is particularly good and nourishing when raised with a potato sponge. For a baking which will require three pints of the mixed flours—i.e., a pint of wheat and two pints of barley—boil and mash smooth two large potatoes, making a teacupful. Stir into this, while it is hot, a rounded teaspoonful of shortening and the same of sugar. Beat these ingredients into a cream with a cupful of lukewarm water and then this with a cupful of the mixed flours. Work into a perfectly lumpless batter and add a half-cake of compressed yeast or a tablespoonful of brewer's yeast. Set aside for four or five hours, or until the sponge bubbles all over the top. Have the sifted flours, to which you have added a teaspoonful of salt in sifting, ready in your bread-tray or bowl. Hollow it in the middle and work in your sponge as with any other bread. The dough must be very soft—just stiff enough to be handled. Lift it to the kneading-board; rinse out the bowl with warm water to get all the dough, and work this into the rest. Knead until it is light and elastic, and set for the second rising. It should double the original bulk before you make it into loaves for the final 'raise.' Bake covered until the dough has gained its full height, then uncover and brown.

Our informant sends in also a tried and approved recipe for barley flour muffins, which must await our next issue.

We cannot devote as much room as we could desire to the consideration of any one of the cereals which have leaped into prominence under the pressure of the present condition of the wheat market.

Another letter hails without preamble our proposed exchange of experiences on the part of members of our informal guild:

Just what I have been wishing for!

My brother used to make 'hulled corn.' Now, if ever, is our time for making it. But I, for one, don't know how to do it! Will the Corner tell us and accept my more than grateful acknowledgments? Mrs. C. H., Batavia, N. Y.

We are so fortunate as to have at hand directions for preparing hulled corn in the old-fashioned way, before patent lye and potash took the place of wood-ashes.

Hulled Corn

Stir an even cupful of clean sifted hard-wood ashes into two quarts of cold water and boil it for fifteen minutes. Let it get perfectly cold, then strain, without pressing, into a bowl. Put in the corn, already washed. The water should cover it an inch deep. Put over the fire and bring gradually to a boil. Take out a few grains to see at the end of fifteen minutes if the skins are loosened. When they may be slipped easily from the grains, pour off the water and put the drained corn into clear cold water. Rub it gently but thoroughly between the hands, transferring the cleaned grains to ice-cold water. When the 'hulling' is completed, wash the corn through two more waters to rid it of all taste of the ashes. Dry in the wind; but not in the sunshine, if you mean to keep it for future use. If you wish to prepare it at once for the table, boil until tender in clear water. This is home-made hominy.

Baked Eggs

Eggs should be cheap enough by now to warrant one in using them as the principal dish of a family luncheon. As we are informed by those who ought to know whereof they speak that an egg contains as much nourishment as half a pound of meat, allow one apiece for the eaters, with perhaps an odd one in case of a chance guest. Have ready, before breaking the eggs, as many 'nappies' as will be needed. These are small cups of stone, china or earthenware, warranted fireproof. Rub the inside of each with butter (or a substitute); then pour into it two teaspoonfuls of cream. Save the 'top' of the milk-bottle or pan for the purpose. Add a bit of butter not bigger than a hazelnut, and set the nappies in a bake-pan containing hot water. This should come less than half-way to the top of the little cups for fear of boiling into them. Set in the open oven for a minute, or until the water begins to bubble. Draw to the oven-door and break a fresh egg into each nappie. Dust lightly with salt and pepper, and close the oven door. In less than four minutes, if the heat be even, the eggs should 'form' sufficiently for eating. Use your judgment as to this, and consult the taste of those who like soft or firm eggs.

Serve in the nappies and pass thin slices of bread and butter or toast.

Apple and Celery Salad

Peel, core and cut into dice half an inch square enough apples to make a heaping cupful when cut up. Clip into inch lengths enough celery to make half as much in bulk when cut as you have of apple-dice. Toss lightly together with a silver fork and serve in small saucers or glass plates lined with lettuce. Pass with these a French dressing made thus:

Stir together to an 'emulsion' a generous tablespoonful of vinegar and three times as much of the best salad oil, with a scant teaspoonful of salt, the same of powdered sugar and a quarter-teaspoonful of pepper—or paprika if you can get it. Mix slowly, rubbing all together with the bowl of a silver spoon, and set in the ice until you are ready to serve the salad, which should also be kept on the ice up to the last minute.

This may be a separate course, if you wish, or accompany the baked eggs, taking the place of a green vegetable. In either case thin slices of your cold barley bread may go around with it, or graham crackers.

If the salad take the place of a second course, you may piece out the first with baked potatoes, hot and mealy, served in their jackets.

Mock Devonshire Cream

As our traveled readers know, Devonshire cream, eaten usually with marmalade, is a popular breakfast and luncheon delicacy all over the British Isles.

A recipe for making the original cream would be useless to readers who have not access to large dairies. The 'mock Devonshire cream' I offer is a really good imitation of the far-famed dainty, and may be made by any housewife who can buy cream cheese from the grocer or make 'cottage cheese' in her own kitchen.

Allow for half a pound of Philadelphia cream cheese (or any other variety) three tablespoonfuls of cream. With a broad-bladed knife work by degrees the cream into the cheese until you have a snowy hillock in consistency thicker than cream, yet softer than butter.

Pass with it jam or marmalade or fruit jelly, and heated and buttered crackers—preferably graham or oatmeal or some other wheatless brand. The market is full of them. The 'mock' cream is laid first upon a corner of the buttered biscuit or cracker, and then a morsel of the jam or marmalade. The combination is charming, as all English-born readers can testify. It should be better known to the seekers for inexpensive yet delicious desserts.

The Same Number of Food Units in Meats and Eggs

The Best Food Isn't High

When war-time food costs worry you, remember Quaker Oats. At all times and in every way, that is the food of foods.

A penny dish, and yet the food of palaces. For nothing else can match it in flavor or nutrition.

In calories — the units of food value — mark how vastly it excels:

Calories Per Pound
Quaker Oats . . .	1810
Young Chicken . . .	505
Round Steak . . .	890
Potatoes	385
White Bread . . .	1205
Eggs	720

In energy value, Quaker Oats are twice better than meat. In essential minerals, they are many times richer. In protein—the body builder—they are about the same as meat.

In cost, at this writing, they are seven times cheaper—per 1000 food units—than meats, eggs and fish, on the average.

Quaker Oats is the best food in existence, for children or adults. Make it your basic food. Mix it with your flour foods. You will gain in flavor, gain in nutrition and save money.

Quaker Oats

The Best 30% of the Oats

Quaker Oats are flaked from queen grains only—just the rich, plump oats. We get but ten pounds from a bushel, for all the small grains are discarded.

Thus you get a superlative flavor when you ask for Quaker Oats. And it costs you no extra price. Make your oat foods doubly welcome with these exquisite flakes.

13c and 32c Per Package

Except in Far West and South

Quaker Oats Bread

- 1½ cups Quaker Oats (uncooked)
- 2 teaspoons salt
- ½ cup sugar
- 2 cups boiling water
- 1 cake yeast
- ¼ cup lukewarm water
- 5 cups flour

Mix together Quaker Oats, salt and sugar. Pour over two cups of boiling water. Let stand until lukewarm. Then add yeast which has been dissolved in ¼ cup lukewarm water, then add 5 cups of flour.

Knead slightly, set in a warm place, let rise until light (about 2 hours). Knead thoroughly, form into two loaves and put in pans. Let rise again and bake about 50 minutes. If dry yeast is used, a sponge should be made at night with the liquid, the yeast, and a part of the white flour.

This recipe makes two loaves.

Quaker Oats Sweetbits The Oat Macaroon

- 1 cup sugar
- 2 eggs
- 2 teaspoons baking powder
- 1 tablespoon butter
- 1 teaspoon vanilla
- 2½ cups Quaker Oats (uncooked)

Cream butter and sugar. Add yolks of eggs. Add Quaker Oats, to which baking powder has been added, and add vanilla. Beat whites of eggs stiff and add last. Drop on buttered tins with a teaspoon, but very few on each tin, as they spread. Bake in slow oven. Makes about 65 cookies.

Fresh Air and Cool Air

DR. ABRAHAM JACOBI, known as the Nestor of American medicine, says: "Seventy is too much—65 is ample for persons in robust health who are actively engaged. Susceptibility to disease is developed by breathing an overheated atmosphere, and if persons can be taught to keep their houses cool enough for health, life as well as coal will be saved."

Dr. Haven Emerson, Commissioner of Health of New York, says: "A temperature of sixty-eight degrees supplies ample heat for all healthy persons. There is no question that our houses and offices are kept too warm. An undoubted improvement in the public health will take place if the American people can be persuaded to keep their houses cool enough."

"Even a baby is warm enough in a temperature of sixty-eight degrees," says Dr. S. Josephine Baker, head of the Bureau of Child Hygiene of New York. "Cool air and fresh air are absolutely essential to health."

SERVICE is the ultimate end of faith. While we know that faith leads to salvation, we must realize that the way lies through paths of service. Heat travels from one end of a bar of iron to another because the vibrations of force which it represents are passed from atom to atom of the iron. If any atom should cease to vibrate the action would be stopped. The flame of Christian faith will travel from one end of the earth to another only as individual Christians touch in loving service those whom Christ has not yet claimed. As Christians it is natural that our first charges should be within the church; in the service of praise or of prayer, in teaching, in leading devotional meetings, or in developing the social side of religious life. But if it goes no further, our faith is of little moment, for it is only as the Christian is able to spread his influence in the community that he makes his faith vital. The church reaches the community through two avenues: the avenue of evangelism, of exhortation, of spoken appeal to the sinners whom it would save, and the avenue of physical help, which by ministry to the body oftentimes opens the door to the soul. If any hunger in your town, if any suffer, if any are not properly clad, if any are employed where hours or conditions are cruelly wrong, if there is injustice anywhere or ignorance that seeks enlightenment, or worthy ambition that searches out for opportunity, these are your open doors for service in the name of the Christ whose sacrifice you emulate when you give yourself unselfishly for the good of another. It seems almost trite to add that the measure of your opportunities for service increases with your education. Opportunity is not denied to the unlettered, but learning is a gate to wider fields, and we owe it both to ourselves and to the cause of Him who died for us, and whom we would serve to the utmost, to train our minds as completely as our opportunities permit, to get all the education we can at such cost as may accrue. (See page 594, Christian Herald, May 8, 1918.)

Organizing the South for Service

IN the Southern Sociological Congress, which recently closed its seventh annual meeting at Birmingham, Ala., hundreds of the most thoughtful leaders of the South, white and colored, met with representatives of Allied governments, soldiers, Federal and state experts, and government officials, to discuss the best means to mobilize the leadership of the South for a "win-the-war" campaign. President Wilson sent the following greeting: "Will you not be kind enough to convey my warm personal greetings to the Southern Sociological Congress and express my very sincere interest in the important conferences it is holding and my confident hope that the best sort of co-operation in the great common aims of the country at this time may issue out of those conferences?"

The Congress was founded by Mrs. Anna Russell Cole, of Nashville, Tenn., "to enlist the South in a crusade of social health and righteousness."

Dr. Charles S. Macfarland, secretary of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, opened the Congress with a powerful address on "the Moral Causes and Aims of the War," and Hon. Albert Johnson, a congressman from the State of Washington, and one of the ten congressmen who recently visited the seat of war, spoke on "the War's Challenge from the Firing Line." Dr. Stockton Axson delivered "America's Answer from the Home Line." Dr. Charles W. Stiles, of the United States Public Health Service, in a paper entitled "A Community Program for Public Health During the War," outlined a basis for nation-wide health work. Major Bascom Johnson, of the Commission on Training-camp Activities, spoke on "Keeping the Army Fit to Fight."

Dr. Max J. Exner, of the International Y. M. C. A. Committee, declared, in an address on "Moral Conservation in the Army," that the officials at Washington, after a study of the army on the Mexican border, mapped out a new policy for handling immorality in the army and navy, which undertook not merely to minimize the consequences of vice but to eliminate vice. The emphasis is placed on clean, moral living as a great patriotic ideal. Professor F. B. Dressler of George Peabody College, Nashville, Tenn., outlined a health program for the schools, in which the teaching of cleanliness and health, how to get pure water, how to exterminate flies and mosquitoes, and how to banish hookworm, would be the aim of education. Two leaders of the negro race, Monroe N. Work and Principal R. Moton, both of Tuskegee Institute, presented the claims of their race to an equal opportunity in education and industry at home while their brothers are fighting for democracy in Europe.

Building the Navy

thousands and there are thousands more under contract. The idea now, is to keep on hand at the navy yards a six-month supply of clothes for all of the ships, and in addition 100,000 complete outfits.

AND then the food. It has often been said that our Navy is better fed than any other that sails the seas. Nevertheless the cost of the feeding in these times of war has increased much less than the cost of food prices in the markets on shore. In 1916 the average ration was thirty-seven and six-tenths cents and last year it rose to a little more than 6 cents higher. It is now under 50 cents. If the increase in the cost of the ration had been proportionate with the increase in the cost of food, we would have had to pay $1,500,000 more to feed the Navy than we actually did. That means a saving of more than $4,000 a day, and this was accomplished by prohibiting the purchase of patent and proprietary foods, by making such things as pies, cakes and ice cream on board ship, and by watching the leaks in every possible way. Matters of this kind are figured out to the one-tenth of a cent, and even before the war a saving of a half cent on a meal meant more than $1,000 a day year in and year out. That saving was made in 1916. Nevertheless, the surgeon general says the Navy is the best fed body of men in the world.

The CHANGELING DOG

By Margaret E. Sangster

Sometimes my little dog would start,
And stand so still with every muscle stiff,
That I would know
He saw a Something that I couldn't see.
And I would look high up, where tree met tree,
And hold my sling-shot ready, so that if
The branches bent apart,
And Something flew....

My little dog, he knew
The things I only guessed !

He knew where tired dwarfs lay down to rest,
He knew where pixies kept their treasure chest,
He knew the place where, at the close of day,
The dancing little sunbeams hid away.

We used to wander through the woods, together,
My little dog and I, in pleasant weather,
And when he barked or frisked I'd feel that he Was laughing at the things I couldn't see....

I always thought he was a fairy child
Changed to a dog, perhaps, for being wild,
And running off to play with boys like me.

I often wished (and oh, I wish it now!)
That he could speak—He would have told me how
The Brownies lived, and where the rainbow gold
Was hid away.

He might have even told
How youth is kept when years will slip away,
And I would be a child again, today.

Right and Wrong Methods in Child Training

MANY loving parents with the best interest of their children at heart are unknowingly committing nothing less than a crime against their little ones because of the methods they use in training them in the way they should go.

Not only do these methods fail in their immediate purpose, but they work an irreparable harm in their effect on the child's future success and happiness.

Abraham Lincoln, perhaps our greatest American, once said: "All that I am and all that I ever hope to be I owe to my mother." Great men before and since Lincoln have in the very same way given the big share of credit to their parents—and how truly they spoke.

The trouble has always been that we have never given any really scientific study to the question of child training—we have not searched for the cause of disobedience, the cause of wilfulness, the cause of untruthfulness, and of other symptoms which, if not treated in the right way, may lead to dire consequences. Instead, we punish the child for exhibiting the bad trait, or else "let it go." As a result, we do the child an actual wrong instead of helping it. What we should do is to attack the trouble at its source.

Confidence the Basis of Control

The new system of child training is founded upon the principle that confidence is the basis of control.

Under this new system children who have been well-nigh unmanageable become obedient and willing, and such traits as bashfulness, jealousy, fear, bragging, etc., are overcome. But the system goes deeper than that, for it instills high ideals and builds character, which is of course the goal of all parents' efforts in child training.

Physical punishment, shouted commands, and other barbarous relics of the old system have no place in this modern school. Children are made comrades, not slaves, are helped, not punished. And the results are nothing short of marvelous.

Instead of a hardship, child training becomes a genuine pleasure, as the parent shares every confidence, every joy and every sorrow of the child, and at the same time has its unqualified respect. This is a situation rarely possible under old training methods.

And what a source of pride now as well as in after years! To have children whose every action shows culture and refinement, perfect little gentlemen and gentlewomen, yet full of childish enthusiasm and spontaneity withal!

Results Without Friction

To put in practice these new ideas in child training, strange as it may seem, takes less time than the old method. It is simply a question of applying principles founded on a scientific study of human nature, going at it in such a way as to get immediate results without friction.

The founder of this new system is Professor Ray C. Beery, A.B., M.A. (Harvard and Columbia), who has written a complete Course in Practical Child Training. This Course is based on Professor Beery's extensive investigations and wide practical experience, and provides a well-worked-out plan which the parent can easily follow. The Parents' Association, a national organization devoted to improving the methods of child training, has adopted the Beery system and is teaching the course to its members by mail.

Nothing Else Like It

Membership in the Parents' Association entitles you to a complete course of lessons in child training by Professor Beery. These lessons must not be confused with the hundreds of books on child training which leave the reader in the dark because of vagueness and lack of definite and practical application of the principles laid down. It does not deal in glittering generalities. Instead,

The New Method places confidence as the basis of control it shows by concrete illustrations and detailed explanations exactly what to do to meet every emergency and how to accomplish immediate results and make a permanent impression.

No matter whether your child is still in the cradle or is eighteen years old, this course will show how to apply the right methods at once. You merely take up the particular trait, turn to the proper page, and apply the lessons to the child. You are told exactly what to do. You cannot begin too soon, for the child's behavior in the first few years of life depends on the parent, not on the child.

This Book Free

"New Methods in Child Training" is the title of a little book which describes the Parents' Association and outlines Professor Beery's course in Practical Child Training. The Association will gladly send a copy free on request.

If you are truly anxious to make the greatest possible success of your children's lives, you owe it to them to at least get this free book which shows how you may become a member of the Parents' Association and secure the fine benefit of this wonderful new way in child training. Merely mail the coupon or a post-card or letter, but do it today, as this offer may never be made here again.

DO YOU KNOW HOW—

- to instruct children in the delicate matters of sex?
- to always obtain cheerful obedience?
- to correct mistakes of early training?
- to keep child from crying?
- to develop initiative in child?
- to teach child instantly to comply with command, "Don't touch"?
- to suppress temper in children without punishment?
- to succeed with child of any age without display of authority?
- to discourage the "Why" habit in regard to commands?
- to prevent quarreling and fighting?
- to cure impertinence? Discourtesy? Vulgarly?
- to remove fear of darkness? Fear of thunder and lightning? Fear of harmless animals?
- to encourage child to talk?
- to teach punctuality? Perseverance? Carefulness?
- to overcome obstinacy?
- to cultivate mental concentration?
- to teach honesty and truthfulness?

These are only a few of the hundreds of questions fully answered and explained, in a way that makes application of the principles involved easy through this course.

AN ILLUSTRATED NEWS WEEKLY FOR THE HOME

Soldier boys "Signing Up," agreeing to read and carry their pocket Testaments

SINCE the President's message called the first man into a military camp there has been a persistent and far-reaching effort to make those camps, both at home and abroad, stand for clean morals as well as cleanliness from a sanitary standpoint. There have been army committees, Y. M. C. A. committees, and committees of citizens in towns near camps. The nation, the church and the community have interested themselves in preventing the usual demoralization of army camps as existent in former days. There have been all kinds of safeguards and laws, mass meetings and barrack meetings.

The Y. M. C. A. is making every effort to start a general man-like revival of religion in every camp, not by huge evangelistic meetings, but by the enlistment of more and more of the soldiers themselves as personal workers, who will watch the chance to say a word in barrack or trench, and will truly live their religion.

It is an incentive for the boys to know that the general in command of the great American army in France is a Christian gentleman. His words to the boys ring as a challenge:

"TO THE AMERICAN SOLDIER: Aroused against a nation waging war in violation of all Christian principles, our people are fighting in the cause of Liberty. Hardships will be your lot, but trust in God will give you comfort; temptation will befall you, but the teachings of our Saviour will give you strength. Let your valor as a soldier and your conduct as a man be an inspiration to your comrades and an honor to your country."

THE results of "Bible Study Week," in which special efforts were made to increase the number of Bible classes, enlist men in carrying and using pocket Testaments and securing signatures to the War Roll, were very gratifying. In many of the larger camps the number of Bible classes doubled. In several camps a total of from 125 to 180 company Bible classes were organized, with an enrolment of 2,800 to over 6,000 in each camp, more than 12 per cent. of all the soldiers in these camps. Tens of thousands of New Testaments were placed in soldiers' pockets; in fact, the demand for Testaments has been so great that in some camps they could not be furnished. The special work has continued in several of the cantonments, especially in the South and Southwest, where nearly 1,000,000 men are training.

At Waco, Texas, a Bible class has been organized in every squadron of four regiments, making sixty-four classes in this one camp, with 6,000 members.

More significant still, as showing the eager desire of soldiers and sailors for the truth, is the fact that over 400,000 copies of the four specially prepared courses of Bible study in book form have been called for, most of them actually purchased by soldiers. It is interesting to find that no studies are so attractive to the men of the New Army as those which relate to the life and teachings of our Lord.

THE following is the Six-Point Program of Bible Study, which has been promoted with marked success by the Y. M. C. A. in most of the great training-camps.

1. An organized Bible class in every company, battery, or squadron, with a leader chosen from the ranks.
2. Small groups for the study of the soldiers' personal, moral, and spiritual problems.
3. Leaders for Bible classes discovered, enlisted, trained and directed.
4. The development of a camp atmosphere by addresses, personal interviews, and discussions, which will make the daily use of the Bible and the organization of Bible classes a normal part of the training.
5. A Testament or Prayer Book carried and used by every soldier and sailor.
6. The wise and intelligent use of carefully selected religious literature suited to the varied needs of soldiers and sailors.

GRAND results are being obtained in the camps abroad and here at home through the Pocket Testament League. The League was originated a number of years ago in Birmingham, England, by Mrs. Charles M. Alexander, wife of the well-known Gospel singer, and has spread rapidly throughout the world, first among civilians, and, since the beginning of the war, among soldiers and sailors. Nearly four hundred thousand British soldiers have joined the movement, agreeing to make it a rule to carry Testaments with them, and to read one or more chapters daily. The movement is spreading among American soldiers, and recently such distinguished statesmen as President Woodrow Wilson, Secretary Robert Lansing, Secretary Josephus Daniels, Speaker Champ Clark, and William Jennings Bryan, and such well-known men of affairs as Henry Ford, John Wanamaker, and H. J. Heinz, have enlisted in the League.

Mr. George T. B. Davis, one of the founders and a leading worker in the Pocket Testament League, writes of his work: "For nearly three years from the outbreak of hostilities it was my privilege to help in the promotion of the League in the training-camps of Great Britain. Last year I was called back to this country by the Business Men's War Council of the Pocket Testament League to assist in promoting a similar campaign among American troops. The aim of the War Council of the League is to supply one million soldiers and sailors with Testaments, and to seek to win multitudes of them to Christ. For nearly a year Mr. Charles M. Alexander and his party have been conducting services of marvelous power and blessing on battleships, in naval training-stations and in the training-camps for soldiers. Great numbers of men in blue and khaki have been presented with Testaments and won to Christ through their efforts, backed by the prayers of God's children."

"For more than four months my associate, Mr. Philip E. Howard, Jr., and myself have been touring the military camps in the Southwestern states under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A. Everywhere we found the men hungry for the Word of God and the Gospel message. Perhaps I can best give the readers of the Christian Herald a glimpse of the character and methods of our work by summarizing an eleven days' Pocket Testament League campaign conducted under the direction of the Y. M. C. A. and the League at Camp Beauregard."

"At the opening meeting one hundred and forty-nine enrolled in the League, making a splendid start for the crusade. At the next meeting a call was made for men who would form little groups to meet together nightly for Bible-reading and prayer and for pushing the campaign throughout the regiment. More than thirty men responded and a special conference was held with them at the close of the meeting. A number of the group leaders offered earnest prayers that their comrades might read the Book of books and make the great decision. This second meeting resulted in the enrolment of two hundred and thirteen men in the Pocket Testament League as daily Bible-readers, while sixty-three made profession of faith in Christ. The outcome of the third meeting was the enrolment of three hundred and forty soldiers in the Pocket Testament League, while more than ninety professed conversion.

"More than two thousand soldiers were enrolled in the Pocket Testament League at Camp Beauregard, and over four hundred accepted Christ. The demand for Testaments was so great that the supply was exhausted before the campaign concluded.

"A few days ago we were holding a brief service with a group of thirty or forty soldiers in their barracks at one of the big embarkation camps. It was Sunday afternoon and the men had received notice that they were to leave the camp early next morning for the steamer and France. It was a kind of farewell service for the men before they went across. One could feel the presence of the Spirit of God moving upon the hearts of the men in khaki as they sat singly or in little groups on their cots in the barracks room. The service concluded with a word of prayer. Then membership cards of the Pocket Testament League were given out, and the men were asked to 'sign up' to make it a rule to read and carry the little Testaments; and also to record whether or not they had previously accepted Christ as their Saviour or would do so then and there. Quietly and calmly the men filled the little cards, and surely there was joy in heaven over the results. It was found that of the twenty-eight men who joined the League, five declared they had accepted Christ previously, and twenty-three signified that they were then making the great decision."

THE War Camp Community Service not only sweetens the social life of the lonely and homesick recruits in the camps, but through them spreads a spiritual influence far and wide. From the front in France this letter comes from a soldier to a gracious hostess in Atlanta:

"At last, dear friend, I have time to write to you, and I want to begin by thanking you for all you have meant to me. You have helped an already strong faith to see the King nearer. You've enabled me to feel the strong hand of a fellow worker, and the strong 'boost' you have given me makes me feel like a Sir Galahad. I never can thank you enough for your kindnesses, and if I should neglect trying, I want you to always remember that I recognize and appreciate what you've done. I have been kept so busy that I may have neglected writing, but I feel that I just must speak to the boys about Jesus. And the wonderful part is, they are so ready to hear. I have organized a prayer circle that is going to grow and expand through the whole camp some day.

"In the Christian Herald there was a beautiful poem or hymn:

"Send thou, O Lord, to every place
Rich messengers before thy face,
The Heralds of the wondrous grace,
Where thou, O Lord, wilt come.

"Remember us boys when you pray, and I'll always include you and your interests in my prayers."

REV. ROBERT FREEMAN, D.D., pastor of the Presbyterian Church, Pasadena, Cal., who is at the head of the Religious Work Department of the American Y. M. C. A. with the Expeditionary Forces in France, has recently written from Aix-les-Bains:

"I am up here for a few days preaching at our Soldiers' Vacation Ground, on the beautiful Lac du Bourget, which the Y. M. C. A. has established for the benefit of the soldiers on furlough, as a counter-attraction to Paris with its lure and its temptations. We have a magnificent palace here for our Y. M. C. A.

building, the old gambling den that cost over a million dollars to erect. Of course we could not have it for a thousand dollars a minute if gambling were permitted just now. And so we had the odd experience yesterday of conducting service where the roulette wheels had stood, and of giving a Gospel message where only the cry of the banker was heard limiting the play to a thousand francs per man."

REV. THURLEW FRASER, a Presbyterian minister and doctor of divinity, who has just returned from France to his home in Canada after a long period of service as chaplain, has no sympathy with the report that vice and intemperance and brutality are the commonplaces of the life of soldiers. For these reports he blames chiefly the medical officer who comes in contact with perhaps five per cent. of the men of his unit and makes false generalization therefrom, and the war correspondent who repeats picturesque profanity to give color to his story.

On the other hand Dr. Fraser found no evidence of the spiritual exaltation which some church dignitaries have professed to find in the army.

What Dr. Fraser found was that if a man was a religious man when he joined the army he carried his religion with him right up to the front-line trenches. In every battalion he visited he found such men. Many of the Canadian boys were deeply religious to begin with, and on this he gives the following interesting information:

"A considerable proportion of them were preparing for the ministry of various churches. In one battery I found eleven students from one of our own theological colleges. In another unit of 250 men I was told that there were five ordained ministers serving as privates. There are Sunday-school teachers, superintendents, serving both in the ranks and as officers. These men have not lost their religion because they found themselves in the army. About their religious observances the men do not talk much, but that doesn't mean they do not pray and read the Bible as at home."

The Camps Welcome the Gospel

LAST fall I was privileged to enter upon the work of a camp pastor. I was delighted. Here was a happy solution of my own problem with respect to my duty in the present crisis. The work of a camp pastor seemed to furnish a happy combination of service to the country and to the Master. And so it was embraced with joy.

I got my first vivid impression of camp-life and camp-work, on a flying visit to Camp Dix. The vast array of buildings, the great distances to be traversed, the consequent difficulty of locating men who have been referred to your special pastoral care, the hindrances which attach themselves to the holding of services—all these things stood out distinctly and served to prepare me for something far different from the workings of a well-ordered congregation. However, the appreciative, cordial attitude which the men manifested toward the local camp pastor whose guest I was, indicated wherein some of the joys of a camp pastorate would consist.

It was on the 22nd of November that I arrived at Camp Devens, Mass., destined to be the scene of my labors and my home for the succeeding five months. I add "my home" advisedly, for half the zest of camp experience would have been lost had I not been privileged to live within the cantonment. In one of the thirteen larger Y. M. C. A. buildings I found hospitable lodging as the voluntary chaplain or camp pastor representing the Lutheran Church. Men could not have been kinder than were the members of the particular Y. M. C. A. staff in charge. One feature immediately engages the attention of the newcomer in such a "Y" family—the fine spirit of sacrifice. Men, very frequently past middle age, had left comfortable homes and the joys of the family fireside for a life which, though by no means one of real hardship, could by comparison be called "roughing it." And men who I dare say had done very little manual labor for many, many years at least, were ready to sweep and clean and shovel coal, and do the hundred and one little things that must be attended to, when you do all or nearly all of the work in a good-sized building. Cheerfulness was the prevailing tone. It was in evidence in the oft-repeated "Everybody up!" that resounded through the building until the last slumberer had turned out for the day. Cheerfulness accompanied the setting-up exercises, added spice to the meals, pervaded the building until the little family left the glowing embers of the fireplace with a final "Good night." That fireplace looms up large and full of pleasing remembrances.

There was plenty of work to be done. Each one had his special tasks. And city comforts were not always in full operation. But there was vigor in the air, and the joy of living took hold of one in a manner unknown to the city-dweller. And the meals! Well, we all have friends and relatives in the army, and have heard something of the capacity of army men. The men of our "Y" messed in a regular company barrack, and were not a bit behindhand in doing soldierly justice to the steaming viands prepared by Uncle Sam. Such was the family life in the "Y" hut, a phase of this country's sudden war experience perhaps not so frequently touched upon in the press, yet one to be remembered with joy.

However, we were not in camp for pleasure, but for the sake of the men. A list of men, whose home pastors were desirous of having them looked after spiritually, had been provided. It was a surprise and a joy to visit these men in their barracks. Such greetings, such vigorous hand-shakes and eyes speaking gratitude are not on the program of the ordinary pastor. No doubt separation from home and the home church had something to do with the cordial reception. But I am strongly inclined to believe that the feeling was in response to something even deeper and more promising: namely, a new appreciation of the Church and her efforts to follow up those who had been in the fold; I trust, also, a new heart and a new understanding for the message which the Church perpetuates in the name of Christ her Lord.

Perhaps I am too much of an optimist and possibly I have not measured with sufficient acumen the results as far as these were in evidence, but my five months in camp have left me with no real lessening of the conviction that many men there are manifesting an attitude toward things religious which combines more of interest and reverence and real desire to draw closer to God than I have observed in the average man of the same age in civil life. It is in the hospital that the most striking cases of an entirely new or of a renewed interest in Gospel Christianity are observed. At Camp Devens it is the custom for the religious workers to take around a kit furnished by the Y. M. C. A. This kit is like a tool box, with various compartments for stamps, stationery, post cards, tracts, and Testaments. The worker proceeds to the ward to which he is assigned and there goes from bed to bed, supplying the needs of the men. The offer of a Testament furnishes a splendid introduction to a religious discussion. Some of the men confide that for the first time they are "thinking things over." Nearly all are ready listeners to the story of man's sin and unworthiness and God's forgiving love as expressed in the atoning sacrifice of Jesus Christ. "The blood of Jesus Christ His Son cleanseth us from all sin" is a passage I used more than any others.

An impressive thing in my hospital work, was the fact that probably six or eight out of every ten Protestant men had Testaments with them in the hospital or down in their barracks. The rest, with only two or three exceptions, gladly took copies. And the Testaments are read, too. One fine fellow told me that he was deriving such comfort from his, and a few days before had offered to read to a man just brought into the ward. He met with a cruel rebuff. A day or two later the same man said to him: "Say, I'm in trouble. I'm sick, my wife's sick. Won't you read to me anyway?"

It is not only the sick in hospital who show a lively interest in the reading of the Scriptures. There are many little classes of Bible readers scattered throughout the barracks. Whole groups of men close the day by reading a portion of their Testaments shortly before the lights go out, and here and there we find a man who is not ashamed to get down on his knees in the big sleeping quarters and pray.

Two Roman Catholics came up to me after a service, and after an appreciative remark respecting the message that had been given, said: "Do you know that in our barrack, most of the men read their Testaments every evening before taps?"

"Do you mean that many men read their Testaments?" I asked.

"No, most of the men," was the quick reply.

I have used this statement quite frequently in commenting on camp work. Where in civil life will you find the group of average men, the men that go to make up a company of our National Army, of whom you can say that most of them read their Testaments every evening?

One unforgettable service was held in a quarantined barrack. By special permission of the captain, I was allowed to conduct it upon the request of some of the men in the company. We had our Scripture lesson, prayer, sermonette, and sang three or four hymns—to the accompaniment of a mouth organ! And the singing was really good.

I feel that there has been in many cases an awakening and a deepening of interest in spiritual matters. This interest is not to be confounded with homesickness, or fear of the dangers of the battle-field, with an immediate terror of things to come. The men in whom this new spirit was observed had for the most part been in camp for several months, and had become accustomed to the healthful and in many ways pleasant life, as well as to the idea of fighting abroad. On the whole a splendid "college" spirit prevailed. Yet there was this more serious undertone. Perhaps the fact that our nation has suddenly awakened out of careless slumber to the magnitude of the task confronting it, has instilled in our men a more definite apprehension of responsibility, of the seriousness of life. This may have given the initial impetus, as far as human eyes can see. And I believe that it is only in so far as the present critical times call men to repentance, that true fruit can be expected to grow out of the blood-stained field of war. We can indulge the hope that such fruit will grow.

The Church today is placed before the greatest opportunity for evangelizing the nation that she has had in decades. We must not forget that it is the men who have been woefully absent in many congregations. Now, they are listening with a new interest. What a blessing if we could in our day witness the re-establishment of the family pew: whole families, father, husband, brother, mother, wife, and children, at their proper posts in all the services and activities of the Church. For the sake of our men, for the sake of our nation, and for the sake of the Kingdom of our Lord, let us not turn a deaf ear to the call from the battle-front. Let us follow our men to camp and trench and fleet with the saving Gospel of Jesus Christ!

Saving Life in Stricken Armenia

By MAYNARD OWEN WILLIAMS

THE one unifying factor of the Armenian race is the Gregorian Church. Around this church, the development of this race as a self-governing nation must take place. Etchmiadzin is the seat of the Armenian national church. The name means "the only begotten Son is descended" and an Armenian legend has it that here Christ appeared to Gregory the Illuminator. In 303, a church was erected over the spot and today there is a canopy marking the place where the legend had its origin. The spear and hand of Gregory are preserved in the treasury of the Cathedral of the Virgin. Etchmiadzin is situated in one of the most beautiful valleys in the world, a wide expanse watered by the Zanga, the Aboran and the Arax and dominated by mountains on all sides, of which 13,445-foot Alagöz and 17,055-foot Ararat are the most prominent.

The Armenians are torn into factions, split into various political parties, given to personal jealousies and cut off from the lovely home life which has distinguished them as the most virtuous race in the Near East. Thousands of them are refugees. Many have lived so long in Russia that they have assumed the faults of the people with whom they have dwelt. The Armenians are disorganized but full of hope for the future—they are in deep trouble and suffering but they believe that a new day is at hand. They do not fear the wilderness if only a Moses will lead them. And the Moses to whom many of them turn is the Katholikos of the Armenian National church, for through years of oppression these martyred souls have constantly turned to their church for inspiration and guidance.

The time is not yet ripe in Armenia for an aggressive Protestant campaign. The Armenian Church is the logical center for any national progress and all Christian effort should be to aid the national church in its difficult task of uniting the various factions. The Armenian people have seen too much suffering and too much martyrdom to be satisfied with ecclesiastical formalism and empty ceremony. Their church is a democratic institution and their Katholikos has been chosen by the entire Armenian people.

The safest basis of judgment as to the fitness of the Armenian Church to meet the future is the way it is meeting the present. Some of the worst conditions prevailing among the Armenian refugees exist in Etchmiadzin, beneath the very shadow of the Cathedral.

NEAR the compound in which stands the cathedral and the palace of the Katholikos is a great square surrounded by an arched building divided into small sheds where there were shops in the days when this was a meeting place for travelers. On each side, there are about sixty of these small divisions, eight or nine feet wide and about eighteen feet deep, and at each end there are about thirty more. In each of these cubicles there is a window and a door. This building is the property of the Katholikos and the rent for these dark, earth-floored rooms goes into the church treasury.

Four or five of the shops are still occupied by tin-smiths and other artisans. In one part, the partitions have been taken down and four or five divisions are taken up by a laundry. This serves the large military hospital which occupies a new building recently erected as a new home for the Katholikos. Two or more other divisions are occupied by public baths furnished by the Association of Cities, where the refugees can have water and soap free of charge.

The other divisions are rented to refugees. The total income amounts to only 350 roubles a month. The rate charged is not exorbitant. In several of these apologies for homes, we saw women spinning cotton and wool for the American Relief Committee in order to get enough money to pay the Armenian Katholikos for the use of their rooms. Yet the officials of the Armenian Church were criticizing the American Committee for paying so much for the work done by the refugees, and imply that there is a religious motive behind all this. There is. But it is the example of Christ rather than the statistical report of an ecclesiastical denomination that dominates. The American Relief Committee is not engaged in a business enterprise, nor in denominational propaganda. It is seeking in every way to keep needy refugees from hunger and misery.

only a few steps from actual starvation. Deaths there will be before this article can reach its readers, but as long as the Russian, Armenian and American relief societies can carry on a sometimes overlapping work, actual starvation will not occur on a large scale in the Erivan or Etchmiadzin district. The danger lies in the fact that a collapse of the Russian and Armenian relief work is imminent, and when people have been living on rocky loaves of gray bread for months, a cessation of the supply for a few days means death.

In a stable belonging to the Katholikos two hundred and fifty refugees are huddled together. These refugees pay no rent. I can scarcely believe their statement that to them only two loaves of bread are issued every day to every five persons, even when small children and infants are counted. The sanitary conditions there are indescribable and I was told after leaving that there was both typhus and small-pox among the refugees. Some of them will die.

One of the men who followed in our train had returned from America because he heard that his nation needed him to help repatriate Van. Then came the second retreat and he can get neither food, position nor passport to return to his job in Connecticut where the impulse to help his people first came to him.

As we left, another man came up to us to beg for aid. In the retreat, he saved the lives of five youngsters and brought them through safely to Erivan. He is getting ten roubles a month for each of them from the American Committee but it costs him twice that to feed them. The Committee simply does not dare open orphanages for such unfortunates, for in that case they would be swamped in a flood of fatherless children.

THE American Committee is doing all it can to avoid any proselytizing movement in its relief activities. Its members have ceased all missionary work. It is forced by the size of its activities and by the catholicity of its funds to relieve bodies only when most of the members would prefer to do a more lasting work with souls. But its work is known to be Christian and for the most part Protestant. There is no disguising the fact that American relief work in this crisis is but another phase of the Christian American missionary work that has been going on in Turkey for decades. Whether or no, the ecclesiastical formalism which is exemplified by stoles and mitres and jeweled pendants is coming into competition with the efficiency of relief work supported by Protestants, Catholics, atheists, and Jews, but which inevitably takes on the spirit of Christ. It is not a case of the Katholikos against the members of the American Committee but of stone canopies, sacred relics and revered traditions against such a spirit of helpfulness and personal sympathy as Christ exemplified. The churches that survive the fire test of a world war must exemplify something of the spirit of the Nazarene toward those who are in want, in trouble or in sin. The Armenian Church will lead its stricken people from misery to soul salvation or will leave them to seek other spiritual guidance according as it relies upon holy tradition, sacred relics and bureaucratic aloofness for its prestige or exemplifies the spirit of a living Christ which testifies to the existence of a living God. It is not enough that Christ here appeared to Gregory, but that the love of God and the sympathy of Christ shall be revealed to the stricken people who now seek spiritual guidance in a time of material want.

American money cannot estrange Armenians from their Church. But neither the antiquated spear nor the severed hand of St. Gregory can avail a church if its spiritual life is as dead as the religious relics it has preserved from a powerless past.

The Gregorian Cathedral at Tiflis, a type of the beautiful architecture of the Armenian Church

ETCHMIADZIN is only twelve miles from Erivan and conditions there early attracted the attention of the Committee in the latter center. One of the Church officials suggested that the American Committee open a branch of its industrial work in buildings owned by the Church. When the matter was referred to the Katholikos, he considered it beneath the dignity of his institution to have American relief work conducted there. But he promised to inaugurate relief work of his own because the women, hearing that he had stood in the way of relief for them through the American Committee, insisted that he do for them what he would not let others do.

There was not a large fund available, it was not well administered, the aid given was not adequate and soon the effort died a natural death. The people then appealed to the American Committee, cotton spinning and weaving were started in rented buildings, and the conditions visibly improved. The popularity of the American work aroused the Katholikos to renew his own activities and now both the American Committee and the Armenian Church are conducting relief work.

MUCH of the awfulness of the situation is lost sight of in the cheeriness of some of the refugees and the presence of young children, barefoot, dirty and clothed in rags, but blissfully careless of what the future may bring, and even tiny babies in most of the dwellings. Many an Armenian woman cherishes with more than usual love a tiny son, one of the too few males of the New Armenia.

The Association of Cities is issuing bread to these refugees, excepting the men. The allowance is one loaf to a person a day. The "loaf" is five to six inches in diameter and a little over an inch thick in the center. It is unleavened and dark brown in color. I judge that the loaf would weigh a half a pound in spite of its small size. I tried to break one to see the inside and could not do so with both hands. An old man who had acquired skill cracked it open by hitting it against a stone.

I saw no emaciated persons among the several hundred refugees, but the whole refugee population is

The American Airplane Mail

THE United States Post Office, on May 15, inaugurated the daily airplane mail service between New York, Philadelphia, and Washington, leaving Washington and New York at 11:30 A.M. and reaching the other terminal on or before 3:30 P.M., the mail being relayed at Philadelphia. On the first day, Lieutenant Torrey H. Webb left Belmont Park, near New York City, promptly at 11:30 A.M., flying away in the midst of an eloquent address, and reached Philadelphia at 12:30, cutting in half the time of the fastest limited express. At Philadelphia Lieutenant J. C. Edgerton took the pouches for Washington, which he reached at 2:50 P.M., the actual flying time being three hours and twenty minutes, slightly less than the schedule which was figured on the basis of a speed of 95 miles an hour. Lieutenant George L. Boyle left Washington at 11:30 A.M. for Philadelphia, but was forced to descend when 25 miles out and swapped a propeller blade in landing. A fast auto-truck was sent to his relief. He carried letters from the President and other government officials to Postmaster Patten of New York City. Lieutenant Howard Culver waited at Philadelphia for Boyle until 2:20 o'clock, but Boyle not appearing, he left for New York with the mail from Philadelphia, reaching Belmont Park at 3:37. He carried 350 letters, 200 for New York City and 150 for other points.

The beginning of this daily service was dignified by the presence of many officials of the government, the President being the center of the celebration at Washington. The fee for carrying a letter from Washington to New York by Air Post is 24 cents an ounce, and the government has had a special 24 cent stamp printed for this service, the stamp being good, however, for any other mail matter requiring that amount of postage. The stamp bears the design of a flying airplane. The Post Office Department is planning the extension of the air post throughout the country. The airplanes used in the service just instituted are 12 in number, and the planes and aviators have been detailed by the War Department from the regular service. The machines are training-planes, built along similar lines to the bombing machines, and are known as "one-seaters." The present plane will carry 300 pounds of material, which, at the rate of 24 cents an ounce, would yield $1,152 for each trip. Planes are being designed to carry 675 pounds, which will yield over $2,500 a trip. The service will be daily except Sunday. When weather conditions forbid flight, the mail will be forwarded by rail. The New York-to-Boston route is said to be the next one in line for the air service. Prominent experts in aviation are even willing to predict a New York-London service as among the possibilities.

On the second day the route from Washington to New York was covered without mishap by Lieutenants Edgerton and Webb, but Lieutenant Bousal, flying from New York to Philadelphia lost his way in a fog and was forced to land at Bridgeton, N. J. The mail went on by motor truck and train to Philadelphia, being taken on from there to Washington by Lieutenant Edgerton.

A Week in the World's News

BALFOUR SAYS DOOR IS OPEN TO HONORABLE PEACE. Arthur Balfour, British Secretary for Foreign Affairs, was catechised by pacifists in the Commons on May 16. Replying to their questions, he declared that Great Britain had not at any time initiated any conversations looking toward peace, but he said "if any representative of any belligerent country desired seriously to lay before us any proposals we are ready to listen to them." He made it plain that peace must be made in common with all Allies, and explained that Emperor Charles' letter to the French President had not been forwarded to President Wilson, because Prince Sixtus had distinctly said that it should be known only to the British and French Premiers, the French President and King George. He declared that there was the utmost confidence and accord between Britain and America. "There is no evidence now, nor at any time, that the German government circles contemplated the possibility of what we should regard as a reasonable peace," he said further and added: "No one was more desirous than Great Britain that the war should be brought to an honorable termination. But we are fighting as one among many Allies, against the Central Powers, who never at any time, and now less than ever, had the least intentions to meeting our wishes." Lord Robert Cecil, speaking on the same subject, declared that a peace offensive was an entirely different thing from a peace effort. A peace offensive would be designed to help the German armies in the field, and he believed that one would be soon forthcoming. On the same day former President Taft addressing the convention in Philadelphia of the League to Enforce Peace, said: "Let us have peace, but let us have war that we may have peace. We are fighting the German people led by the Hohenzollern dynasty. They maintain the undiluted and cruel doctrine that 'Might is Right.' No one in the highest flight of his imagination now can think of undefeated Germany yielding either proper indemnity to Belgium or justice to Alsace-Lorraine, nor will the unconquered ruling class consent to lift the German paw from a prostrate Russia, or give over to decent ruling the blood-stained Christian provinces of Turkey. If the wrongs of the oppressed are not righted the war will have been fought in vain." President Taft closed his address, thus: "There is but one way left to save civilization. It lies through battle-fields from Amiens to Potsdam. The black flag of Germany must be lowered in unconditional surrender."

The Cloudland Mail. Loading in the mail sacks at Washington

MOTORS FOR OUR AIRMEN. It was officially announced in Washington on May 15 that the Liberty Motor is a combination of many motors. The cylinders followed those used in German, English, French and Italian factories, with water jackets applied according to the method perfected by the Packard Motor Car Company. Valve cages were drop-forged and welded in place according to methods evolved by the Ford Company. The valve mechanism followed the design of the Mercedes and the automatic lubrication the plan of the

Packard Company. The cam-shaft was supplied by the Hall-Scott Motor Car Company. The electric ignition system is a specially designed Delco. The pistons followed the Hall-Scott design, the connecting rods were patterned after those in the De Dion and Cadillac. The crank-shaft followed the standard practice. The lubrication of the crank-shaft was a modification of the German practice. The water-pump was adapted from the Packard Motor. The carburetor was developed by the Zenith Company, and the engine was perfected by a committee of engineers assigned to the work by the Packard, Cadillac, Lincoln, Marmont and Trego Companies. Experiments are still being made to make the engine suitable for fast fighting-planes. It was also announced that German planes had already been brought down in France in which the refinements of the Liberty Motor had been copied, and that the American Airplane program was no longer waiting on the perfecting of Liberty Motors, but that six other kinds were being made, at least three of which were already being delivered in quantities

JUSTICE HUGHES TO SIFT AIR SCANDAL. President Wilson on May 13 asked former Justice Hughes, his political opponent of two years ago, to conduct the investigation to be made by the Attorney General's office into the charges and countercharges recently made public in regard to the aircraft situation. Mr. Hughes promptly accepted the task. The President also on May 15 addressed a letter to Senator Martin, in which he opposed the passage in its original form of the resolution introduced by Senator Chamberlain for investigation by the Military Affairs Committee of the conduct of the war. The President declared that the phrase "the conduct of the war" might cover the complete taking over by Congress of the functions of the Executive. Following the receipt of the protest from the President, the committee changed the resolution to limit the investigation to the progress of aircraft and ordnance production, and to the supplies and expenditures of the Aircraft, Ordnance and Quartermaster General's Departments. The President still opposed the resolution in its revised form, declaring Justice Hughes' investigation sufficient.

FRANCE FIGHTS TREASON. The court martial of the editors and directors of the newspaper Bonnet Rouge ended in Paris on May 13 in the finding of six defendants guilty of treason. M. Duval, director, against whom rested the principal accusation, was condemned to death.

HOUSE PASSES OVERMAN BILL. The Overman Bill, giving the President power to coordinate and reorganize executive departments of the government, including the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Federal Reserve Banks, was passed by the House on May 14 by a vote of 295 to 2.

THE RED CROSS DRIVE. The great campaign for $100,000,000 for the work of the American Red Cross, set to begin May 20, was instituted in many cities by parades on May 18. In New York City 75,000 men and women, civilians and soldiers of all arms and services, marched down Fifth Avenue, being reviewed at Twenty-fifth Street by President Wilson. The campaign was thoroughly organized, and officials were hopeful that the final total of subscriptions would exceed $150,000,000.

TO INCREASE RAILROAD RATES. In order to cover the salary advance recommended by the investigating commission, and additional extra expenses of the American railroads which in spite of economies are causing deficits, it was announced on May 13 that Railroad Administration officials had suggested an increase of at least 25 per cent. this year in freight and passenger rates to meet the higher costs, which for the year are estimated to total in the neighborhood of $700,000,000. It is probable that a general increase of 25 per cent. will be made in freight rates, and that passenger rates will be put on a flat basis of three cents per mile.

SIXTY PER CENT. MORE SHIPS. Charles M. Schwab, Director General of the United States Fleet Corporation, announced on May 13 that the shipbuilding program would be speeded up and that he hoped to increase it at least 50, possibly 60, per cent. He said that labor was nobly doing the work expected of it and would continue to do it, and that material could be supplied, but that the prime necessity now was for boilers and engines; equipment ordered for ships building in the east has had to be sent to Pacific Coast yards to complete steamers launched there, and that as they were enlarging their plans for engine-building, the making of accessories was of vital importance. The 5548-ton steamer Tuckahoe launched at Camden was completed, keel to crew on board, in 37 days.

GERMANS LOSE ROSTOV. Moscow dispatches of May 10, printed on May 16, reported that Russian Soviet troops had driven the Germans out of the city of Rostov on the Don, the largest city in the Don Cossack country, the capture of which by the Germans was said

The Woman in Uniform

AMERICA has as yet no Battalion of Death; her men are more than ready to fight her battles, but her women, like Moll Pitcher, are in the thick of it. They are back of the lines, but not all of them out of range of the wide-searching shell-fire. Next week Miss Sangster tells of the uniforms they wear. Potash isn't made in a day, but it's needed every day where crops must grow on reluctant soil. The Kaiser's chemists used to furnish fertilizers for the world. They lost the business when Potsdam went to war. But the world still uses potash. Frank Carpenter tells where it comes from in next week's Herald. A woman's faith has kept many a man from evil and exalted many another. Next week's story tells of Anne Foreman's faith and how it—but wait—you'll know in eight days. The War Camp Community Fund is being spent to keep our boys in camp and field happy, and ready for the fight. Next week will tell you how.

A Noble Christian Life Ended

PASTOR CHARLES WAGNER, known to the Christian Herald family through his sermons and his relief work, died on May 13 at his home in Paris. His eminently successful ministry and his book "The Simple Life" had made him one of the most widely known and best beloved men of our times. He was 67 years of age.

In Paris he was the pastor of a large congregation drawn together by his earnestness, singleness of purpose and refreshing doctrine of life. His chapel in the Boulevard Beaumarchais was often so crowded that as many as 1,000 persons were turned away from the doors.

He was Chairman of the Christian Herald French Relief Committee which distributed many thousands of dollars contributed by Christian Herald readers to war sufferers.

The apostle of the simple life was an Alsatian, nearly six feet tall, broad shouldered and vigorous.

In his early life he was a shepherd. Then, moved by the inspiration to preach simple truths to the people, he went from Touraine to the capital to become the shepherd of a great flock of human beings. As described by himself, his purpose was to influence modern thinking people to return to simplicity of thought and conduct.

"I AIM," he once said, "to put before them in popular words and simple the old, everlasting truths; to persuade them to build a new home for the soul. I believe in equity and justice in private and in international relations. I wish for peace in the religious world. Man is not happy because he is not simple. This I realized when I first saw the artificial life of Paris. By simplicity I do not mean necessarily to refer to dress or exterior decoration, but I preach simplicity in the conception of life and how we use life. The key is that we must first be men and remain men, and subordinate our professions to that, whether we be bankers or tradesmen, or what not."

Through his books, "The Simple Life," "By the Fireside" and "Youth," Pastor Wagner was best known in this country. He did not begin to write until he was 38 years of age. His first book was called "Justice." Subsequently he was impelled to write "The Simple Life" and other volumes that gained wide reading in America. He visited this country in 1904 as the guest of John Wanamaker at Lindenhurst, near Philadelphia, and was the guest of President Roosevelt at the White House. In preparation for his American visit he learned the English language in thirty days. While in this country he delivered hundreds of lectures, sometimes about the simple life, sometimes about France.

ONE of the most notable events of his American trip was his visit to the Bowery Mission, where he viewed the bread-line and addressed what he afterwards described as the most remarkable audience he had ever faced. A tear glistened in his eye as he began, and his deep, rich voice trembled with unwonted emotion. He had been eagerly scanning the faces of the men, and now that the time had come for him to speak to them, it seemed as though any language, much less one that he had only mastered within recent months, would utterly fail to convey the wealth of profound sympathy that had suddenly surged into his heart for these suffering brethren of his. But the words came at last, and wonderful words they were. There was no cant, no insincerity, no patronage in this man who could say, as, surely, they had never heard any one else say so strikingly before:

"I give my love to you. I greet you my brethren—I sympathize with you. I am of the people, I always will be of the people, as I always will be a boy. Tell me what it is that makes you look so sad?"

There was something in this that reminded these poor battered and beaten men of what they had heard so many times of One, who, nineteen hundred years ago, was so gladly heard of the common people.

Pastor Wagner did not need to be told that these men had sinned. The marks of the beast were upon them. The badges of servitude to the evil one were prominent on every hand. But the one great fact that seemed to burn itself into his very innermost consciousness was that they were suffering, they were down, they were away from home. Call them back! Tell them that God loves them!

WHEN visiting the Christian Herald offices during his sojourn in America, Pastor Wagner talked feelingly of his Paris work. "My purpose," he said, "was to present to my own people a clearer view of practical religion which all might understand and to bring to them a definite comprehension of the purpose for which we are placed in this world."

He felt that he had been specially called to do this work, and to become the advocate among all classes, rich and poor, of the nobler, more spiritual and less worldly manner of living.

"When I first began to preach this plain Gospel in Paris," he said, "it was in a small hall. Very few people would come to hear me; the rich were not interested and stayed away; the poor came, but they did not continue. Only the young and a few others were interested, so I preached in the mission largely to the children in those early years."

"Then the older people began to come in crowds, and they urged me to become their pastor; but I said, 'No, you are not serious enough yet. You are still too unsettled and you would not remain. I will preach to the young.' I kept them off for two years, and then they came to me again and urged me very earnestly to become their pastor, and I consented. By this time they came in crowds to listen to the plain doctrine I set before them—the doctrine of Jesus Christ, with no dogmatic theology or denominationalism whatsoever."

Pastor Wagner's Last Message

Pastor Wagner was invited by the National Committee on the Churches and the Moral Aims of the War to visit the United States and make a speaking tour, for the purpose of inspiring the churches to more effective patriotic efforts. His health prevented him from accepting this invitation, but he sent to the National Committee the following letter and asked that it be given to the American people.

DEAR FRIENDS OF AMERICA: The appeal I received from you echoed most directly and powerfully in my heart. My first impulse was to respond and to go and live a few months again with you, as I have often desired. But physical strength fails me. I must consider it somewhat as an order, dictated in these days by God's will, to remain here among my people of France, and try to recruit my vigor by greater moderation in my work.

This does not prevent my thoughts

Who are they who are proffering peace? They are the men who let loose war, believing they would surely conquer; who violated the treaties they themselves had signed, who ransacked unoffending countries, who pillaged and burned towns, who dealt ruthlessly with the civilians of the invaded countries. They are today hurling themselves upon all the lands they can reach as upon their prey. They will not repair any damage, they will not give back the fruits of their pillage, they are even prepared to take much more. But they need peace now in order to profit by their booty; they propose peace, at the same time threatening us with their most frightful weapons.

It is the shameful peace of surrender under threats, of connivance with evil-doers, a peace which means the forsaking of the oppressed, crimes unpunished, and the triumph of the lower instincts.

WE should remember, in our horror of bloodshed, of the awful turmoil of the battle, the great saying:

"Fear not him who kills the body; fear him who can destroy the soul."

Behold, this is what their peace will cost, and it is against such a peace that we ought to make war. Never has a more sacred duty rested with the men of any age. The whole treasure of our democratic and Christian convictions is in the balance. Iron fetters are ready to enchain Liberty in body and spirit. Peace under these conditions means acceptance of the Prussian military system in trade, industry, education, in the language we speak and the prayers we utter. Look at Poland, look at Alsace and Lorraine! Is it for this that the Pilgrim Fathers left everything? Is it for this that Washington and Lincoln fought the good fight? Is it for this future that American mothers wish to rear their sons? No, a thousand times no! With such a possibility hanging over us like a threatening cloud, no peace is possible. Every upright man ought to say:

"Here I stand; I cannot do otherwise; God help me!"

During the first months of this terrible war, a representative of American papers interviewed me and began thus:

"What do you think of this war, you man of The Simple Life? Haven't you in Europe gone mad?"

"A calm and quiet life," I replied, "is obviously a part of the program of the simple life, and we all here are committed in advance to that good-will toward our neighbor which is the first condition of mutual friendship. But I must ask you whether you know the life of William Tell, and particularly the soliloquy which Schiller put in his mouth in the sunken road of Kussnacht. What does the hero of independent Helvetia say: 'I live quiet and harmless.' Who taught him thoughts of vengeance and of death? The tyrant and the oppressor who scorned justice and liberty. This soliloquy of William Tell the whole civilized world is applying to Germany. It is not madness. It is wisdom. It is conscience. To go on leading a quiet life when iniquity is flooding the earth, is to become an accomplice of iniquity."

SINCE I had that talk, much time has passed; every day has seen the crimes increase; each day has made the men of peaceful nations realize that under present conditions they must leave everything and rush to arms. Christ's saying is the word of today: "He that hath no sword, let him sell his garment and buy one." All religious and moral motives unite to make us the defenders of right. There is neither excuse nor escape; the man of violence must be overthrown if we would again lead a quiet and free life. If we offer peace, he will be our master. Let this hour find us ready and strong, determined to follow the Chief who is marching ahead, and who did not die on Calvary to doom his disciples to bondage, but to bring them forth to liberty.

The Unfinished Task

A Decoration Day Sermon

By REV. A. EDWIN KEIGWIN, D.D.

TEXT—Col. 3: 11.

Dr. A. Edwin Keigwin, since 1905 pastor of the large and vigorous West End Presbyterian Church, New York City, is a son of the Manse. He was born in Iowa, educated at Lafayette College, Princeton University, and Union Theological Seminary, entered the ministry in 1895 and is the author of books, essays and sermons.

STANDING amidst the little green tents in which sleep our brave soldiers in mortuary bivouac, I am inspired by the thought that we are today fighting for the identical principles for which they contended—freedom and fraternal union. American history is consecutive. Epochs and events move forward with the orderly sequence of army units marching in review. Wherefore, in no better way can we honor the memory of the men of the sixties than by invoking the spirit of Abraham Lincoln, that in the new crisis which has come upon us we may be enabled to "carry on."

The closing hours of the Republican convention had arrived. Having been named for the United States Senate, Mr. Lincoln arose in all his gauntness and towering grandeur and began to speak.

"Gentlemen of the Convention: If we could first know where we are, and whither we are tending, we could better judge what to do and how to do it. In my opinion, a house divided against itself cannot stand. I believe that this government cannot endure permanently half slave and half free. I do not expect the Union to be dissolved; I do not expect the house to fall; I do not expect it will cease to be divided. It will become all one thing or all the other."

These few sentences give us the measure of the man and the measure of his vision. Clearly perceiving the inevitable ruin in which selfish views of state rights would involve the country, he dedicated his superb powers of heart and mind to a view of patriotism large enough to include all states and all races.

It was a remote prospect. Nevertheless, with utmost constancy he kept clearly before the people this vision and purpose. Again and again did time-serving politicians seek to dissuade him and turn him from his goal.

For instance, the evening of his memorable debate at Freeport (August 27, 1858), he announced that on the morrow he would throw down a challenge to Mr. Douglas and force him to declare himself upon this subject of state rights. He was counseled not to do so, it being foreseen that Douglas would make but one answer, and that answer would win him a senatorship. But Mr. Lincoln replied, "I am after much larger game. The battle of two years hence is worth a hundred battles like the present one." He believed that the very declaration which would win a senatorship for Douglas would bar his way to the presidency. And it did, for it hopelessly divided the Democratic party. It is not likely that Mr. Lincoln expected to be elected President two years later. But he expected to make the issue of the succeeding campaign the issue announced in his "house divided against itself" speech at the Springfield convention.

THEN came the Civil War with its high-water mark at Gettysburg. When the flood of affliction subsided, behold Abraham Lincoln again calling the people of the country to the standard he had upraised. In the words of the Gettysburg speech we perceive again his vision. "It is for us, the living, to be dedicated here to the unfinished work which they who fought have thus far so nobly advanced. It is for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us, that from these honored dead we take increased devotion to the cause for which they gave the last full measure of loyalty; that the nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom." "The house divided against itself" was still uppermost in his vision.

Fifty-three years have passed since the martyred President called the American people to that dedication, and it would seem we are as far from the goal as we were in the sixties. The questions of personal liberty and state rights are as vexed and embarrassing as they were in those days. Evidently the task to which Mr. Lincoln devoted his life remains unfinished. There are still divisions among us holding us back from the full enjoyment of the American ideal, "E Pluribus Unum." The melting-pot has altogether melted. But now that the roaring hot fire of extreme necessity is again burning beneath it let us hope that all our hearts shall be melted together and all dross ladled off. Oh, may the Nation, in this critical hour, indeed have the new birth of freedom, that "government of the people, by the people, and for the people, shall not perish from the earth."

In the present world crisis, America has moved forward to the standards planted by St. Paul. She has lost her former sense of selfish isolation in the larger vision, humanity, "where there cannot be Greek nor Jew, circumcision nor uncircumcision, barbarian, Scythian, bondman nor freeman; but Christ is all and in all." How much can be concentrated in a few words! The Bible is wonderful in this respect. The finest picture of a united house, a united nation, a united world, is found in these few words.

PLEASE notice the far-reaching significance of the union here spoken of. It is a union of nationalities; "where there cannot be Greek nor Jew." The Greek and the Jew represented a distinction and distinctiveness so radical that one would scarcely believe it possible they could be united. They differed in race, customs, tendencies, ideals and language. When society is united in a genuine brotherhood, there cannot be Jew nor Greek.

"Circumcision or uncircumcision." Here we have the antipodes of ritualistic distinction. This alludes to the divisions existing among men on account of religious training and ancestry. Over matters of religious form and ceremony battles have been fought, the map of the world has been changed, and inhumanities have been practiced in the name of righteousness. Bitter has been the strife over the meaning of sacraments, vows, forms, ceremonials. And yet we have in the picture before us a union so complete that there cannot longer be differences between the circumcision and the uncircumcision.

The Barbarian and the Scythian are included in the bonds of the perfect brotherhood. The Barbarian was the foreigner, the Scythian the savage. Refinement and lack of refinement are distinctions which will not obtrude when Lincoln's dream is fully realized. Finally, "there cannot be bondmen or freemen." That is to say, social and political distinctions are to be abolished. There is to be a leveling up, and not a leveling down.

What a magnificent picture of an ideal state of society! Is this not the very goal toward which the world is now moving? "The brotherhood of man." How much we hear about it. It is discussed in the forum and from the pulpit. The poetry, the music, the art, the literature of the age pulsate with Brotherhood! Brotherhood! Brotherhood! Or as President Wilson has expressed it, "the world made safe for democracy." Ah, friends, this was Lincoln's dream. It is my dream; I hope, your dream. But the task is unfinished. Fellow countrymen, I hold before you the vision of the completed task. Let it not be obscured by any cloud of temporary expedience. I would impress upon your minds the thought that Abraham Lincoln was a prophet of better days yet ahead of us, and that his spirit stands just yonder, within the shadow of world war, calling us to finish the undertaking in which he so nobly wrought.

Must you be reminded that this is a stupendous task—a task beyond human power to accomplish? Surely every thoughtful person will exclaim with one of old, "Who then is sufficient for these things?"

BUT in our text is given not only the scope of the ideal but the process by which it is to be attained. The foundation for such a union is a kindred animating spirit, a present and all-sufficient helper. "Christ is all and in all."

Easily within reach is the goal for which men have been struggling throughout the centuries. The Brotherhood we seek is even now at our very door. When we truly open our hearts to the Elder Brother, we shall find ourselves in the bosom of a vast family. Yea, and beneath every forbidding exterior the life-blood of the All-Father is pounding away louder than yonder guns. He who does not know it must indeed be dull of hearing or feeling.

Ponder the spectacle of wasted energy! With commendable passion and impatience have men striven to promote a civilization which shall include all mankind in its beneficence. Volumes have been written proposing short cuts to the fulfilment of the dream, the completion of the task; books on economics; books on sociology; books on law and ethics; books on theology and benevolence; books on militarism and world conquest. Behold the constantly increasing number of purely humanitarian organizations dedicated to this program. Organizations for relief, for prevention, for social service, for human betterment, for political reforms, for civic righteousness. The while Jesus is standing with outstretched hands, declaring that he it is who is the Light of the world; that he is the Saviour of men; that if we will but receive him, he will make us new creatures and the world a new world.

Angels weep that men should graze the gates of Paradise, and then drive on to destruction! Oh for more men with the spirit of Abraham Lincoln; their vision clear as to the ideal; their hearts sweetened by the very bitterness of life; their eyes made tender and cleansed of all misjudgment by tears of anguish, earnest yearning and human sympathy. Men of America, women of America, I call upon you to take up this task which our immortal President laid down. Take it up in pulpit, forum, Red Cross workroom and Y. M. C. A. Take it up on battlefield or in wheatfield. I call upon you to rally to the challenge of Gettysburg; to make yourselves worthy of the ancestry of which you boast; to pass on to succeeding generations a vision unclouded, an ideal undimmed.

"WHEN Christ shall be all in all," there will be no differences. There can be no "house divided against itself" where Jesus reigns supreme in the hearts of those who make up the household. So bring the world to Christ. Perhaps you think this an idle dream; but I for one, am fully persuaded that our hopes can be realized within a single generation; yea, less than that, if we will allow Christ to enter our hearts in reality, if we will preach him as the Saviour of the world. The mind is skeptical, but the heart believeth.

Those who have read "Helen's Babies" will recall a story which the uncle tells to his little nephew Budge. During the Civil War in America, two troops of horsemen approached each other, the one from the Federal and the other from the Confederate lines. Instantly aware of each other's presence, both made a charge. But a little fellow who had been picking blackberries in the woods, at the critical moment crossed the road, stumbled and fell between the advancing soldiers, and burst into tears. An officer cried, "Halt!" The bugles sounded. A soldier dismounted, and, picking up the boy, endeavored to comfort him. Then a soldier from the other side came forward to lend a hand. Others gathered around the crying child. And they never fought the battle; for, said they, "We did not feel like fighting just then." I am not prepared to say that this is authentic history. But it is a perfect picture of human nature. Instincts have been awakened in every breast by the present pentecost of suffering, which indicate how ready we are to bury animosities and become brethren.

A recent instance is narrated by Lieutenant Conigsby Dawson. During one fierce engagement, a British officer saw a German officer impaled on the barbed wire, writhing in anguish. The fire was dreadful, yet he still hung there unscathed. At length the British officer could stand it no longer. He said quietly, "I can't bear to look at that poor chap any longer." So he went out under the hail of shell, released him, took him on his shoulders and carried him to the German trench. The firing ceased. Both sides watched the act with wonder. Then the commander of the German trench came forward, took from his own bosom the Iron Cross, and pinned it on the breast of the British officer. For the moment they were one.

THE march of events is toward Lincoln's ideal. The world is moving upward and onward. America is moving outward and forward. In some respects we are setting the pace. Certainly we are proving theories. Our cities are the world's laboratories, where experiments are tried and hopes demonstrated. When Europe declares cooperation and good-will unworkable among people of differing race and creed who live at close quarters, we point to New York, wherein there are more Irish than in Belfast, Dublin or Cork; more Germans than in Leipzig or Frankfurt; more Italians than in Rome; more Jews than the entire population of Maine. It has been estimated that if the land in Greater New York were allotted equally and every inhabitant called upon to stand in the center of his own little plot, there would be less than fifteen feet between any one and his neighbor. There's proximity for you! And yet we manage to dwell to-

The Joy of the Lord

SUNDAY, June 2. John 15 : 11. "That my joy might be in you, and that your joy might be full." It is an extraordinary thing that our Lord should speak of his joy in the dark season through which he was passing. The circumstances were most oppressive. Antagonisms were blazing with fiercest enmity. Hatreds had deepened into black passions of the midnight. Malicious nets were being woven around him. Calvary was only a stone's throw away, and on the morrow the grim cross would be on the hill! It was a very wilderness of stern surroundings. And yet the Master quietly spoke about his joy, an inward joy which these outer things could not disturb. His joy was like a well in the inner keep of a castle when all the streams of the countryside are locked in the bondage of frost. It was like the light and the fire in a cottage, quietly shining and burning while the tempest rages outside. It was a joy that was victorious over the unfriendly world.

And this inner joy has always been one of the distinctions of the triumphant saints. They have been self-possessed in the tumult. They have been radiant in the night. They have been hopefully quiet even when terrible things have shown their faces at the door. They have revealed a cheery mastery of rough and brutal circumstances. The privileged readers of "Men of the Knotted Heart" will remember that Grant was once at Ayr Station, and there was a little lad running up and down the platform, skipping and singing. A man was sweeping out the waiting-rooms, doing the most menial work about the place, and wanting an arm, and most ill-thriven looking. Grant said to him, "How much would it take to set you dancing and singing like that boy?" "No much, sir," he said, "for I'm singing inside me a' the time." And taking off his cap he lifted his face to the sky above. "Ay, sir," he said, "just that! In God's house for evermore my dwelling place shall be!" That is the victory of the saint—the inner joy which rises above the painful and crippling antagonisms of the world.

And what is this joy? It is much more than high spirits. High spirits often fail in the crisis. And it is much more than a happy temperament. Happy temperaments can be blown out like candles on a gusty night.

This joy arises from the deep secrets of spiritual satisfaction. It is the sense of health and wholeness when the soul lives and breathes in its native air. It is fellowship with the eternal springs. It is the assurance of allrightness in our relations with the eternal God. One gropes for all sorts of analogies to express the wealthy fact. It is the joy of the wedded union between the soul and the Lord. It is the interpassage of covenant love. It is the interchange of sacred confidences. The soul has come to herself, and she has found herself in God, and all her springs are in him! "Have you water all the year round?" I said to a friend who had built a house in a somewhat droughty place. "Yes," he answered, "our wells are very deep!" And "there is a river the streams whereof shall make glad the city of God!" "Therefore will not we fear, though the mountains be shaken in the hearts of the seas!" J. H. J.

Pilate's Question

MONDAY, June 3. John 18 : 38. "Pilate saith unto him, What is truth?" Pilate asked a noble question, but he did not wait for an answer. What is truth? In mathematics truth is simply the correct statement of relations. A truth of chemistry involves not only relationships but quantities. In history a truth is a verified fact. In philosophy truth is correspondence between our thought and the terms in which we describe it. In art truth is the correct representation of what is within view. And there is a still higher sense of truth. There is truth in life, vital truth. This truth is not a matter of mere statement, of representation. It is largely a matter of correct adjustment of persons to persons, or, let us say, of personality to personality, including the Absolute Personality called God. This is the higher sense of truth, the sense in which Jesus used the term when he said, "I am the Truth."

What is the truth about God? How simple and how satisfying is the answer when we remember a favorite apostolic phrase, "the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ." Christ tells us what God thinks of us, what God wants of us, what God expects to make of us. How the future stretches out before us in brave, fair lines when we see ourselves in the thought of God as God is interpreted to us in the consciousness and experience of Christ. It demands nothing less than the truth as it is in Jesus to deliver us from anxiety about what may lie beyond. With perfect confidence we confront the misgivings of our souls with the assurances of Christ.

The Fatherhood

TUESDAY, June 4. Eph. 3 : 14, 15. "I bow my knees unto the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, of whom the whole family in heaven and earth is named." The fatherhood of God was a very precious thought to the apostle Paul. His writings abound in references to this relation of God to man. In this text this favorite theme of his enters into his prayerful meditations. With the familiar address of Father, however, he unites the profoundest reverence: he accords his Father in heaven the homage of adoration.

The fatherhood of God, as the apostle views it, centers in the person and mediatorship of Jesus Christ. He that honoreth not the Son, honoreth not the Father that sent him. Those who refuse to accept the atoning sacrifice which Jesus rendered for them and the advocacy which he has promised men in their dealings with God, cannot claim the privilege of addressing God as their Father. On the other hand, those who have accepted Christ, when calling upon the Father in heaven, are speaking from the bosom of a vast and remarkable family, part of which is already in heaven, while the other part is still on earth. They give to God here below the same title which he receives from the saints in glory. There is a part of God's great family already safely arrived at their Father's home: they are removed from all trouble and anxiety; they have no wants; their prayers are all praises and glorifications of the mercy that adopted them for the inheritance of the saints in light. But a part of the family is still away from home: it is out in the cold and wind of this earth, plodding faithfully along rugged paths to the place where they really belong, their Father's house. They know that the Father who has brought so many of his sons and daughters home already out of the stress and storm of this life will also see them safely home.

Children's Day

WEDNESDAY, June 5. Eph. 6 : 1, 3. "Children, obey your parents in the Lord, . . . that it may be well with thee." If we have All Saints' Day, why not have a day for the saints that are to be, who number about eighteen millions in the population of our country? Children's Day will help decide what all the future days of the Church and State will become. What a vast army for conquest in the battle for truth and righteousness is marching under the flag of the Cross of the Sunday school and the nation! Here our liberties are to be won or lost. Christian education to rise or fall. Greater than the battle of Thermopylae is the peaceful fight for closed saloons, brothels and gambling dens, for an open Bible, a free church, free schools and free people.

The multitude of little folks are delighted to have a festival of flowers, birds, songs and services all for themselves. It is also a great day for the parents and friends of the children and young people; they are pleased that the church takes such an interest in the youth of the land. They listen with pleasure to recitations, choruses, music and the words from the speaker about educational duties and privileges. Then the offering for the great cause of education closes the delightful exercises.

The light of education and the Light of the World shine more clearly after the brilliant scenes of Children's Day. The bright and beautiful flowers are a symbol of childhood in their purity, beauty and fragrance. Their cheery blooms are like the bright smiles and winsome looks of these living flowers of the home. Flowers are called "the angels of earth," wooing young people to the higher life, as they follow Him who is called the Rose of Sharon and the Lily of the Valley. Parents, looking the way the pattering feet are treading, will follow Him who is the Way, the Truth and the Life.

God's Beseechings

THURSDAY, June 6. II Cor. 5 : 20. "As though God did beseech you by us." A wilful boy came home late at night and tried to creep silently up to his room. At the top of the stairway was his mother's room, and her door was slightly ajar. Through it he heard her voice in prayer and heard his name. He could not help listening. Her voice was choked with tears, yet eloquent with love. For the first time in his life the boy clearly saw and felt the tenderness of his mother's affection. He went to his own room, fell upon his knees, and vowed a vow—which has not yet been broken—to serve his mother's God. Another such a boy, whose father was a minister, had resisted all entreaties to enter the Christian life. One Sunday evening he attended an after-service. His father stood within the altar railing, and called inquirers to come forward and kneel at the chancel. They came, singly, by twos, in groups, till the altar was crowded. The minister's son, however, did not come, and the service was ending. The pastor stretched out his arms toward the congregation, simply repeating the Saviour's message "I beseech you, come, come, come." At last the stubborn heart yielded, and the boy knelt almost at his father's feet. Afterward the father said, "As I stood there pleading, I felt that my heart would break if my boy did not come." Some mysterious intuition must have told the boy that such was the case. He said, "I was afraid father would drop dead if I did not come, but I suppose Christ was just as anxious that I should come." Indeed Christ was! The accents of beseeching broke down the last barrier between that boy and his father's God. God has a right to command, and he does command. But he also entreats. Indeed, his entreaties are much more numerous than his threatenings, his warnings, or his commandments.

Abba, Father

FRIDAY, June 7. Gal. 4 : 6. "Because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father." The opening glory of the Lord's Prayer is the title by which it teaches us to address the Deity. Not by any name that is derived from one of his transcendent attributes, his stupendous acts, or his inscrutable essence; not as the Infinite, the Eternal, the Almighty, the Supreme Potentate, are we to address him, but by that easy and endearing name which was among the first words that we were taught to lip in childhood, Father. This very title is an encouragement; it makes access to our God easy and pleasant. What child is afraid to speak to his father? The title "Father" with which we address God also rouses confidence that our prayer will be accepted and heard. If a child trusts any person to fulfil his wish, that person is father.

Now this text in Galatians says that when a Christian addresses God as his Father, he does so not only by a choice which faith in God has suggested to him, not only because the Lord Jesus selected this name for our addresses to God in the prayer which he taught his disciples, but because the spirit of God which has been sent into the hearts of God's children thus cries to God in them and through them. The Spirit which is bestowed upon believers is, among other things, a spirit of prayer; he incites unto prayer. But he also molds the prayers of believers. Oftentimes they do not know how to shape their prayers; he supplies the thoughts and the words, oftentimes the groanings and sighings, to the believer's heart. Above all, the Spirit keeps the believers in constant and lively remembrance of their filial relation to the great and sublime God, whom puny and sinful man might otherwise be afraid to approach. He reminds them again and again that as believers in God's Son they are Christ's brothers, for the Saviour himself has called them thus. Relying on their great Brother's work of reconciliation and intercession they are to come with the simplicity of their childhood days and with that beautiful trust which characterizes children's prayers before the Lord God Omnipotent, and say: "Abba, Father!"

Worship in Song

SATURDAY, June 8. Ps. 100 : 2. "Come before his presence with singing." It is said that Ibsen, Hall Caine and Maeterlinck are fatalists, writing of despair, of the iron chain, saying, "What is, must be"; and their music is called a Dead March in front of a jail, always sounding the wailing notes of misery. The great masters of sacred melody sing the lofty notes, "Unto him who is God over all and blessed forever more." Praiseful hearts find their highest flights of worship in holy song. Emerson said, "Only so much do I know as I have lived." May we not add, only so far as we have sung have we risen toward God. Faith and prayer mount up on the wings of sacred melody. Bible truths in the soul blossom into music long before the saint joins the heavenly choir.

When Bishop Melville was dying, he said, "Sing 'Just as I am, without one plea.' " When that was sung, he called for the Methodist hymn "Jesus, Lover of my Soul." Then, with expiring breath, he gasped, "Sing 'Rock of Ages, Cleft for Me,' " and on the notes of that universal hymn of all Christendom he made his heavenly flight. Music charmed him last on earth and welcomed him first in glory.

Uplifted Hands

IT was peculiarly appropriate that Decoration Day should have been chosen by the President for national observance as a day of public fasting and humiliation, and of prayer for the victory of our armies who are fighting for the cause of righteousness in the war. The most beautiful of all our celebrations will thus be made doubly impressive. Its sunrise will call the nation to its knees; its passing hours will be filled with tender memories of the heroes who "passed over" in former wars, and of those who within the last few fateful months have been laid to rest under the skies of France and Belgium, or in the depths of the ocean. Our sorrow over their loss is still poignant. All will be honored, and the generations of heroic dead will be kept fresh and green in our memories.

It is appropriate also that America, as a Christian nation, should hold up the praying hands of its Executive. While Aaron and Hur held up the hands of Moses in imploration during the critical struggle with the hosts of Amalek, the battle went well with Israel.

Elisha showed to his timorous servant the heavenly armies ready for the divine command to answer the call of faith.

Washington learned by experience the great truth that prayer is the mightiest weapon in the Christian's armory. Lincoln has recorded how, after a national day of fasting, humiliation and prayer, seemingly unsurmountable difficulties disappeared, all went well in the war, and the righteous end sought was finally attained.

Prayers that seek not selfish aims but the highest good; prayers that are earnest and importunate prevail because they are in harmony with the divine will, which ever places the spiritual and moral above the material things of this world. Such prayers are a challenge to the faithfulness of Him who has promised to hear and answer.

We are in this war for what we in our hearts believe to be righteous and just, and if we put aside all selfish desires and confess our shortcomings as a people, as communities, and as individuals, and implore divine forgiveness and guidance, we have the right before God to ask him to give victory to our armies. We need to humble ourselves and to repent and to take a new hold on God and his promises. How often we have in the past neglected our opportunities to acknowledge his sovereignty in the affairs of public and individual life! We also need to acknowledge Jesus Christ as the Saviour of the world and as its rightful King; and in his name we may make our petitions with unshaken confidence—and go forward!

Such will be the crowning grace of this Decoration Day which we now commemorate. And may the Hearer and Answerer of prayer send an answer so rich and full, to mark the spiritual cleansing and restoration of our nation, that we may say with Israel of old: "Happy is that people whose God is the Lord."

The Nation's Increasing Revenue

THE huge needs of the War Department and the realization now that possibly $33,500,000,000 may be required for the next fiscal year, will have to be met, it is said, by new tax legislation increasing rates in many fields.

Of course, the news from Washington that increased income and profits taxes are impending is not pleasant, but it will cause neither anger nor dismay among the American people. This country went into the war coolly, deliberately, with its eyes open. It went in knowing that war would cost fabulous amounts in money and would involve sacrifices beside which money is as dross.

It went in prepared to give in both species without stint: in blood and in gold. It is calmly acquiescing in the legislation proposed by the War Department to call out two or three millions more from the young manhood of the country. Assuredly it will not balk or blench at a new draft upon its material wealth.

Of the $3,000,000,000 which the Federal Government expects to derive this year from internal revenue sources, John D. Rockefeller will contribute about $38,400,000. Henry C. Frick will pay the next largest income tax, $11,600,000. The twenty-nine wealthiest persons after Mr. Rockefeller will pay a total income tax of $86,100,000.

In England the tax on an income of $2,000 is 7½ per cent.; in America nothing for a married man or head of a family and 2 per cent. on $1,000 for unmarried men. The English income tax rate also increases more rapidly with the growth of the income than ours, a $3,000 income being taxed at 14 per cent., $5,000 at 16 per cent., $10,000 at 20 per cent. and $15,000 at 25 per cent., while our corresponding taxes are respectively two-thirds of 1 per cent., 1½ per cent., 3½ per cent. and 5 per cent.

Wealth must and will bear its full share of the cost of war, but capital must have a chance to produce new wealth as we go along. Conscription of wealth must not take the form of confiscation, or the government's chief source of revenue and market for bonds will be dried up. The Treasury Department understands this, but too many talk loosely about this being a rich man's war and a poor man's fight. It would be possible to tax accumulated wealth so heavily in one year as to leave little for subsequent levies. The wealth with which to win the war must be created year by year. To do otherwise would be a case of grinding the seed corn. During our Civil War the Confederate States fought for years without money or credit, but they continued to produce enough real wealth to sustain their armies, in spite of terrible handicaps. Rich and resourceful as America is today, we must produce what we require from year to year, and this is true of financial resources as well as of wheat.

Charles Wagner

MANY Americans will recall the visit of Charles Wagner, the gentle-souled mission pastor of Paris, to this country some fourteen years ago. This recollection will be the more vivid because of his recent death, after a painful illness brought on by his heroic work in the charities of the war. For many years there has been a cordial friendship between Pastor Wagner and the readers of this journal. His matchless sermons have frequently been preached through these pages.

He visited the Bowery Mission and gave a message of cheer and consolation to those unfortunates who had lagged in the race of life and fallen by the wayside. His kindness, his rare gift of eloquence, and the charm of a genial personality were impressed upon all who met him. Listening to his talk, one could understand something of the sweet spirit of the man who delighted the thinking world with his book, "The Simple Life," which has reached the dignity of a popular classic.

Charles Wagner was more than a theorist. His whole career is the story of service for others. He spent himself physically in his labors for the poor. His Christlike ministries of mercy and helpfulness pervaded Paris like a spiritual fragrance. There were many hidden away in homes of suffering, too proud to make their wants known to the public, who depended upon his secret generosity for the very bread they ate. As chairman of the Christian Herald Relief Fund, he succored the widows and orphans and brought the sunshine of hope into many a bereaved household.

Shortly before his death he sent through the National Committee of Churches a message to the American people, warning them against the slavery that surely awaited those nations who yielded to the powers that are fighting desperately for world domination. He pointed to the fate of Belgium, Poland and Russia, and of Alsace and Lorraine. "To go on leading a quiet life, when iniquity is flooding the earth," he urged, "is to become an accomplice of iniquity. All religious and moral motives unite to make us the defenders of right. The world will be ruled by men without conscience if conscientious men are not ready to support the right by armed force. They understand the only way to save the liberty of the world is to say to violence, 'Halt!' . . . Let this hour find us ready and strong, determined to follow the Divine Chief who is marching ahead, and who did not die on Calvary to doom his disciples to bondage, but to bring them forth to liberty."

These words breathe the patriotic spirit of the man who long ago shook the dust of his native Alsace from his feet, that he might not become a slave and a "spiritual gendarme" of the Kaiser.

"We're in It to Win It"

THE above ringing slogan, recurring again and again in War Secretary Baker's stirring public speeches, has become a national shibboleth. Another of Secretary Baker's inspiring phrases, "Frontiers of Freedom," is adopted as the title of a collection of his speeches just published.

In almost all his speeches Mr. Baker has spoken of the principles for which we fight, of democracy at home and abroad, of the heroic dignity of our cause, and of our disdain to conquest.

Mr. Baker's book contains utterances of a fighter. He used to be a pacifist. But in the book he shows that when he talks about peace he means a victorious peace.

"I do not love war," he said at Cleveland. "I do not enjoy the idea of war; and yet there are some things dearer than life. Our fathers fought from 1776 to 1783 to establish freedom. Would we call back the Continental Army? Would we send Lafayette back to France—and Rochambeau? Would we take Washington's sword out of his hand and break it over our knee and say: 'Don't do that. We would rather live forever slaves to a tyrannous government than have a fight about it?' Would we call back any of the true wars that have been fought for principle and for the establishment of right in this world? No!"

In addressing the City Club of Boston, he said: "When we are thoughtless about it, we think of this war as being fought in France. Why, it is being fought in Boston, it is being fought in Cleveland, it is being fought in Seattle, and in Waco, Texas. We think of it as being fought by these army officers and the men in uniform in the other countries. It is being fought by you. . . . It calls on each of us to do our utmost in order that it may be successfully and speedily brought to an end."

The great War Secretary is doubly gifted. He has upon his hands the heaviest material task that ever devolved upon any man, and he is proving equal to it; while in the erudition and eloquence of his many notable speeches he presents with signal clarity the high spiritual and moral principles and impulses that have impelled us into the war and will keep us in it until we win it.

A Book You Ought to Read

THE Conference on Bible Prophecy—the most important gathering of its kind ever held in this country—is now in session in Philadelphia. Its sittings will last three days, and during that time, practically all the leaders eminent in the study of prophecy will be heard on the platform.

We are privileged to announce that, by arrangement with the Executive Committee, the proceedings of the Conference, including the addresses, will be published in an authorized volume by the Christian Herald as soon as possible after adjournment. This arrangement is exclusive. Due announcement will be made of the terms, etc., on which the book will be supplied to readers of this journal and to all who are interested in the study of the prophetic Scriptures. We anticipate a large demand for this book, which will be one of unusual interest to Bible lovers everywhere, and more especially to those who are watching world developments in these latter days, which are impressing all thoughtful minds as being times of prophetic fulfillment.

In the Conference, practically all the denominations will be represented among the speakers, including Dr. C. I. Scofield, editor of the Scofield Reference Bible; Dr. James M. Gray of the Moody Bible Institute; Dr. Cortland Myers, Pastor of Tremont Baptist Temple, Boston; Dr. Mark Matthews of the First Presbyterian Church, Seattle, ex-Moderator of the General Assembly; and a number of others equally distinguished as authorities on prophetic interpretation.

When Our Heroes Return

WE were talking with a boy in khaki, the other day.

"I wonder," he asked suddenly, "whether there'll be any good positions waiting for us when we come back from the war? Do you suppose that folk will forget about us while we're Over There? Do you think that those who stay at home will fit into all the business openings, and that we'll get left? A good many of the boys that I know are worrying about the same thing."

The man who gives up a good position to answer the call of his country has small cause to worry. True, he may find the position that he has left filled on his return by another man; but he will come back so much bigger and better, so much broader in experience and so much more worth while in every way, that he will be fitted for a better and more responsible position in the world than he has ever before been able to occupy.

And that position will be waiting for him! Because the heads of business houses will be looking for men who have been tested and have stood their test well. They will realize that a man who has bravely met machine-gun fire can meet any emergency without flinching.

No, the boy who has left his work to go to war need not worry. The controllers of a nation's business will not be slow to recognize those who have made the nation secure.

Prophecy Changing the Map of Europe

By REV. JAMES M. GRAY, D.D., Dean of the Moody Bible Institute of Chicago

I
OUR last article dealt with the question, "Why Germany Can Not Rule the World," the evidence and the argument for which was drawn from the prophecy in the second chapter of Daniel.

Briefly summarized, we saw that during "the times of the Gentiles" God has committed the control of the world into the hands of particular nations, of which Germany is not one.

"The times of the Gentiles" commenced at about 600 B. C., and will continue until the second coming of Christ to set up his kingdom in the earth. The year 600 B. C. was the time when, in punishment for her transgressions, God withdrew the power to govern from Israel, to be restored again to her through purifying judgments, when Christ comes.

The particular nations to which the government of the earth was committed were represented in the colossal image of the man which Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, saw in a dream, and which the divinely inspired prophet interpreted for him and for us. They were, in their order, the kingdom of Babylon, and the empires of Persia, Greece and Rome. We quoted Benjamin Wills Newton to the effect that "the sovereign controlling power of earth which was first vested in Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, next in Cyrus of Persia, afterward in Alexander of Greece, descended at last to the emperors of Rome; and within the territory once ruled by them that sovereign power resides, and there its home will be until the Gentile Image comes to an end and forgiven Jerusalem becomes 'the city of the great King.'"

Now the point is, as we then said, that Germany, except the southwestern corner of her land, was not represented in that image; in other words, she never became a part of the Roman Empire in the Scriptural significance of that term, and hence the improbability, if not impossibility, that she should be finally and permanently victorious over those nations which are so represented.

II

IT remains to prove this by indicating the countries that fell within the Roman Empire; and this in turn raises the question as to what period of the Roman Empire is in mind? This last is met by the consideration that "prophecy relating to Gentile dominion is always focused upon the Jews and Palestine, and has especially in view the presence of the nation in her own land." Now, it is well known that shortly after the overthrow of the Jews by the Romans A. D. 70, their national recognition as possessors of the land ceased, a period which broadly corresponds to the close of the apostolic era. This is approximately Trajan's period (56-117 A. D.), under whom the empire extended its boundaries to the farthest limit on the east. The dying Augustus hoped it might never be extended beyond the Euphrates, but Trajan's ambition led to a victorious conflict with the Parthians by which there were permanently added to his territory, Armenia, Assyria and Mesopotamia. Defining the nations in detail, therefore, (1) those in the northwest included Great Britain, that is to say, England and Scotland as far north as the Grampian Hills. Ireland was never brought under the civilizing Roman power, which may explain her unceasing restlessness in all the years.

(2) As to the west, Gibbon is authority for the statement that the old Roman wall left the Rhine near Bingen and joined the Danube near Ratisbon. The Romans possessed everything west of this, including Portugal, Spain, France, Belgium, Switzerland, and, as stated above, the southwest corner of Germany, the lobe of the ear so to speak, which includes Luxemburg, Baden and Bavaria south of the Danube, as well as the much-disputed and contested region of Alsace and Lorraine, which will be referred to again.

(3) In the south and southeast, the Romans possessed Italy, Greece, the islands of the Mediterranean, and the Archipelago and all the territory south of the Danube. This last includes what we know as European Turkey, Bulgaria, Servia, Montenegro, and all the Austrian dominions south and west of the Danube. To this Trajan added the province of Dacia north of the Danube and to the east of Hungary, or what we know as Rumania. The central part of Hungary was never brought within the Roman Empire.

(4) In Asia the Black Sea was the northern boundary, which thence extended along a southeasterly line to the Persian Gulf, taking in Asiatic Turkey, the Bible names for which are Asia Minor, Syria, Mesopotamia, and Palestine, and, as mentioned above, Armenia.

(5) In Africa Rome possessed a portion of Egypt and the northern coast, identified by moderns as Tripoli, Tunis, Algeria and the upper part of Morocco.

To quote Newton again, "these are the countries which fall within the boundaries of the Gentile Image, and which, from the earliest period until now, have ever been the center of all that has influenced human life. The light of revelation first given to Israel, and then to the Christian Church, was set within these countries. All the civilization of antiquity was centered there, where still resides the power which at this moment is forming the character of the world. The responsibilities of these nations are unequalled."

III

LET us now consider what realignment of the nations may be necessary in order to the fulfillment of Daniel's prophecy that those of the Roman Empire are to resume their distinctness and corporate relation to each other at the end of the age.

1. It is obvious that all those countries external to the Roman limits that now exercise authority over countries within those limits will be obliged to relinquish such authority. Newton illustrates this by the case of Belgium and Holland. The former at one time was subjected to the latter, but the latter was obliged to relinquish this authority. Political reasons made it necessary, of course, but there was a divine reason back of these, namely that Belgium was part of the Gentile Image and Holland was not. Belgium was originally in the Roman Empire, but Holland never was.

This need not carry with it, however, the corollary that countries now or hereafter to be connected with or allied to the nations of the Roman Empire, and which were not so connected or allied at the time mentioned, are necessarily to be given up. For example, Great Britain need not be required to lop off the Scottish highlands, nor even to lose Ireland.

2. On the other hand, we may expect Germany to be deprived of her possessions west of the Rhine and south of the Danube. In other words, if Gibbon is to be relied upon as to the Roman wall, this means the loss of Luxemburg and Baden, and part of Bavaria, and Alsace and Lorraine.

3. By the same token there must be a radical break in the Austro-Hungarian empire, for, as Gibbon says, "If we except Bohemia, Moravia, the northern skirts of Austria, and a part of Hungary between the Theiss and the Danube, all the dominions of the house of Austria were comprised within the limits of the Roman Empire." We need not be surprised, therefore, if Hungary becomes divorced from Austria, and the latter severs her alliance with the German Empire. And when that division comes, if not before, we may expect Italy to retrieve all the territory that rightly belongs to her.

4. As to the nations farther south and east, there can be little doubt that Bulgaria will withdraw her loyalty from Germany, and that Rumania will be enabled to break the chains now binding her to the same empire on the one hand and to Russia on the other.

5. Palestine will not return to the Turk, and Armenia at last will be delivered from the awful bondage of the same tyrant.

IV

WE had pursued our study of the map to this point, when there was freshly brought to our attention a recent volume, "The Roman Empire in Prophecy," by W. E. Vine, M.A., an English Bible student, collaborator with Dr. Hogg in a valuable commentary on Paul's Epistles to the Thessalonians. His work on the Roman Empire was the outcome of conversations with inquirers since the outbreak of the war, in which he drew upon the study he had given to the subject for over twenty years.

He raises the question as to whether Germany is to be considered a part of the Roman Empire because of the conquest and rule of Charlemagne in the eighth century, but apparently dismisses it in favor of the principle of interpretation spoken of above; namely, that within the meaning of the prophecy, the Roman Empire stands for its limits at the close of the first century of the Christian era. With this principle in mind, he notices "certain circumstances of past and present history suggestive of future issues," from which, even at the risk of some repetition, it is interesting to quote, because of its corroboration of the above:

1. Commencing with north Africa, the author observes that practically the same strip of territory which belonged to the Roman Empire in the times of the apostles has passed directly under the government of countries which were themselves then within the empire; and no country then outside the empire has been permitted to annex that territory since the Saracens and Turks were dispossessed of it.

2. Passing to Asia, the present war has already dispossessed Turkey of Mesopotamia, and most of Armenia and Palestine, and brought them under the control of Great Britain, a country of the Roman Empire.

3. As to Greece, it obtained its ancient province of Macedonia as an outcome of the Balkan War of 1912, and today its boundaries are approximately what they were in the Roman Empire.

4. The dual monarchy of Austria-Hungary was partly within and partly without the Roman Empire. What are now Hungary, Transylvania, and Bessarabia were without, while Pannonia or Austria west of the Danube was within. Even when, in a later century Dacia (now Transylvania, Bessarabia, etc.) was annexed, the two parts of the present dual kingdom were separate. And we all know, as Mr. Vine says, that "the separation of the two parts has been a practical question of European politics for some time, and may be hastened by present events."

5. "The northern and northeastern boundaries of Italy embraced the Trentino and the peninsula of Istria. Noticeable, therefore, are the present efforts of Italy to acquire these very districts, efforts which are likely to achieve success.

6. "Roman states north of Italy covered what are now Baden, Württemberg, Luxemburg and a large part of Bavaria, the possibility of an eventual severance of which from Prussian domination has been much discussed of late.

7. "The Rhenish provinces of Alsace and Lorraine, originally part of the Roman province of Gallia (now France) were snatched from that country by Germany in the Franco-Prussian war of 1870-71. Their recovery is a supreme object of the efforts of the French in the present war."

Our author speaks in an equally interesting manner of England and her colonies, and also of the United States, should the latter continue in alliance with her, but space will not permit further attention to the subject at this time. He would be understood as speaking not dogmatically, but by way of suggestion only, and yet that the Scripture will be absolutely fulfilled he has no doubt, though the exact mode of its accomplishment is known only to God.

Fighting a Common Foe

By REV. CHARLES STELZLE

CHRISTIANITY is largely responsible for the social unrest which characterizes the present generation. For centuries it has been presenting to men the high ideals which are resulting in nobler aspirations. The people have responded to the appeal made in the name of its Founder, and we dare not now repudiate the resultant demands which have become so insistent.

Christianity has been teaching the value of the individual. The practical application of that teaching is found incarnated in the labor union's insistence upon the right of every man, woman and child to live the life which God intended should be lived by them.

Because of the Church's teaching it must stand by the workingman in his fight for the child. It must fearlessly support him in his endeavor to relieve the almost unendurable condition of the woman who toils.

Because of its repeated messages in respect to cleanliness it must champion the workers in their struggles to secure for themselves better sanitary conditions in the home and in the shop. It must fire volley after volley into the sweatshop and into everybody and everything that supports it, until the thing is absolutely wiped out of existence. Because of its well-known teaching it should give no peace until the workers have the fullest opportunity for developing the highest type of manhood and of citizenship. If only one life were involved, all this would be demanded. But there are millions in whose behalf the fight must be made.

So let us get together—the Church and Labor—in the name of our common Leader, to put to rout every foe of the higher life, whether that foe be found in ourselves, whether he be in our own ranks, or whether he be an outsider who is dominated by the greed for gold.

Just how this shall be done must depend upon local conditions. I have no panacea. I am an opportunist. I believe in getting all that I can as soon as I can. Therefore, without elaborating a cocksure scheme, I would mention some everyday principles which are fundamental.

Be definite in your demands. If you yourself do not know what you are after, you must not expect others to know it.

Be consistent. If you believe in relieving sweatshop conditions and if you would abolish Sunday labor, beware of adding to the burdens of those whom you profess to be trying to relieve.

Be patient. There is no short cut to the millennium. Rome was not built in a day. You will not correct all of the evils of your generation, but your reasonable, definite, consistent campaign will surely bring some things to pass.

WHEN Alfredo Del Rosso went away to fight the Austrians, he carried with him two precious things—a leather-bound Bible, well worn, gray with use and marked in hundreds of places in pencil, and his mother's picture. Both of these were so precious that he had wrapped them up in a piece of brown oilcloth and packed them away in the very bottom of his knapsack, that they might not be injured by rain.

On the day in June when, with his regiment, he marched through the Roman streets, crowded with people who cheered enthusiastically, waving handkerchiefs and shouting: "Long live Italy! Long live our brave soldiers!" an old woman kept step with him; she forced her way through the closely-ranked men and women. Every few moments her dim eyes sought out her boy, who, with face set rigidly toward his officer, with lips tightly pressed together, as if sheer will-power prevented him from showing the emotion he felt, stepped steadily forward. The mother's tired eyes, weary with tears shed at dead of night, when none but God could see her grief, had a gleam of pride in them at sight of her only remaining son, tall, stalwart, brown, with clear, honest eyes that looked straight at one when he talked.

Alfredo was one of four sons whom she was giving to her country at the call of the king. The other three had gone a month before. They were older, and had been put on duty before war was declared. And now Alfredo must go, too! The mother drew her breath in with a deep, hissing sigh.

UP by the station there were more people, but only the mothers, sisters, and sweethearts were allowed, with other near relatives of the officers and soldiers leaving for the front, to enter and wait upon the platform till the train moved out, carrying the men they loved so dearly. War is an awful thing, a great hungry monster that devours the youth of a country, but no one can ever forget the thrill of pride and cheerfulness attendant upon the departure of a train-load of soldiers. The enthusiasm keeps one from seeing disaster ahead. They are so brave, so handsome!

Signora Del Rosso went into the station with hundreds of others. The soldiers fell out of line, scrambled into the third-class carriages, hot with standing in the June sunshine all day. On the wooden seats, some one had placed quantities of flowers, roses, lilies, carnations, those lovely blossoms which are so plentiful in Rome at this season. The soiled old wood of the railway carriage was hidden under the gay flowers. The odors were sweet and fresh. Perhaps the soldiers liked their beauty more than they did the packages of chocolate and biscuits which ladies were distributing to them.

Alfredo cast his knapsack down in a corner, and picking out a wonderfully beautiful tea-rose with delicate pink-petaled heart, he stepped out upon the platform. It was not to one of the fresh-faced, bright-eyed girls that he gave the rose, but to an old woman with browned, tough skin, and bent back, and hands that trembled as they crept into his warm young grasp. Her baby, Alfredo, was going to the war! Perhaps she was not so old as she looked. Hard work, and bearing heavy burdens, with little bread to eat and few pleasures, make a woman grow old. One thing about her, however, was ever young, and that was the love-light in her faded eyes.

The young soldier put his arm tenderly around her, and looked down at her—the little mother. Something warm ran down his cheek and fell upon hers.

The Little Old Book

By FELICIA BUTTZ CLARK

"Keep the rose to remember me by, mamma," he said, trying to smile. One does not say what lies deep in one's heart at such moments as this.

"I will, caro figlio—until thou comest back."

"Yes. Until I come back," he murmured.

"Thou hast the Book, dear?"

"In my knapsack, with thy picture."

"And thou wilt read it?"

"Every day, mamma. I shall not forget it—nor thee."

The bell rang and the word of command sounded. A quick warm embrace, and the lad was gone. The mother felt as if she were entirely alone in that sea of human beings. It is in our soul-life that we are alone.

He waved to her, but her sight could not reach him. Four sons—all gone! And Alfredo was the last.

IT was up into the snows that Alfredo Del Rosso was sent, up to fight the enemy of his country by the side of the Alpine soldiers, who look so jaunty—in peace times—wearing a uniform with an orange stripe on the trousers and a hat with one cock's feather stuck straight up in the air, saucily. In July the uniforms had become soiled, and the cock's feather drooped, a little the worse for wear; but the hearts beating beneath the soiled uniform were still warm with love of Italy, and the eyes shining under the brim of the stiff hat were still glowing with courage.

In between the battles, when there was a lull, Alfredo wrote letters home to his mother, letters which cheered her in her lonely life far away in Rome. Signora Del Rosso earned her living by doing the washing for the family of a duchess who lived in a great palace, and had many servants and much riches. The name by which Alfredo's mother was known was not such a dignified one as Signora Del Rosso. That belonged to the old days, when her husband lived and they were prosperous, occupying an apartment of four rooms. Now, when life had treated her badly, she was called "Mariuccia," which means "poor old Maria."

In the second courtyard of the great palace, built of thick blocks of brown tufa, was a pool of water, running swift and cold from the long aqueduct reaching far across the Roman Campagna. Here Mariuccia washed from morning till night, beating the garments on the stone wall of the pool, or "fontana," until her fingers ached. She wondered, sometimes, how her ladies could make use of so many dainty garments, exquisitely embroidered and trimmed with costly lace. These were, however, only some of her quiet thoughts. She did not express them to the chattering servants who worked near her.

One thing drew old Mariuccia and her mistress the Duchess very close together, though the fine lady never knew it; and that was their motherhood. Each had borne four sons, and each had seen these boys go away to the war. Mariuccia was lonely, but the Duchess was even more bereft, because she did not possess the Book.

At home, in the summer evening, when her work was done and her aching fingers were rested, Mariuccia would sit down by the table in her little dark room, opening into a small court, where the odors were none too sweet. No sunshine ever came in here, and in winter the walls were green with mold, and it was bitter cold. But, as Mariuccia said, shrugging her shoulders, covered by the spotless neckerchief she always wore over her old dress; "What can you expect for the price? It is cheap. Basta! I must be contented."

She lit her candle; electric lights were not within her reach; with the princely, or dukely, hire of thirty cents a day and a plate of macaroni at noon, one must be economical.

Then she drew from a drawer a companion volume to the one so carefully packed by Alfredo in the depths of his knapsack. It, too, was gray with use, and thumbed by patient fingers. There were few pencil-marks, because Mariuccia was not learned in things of the brain, only in those of the heart. She could read a little, and on this evening late in July, when the streets outside were full of chattering, quarreling people, when a piano-organ played "Tripoli" with unusual zeal and much noise, and a baby in the next room shrieked in pain or wrath, the washerwoman picked out the words by the light of the candle.

Many of the passages she knew by heart, they were so dear to her. She repeated them now softly and was comforted.

"Say to them that are of a fearful heart, Be strong, fear not: behold, your God will come with vengeance, even God with a recompense; he will come and save you.

"Then the eyes of the blind shall be opened, and the ears of the deaf shall be unstopped.

"Then shall the lame man leap as a hart, and the tongue of the dumb sing: for in the wilderness shall waters break out, and streams in the desert. . . .

"And the ransomed of the Lord shall return, and come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads: they shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away."

Mariuccia let the old Book fall upon her lap.

"And sorrow and sighing shall flee away," she whispered.

Then she fell asleep in her chair, with the Book lying half opened on her lap, for she was very tired. The sun had been hot that day, and even in the shaded courtyard of the Duchess's palace it had been suffocatingly warm. Mariuccia had done some more wondering as she rubbed and rubbed the white lawn and linen dresses of the young Duchessine on the stone ledge of the fountain.

THE man grinding the hurdy-gurdy out in the street played the last triumphal and patriotic strains of the Royal March and went away to a much-needed rest. The people on the streets talked till late, and then they, too, went to bed. The early dawn shone rosy in the east, and the birds began to twitter joyously in the parks and gardens of the city. It was cool now, and fresh breezes blew and woke the roses on the walls and wafted the fragrance of the starry jessamine to the men and women already on their way to work.

Still Mariuccia slept on.

But as the sun, an orb of burning gold, peeped above the horizon, a jolly round face with promises of the day, the woman stirred and sat upright. The Book fell unheeded to the floor. There was a strained look on her wrinkled, parchment face, as if she saw things not fit for mortal sight.

She stretched out her gnarled, worn hands, grasping at the air.

"Alfredo!" she called anxiously. "Alfredo! Here is mother; right here. Don't be afraid! And reach out to God, my boy! reach out to God!"

She rose, staggered, and grasping the window-sill, steadied herself as the fresh morning air aroused her to consciousness.

Passing her hands over her eyes, she drove away the vision.

"I must have been dreaming," she murmured.

All that hot day Mariuccia washed at the fountain more linen and lawn dresses, but her thoughts were far away in the mountains, and every once in a while she raised her bowed body straight and looked out into space.

"Alfredo, mother is here," she whispered; "right here by thee. Reach out to God, dear, reach out to God!"

IT was dreary up in the mountains. Down in Rome the sun shone brilliantly, the roses climbed the gray walls and nodded in the breeze; the lilies cast forth fragrance; and under the ilex-trees there were shadows, green-black.

Up on the borders of the Dolomites, where rank after rank of needle-pointed, castellated peaks rose, sometimes blood-red, sometimes purple, oftener dull gray when cloud-shadows fell upon them, there were thousands of soldiers. And one of them was Alfredo Del Rosso, son of the old woman with the knotted, seamed hands, and the warm young heart full of mother-love.

The soldiers were trying to force a pass between these jagged lime-stone mountains. They had pitched their tents in a gorge. It was very cold; the wind shrieked through the rocky chasm, coming down from a glacier lying high above.

In one of the tents at ten o'clock on a July night there were two soldiers, so weary from their hard work that they had thrown themselves down, half-dressed, upon the piles of straw serving them as beds. It was so cold, too, even in midsummer, that they needed their garments to keep them warm. One gray blanket was not enough.

They were half asleep when the flap of sail-cloth was lifted, and a young soldier entered. He shook the drops from his coat and laughed cheerfully.

"It's raining hard, to add to our delights," he said.

"Have you brought the paper, Alfredo?"

"Yes. It's late tonight, and the mule had hard work to keep its footing; the rocks are icy and slippery. Lucky that we get it at all."

"Dated a week back, I suppose," grumbled one of the men.

"Well, what of that? We'll get the news, just the same."

"Tell it quick," called out the other soldier. "I'm dead sleepy. Is it hot down in Milan?"

"Ninety in the shade, my boy."

"Oh for a little of that heat up here!"

"Hear that rain!" said Alfredo, as the drops fell furiously on the tent roof. "Well, here's the news, boys. One of the Austrian cruisers was sunk in the Adriatic by our submarine."

"Bravo!"

"A company of our Bersaglieri took a splendid position and won. Many are killed, but what does that matter? They won—for Italy."

"While we wait here and do nothing."

"Never mind, our chance will come, and we'll win our laurels yet. The Austrians are retiring. I don't see much else."

"And now I'm wide awake and can't go to sleep again," muttered the grumbler. "Just hear that rain. It sounds like cannonading."

Alfredo went to his knapsack, found a small package wrapped up in oilcloth, and took out his mother's picture. For a moment he looked at the dear face, then laid it carefully away.

He came back to the rough box on which the candle stood, bringing the little, worn Book. Each night he had read its precious words, while his companions slept.

There was bright red color on his cheeks when he said: "If you're awake, perhaps you'd like me to read something out of this."

"What is it?" asked the grumbler. The other soldier was already asleep.

"It's the Bible."

The grumbler whistled.

"So that's what you read every night. I've heard of it, but I never saw one. Fire away! Perhaps it will put me to sleep. At any rate, it'll make me forget that confounded rain."

So Alfredo read from his little old Book, while the rain fell in torrents and the wind howled about the tent as if it would tear it to pieces. The passage which he chose was the one from St. Luke where the Lord said unto Simon, "Launch out into the deep, and let down your nets for a draught." And Simon, protesting, as was his custom, let down the nets, and they enclosed a great multitude of fishes. So heavy was the load that this ship and that of Simon's partners, James and John, sons of Zebedee, were over-filled and began to sink.

"Then Simon Peter fell down at Jesus' knees, saying, Depart from me, for I am a sinful man, O Lord."

"But Jesus said unto Simon, Fear not; from henceforth thou shalt catch men. And when they had brought their ships to land, they forsook all, and followed him."

The grumbler's eyes were wide open.

"They were fishermen," he said. "My father was a fisherman, down near Sorrento, and many and many a time I've gone out with him in the little boat; and we've cast the net and dragged it to shore full of fish, little shining, silvery things. But we never had such a haul as that. Per Bacco! it must have been wonderful!"

"Jesus was there," Alfredo answered softly, closing his Book and laying it carefully away.

"Do you really believe in Jesus Christ?" asked the grumbler. His tone was very earnest now.

"I really believe in Jesus Christ and his power to save us," replied Alfredo.

"I wish I could believe," responded the soldier.

There was silence in the tent, while the rain poured and then ceased.

IT was still dark when the sudden order came: "To arms!" The three soldiers were on their feet in an instant. Alfredo had time to put the package covered with oilcloth inside his shirt. In fifteen minutes the grumbler was loading his rifle in the trenches and Alfredo was beside him. They were too busy to talk and too busy to fear the shots rushing viciously over their heads. Men were falling, too, but still they kept on loading and firing, loading and firing.

After a stormy night the dawn came, clear and fresh. The glacier in the clefts of the mountains glistened and the peaks turned rose-red in the early sunlight.

A shot hissed through the air and with a groan Alfredo fell. One word escaped his lips: "Mother!" Did that word reach the heart of the old woman down in Rome?

The grumbler caught his comrade in his arms and tried to stanch the blood from his wound. He removed everything from Alfredo's pockets, and feeling the package under the shirt, took that also, and placed it in his breast. If his comrade died, he would take these things to his mother. Then he shouldered the unconscious man and bore him away.

THAT day Mariuccia did a heavy washing for the Duchess. But at noontime something happened. A telegram came, saying that the youngest son of the Duchess was dead. In the palace there was weeping and mourning.

The poor enjoy few luxuries. No telegrams come to them, and the letter written by the grumbler never reached the mother to tell her that her boy was wounded.

One afternoon she returned home early from her work. She was very, very lonely. Four sons at the front, and no news. It was hard. It was unbearable.

A fumbling at the door startled her; it swung open. Her eyes were blinded by the light of the opened door in which stood a soldier in gray uniform. His arm was bandaged and in a sling and his face was pale with suffering.

"Mother, it is I, Alfredo," he said. In an instant he was in her arms.

Behind him came his comrade, who had been given leave of absence because of a slight illness. He was no longer the grumbler. His face was transformed, lightened by a great hope, for he, too, had come to know Jesus Christ, the Saviour of the world. That night Mariuccia opened the leather-covered Bible, precious inheritance from her evangelical mother, and while the lads in their gray uniforms sat near her she read aloud: "And the ransomed of the Lord shall return, and come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads: they shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away."

toward greater activity on the part of Emperor Charles' army, foreshadowing an early attack on Italy.

Italian airmen, fighting their way over the Trentino against desperate attempts of Austrian aviators to drive them back, reported bombs dropped on concentrations of enemy forces which were being brought together in the valleys north of Trent. Increasing gunfire and patrol activity indicated the possibility of an early attack on the Italians by the Austrian army. Austrian attempts to take from the Italians their recent captures on Monte Carlo were repulsed with heavy losses.

THE fighting in the west on Monday and Tuesday, May 13 and 14, was largely limited to artillery duels. On Tuesday, the Germans made two attempts to take Allied positions. They attacked in the direction of Kleine Vierstratt, north of the village of Kemmel, and succeeded in sweeping up the slopes of Hill No. 44, although they were unable to hold the summit from which the French defenders quickly
